SAN FRANCISCO has had Sunday evening lectures by E. B. Rambo upon The Heart Doctrine, by Abbott Clark upon An Outline of Theosophy, by Dr. J. A. Anderson upon Reincarnation the Approach to the Path of Occultism. Dr. Anderson has also lectured in Alameda, and Mr. Clark in Stockton. The debating class organized in March is doing good work. It is composed principally of the younger members, one being but thirteen. All are obliged to participate, so that the younger become accustomed to express themselves, and the elder to reason.

MRS. VERA S. BEANE has been doing a notable work for Theosophy in the North West. About the middle of April she left San Francisco at the request of the Pacific Coast Committee, and has visited the Branches at Portland, Tacoma, Seattle, Victoria, Olympia, and Gray's Harbor, holding public meetings and private talks, and receiving calls from interested persons. When at Seattle she followed up in the near towns of Ballard and Port Townsend the good work begun by that Branch. Her meetings have been large and enthusiastic, doing much to strengthen the members. Grateful letters of appreciation reach the Committee, and there is deep satisfaction that so active, intelligent, and devoted a laborer has been able to enter the field and stimulate the seed planted by predecessors.

THE PACIFIC COAST LECTURER had good audiences in the Church of the Unity, Los Angeles, on April 20, 23, and 28. Besides Branch and private meetings, a number of public meetings were held, and 1,200 leaflets were distributed. Written instead of oral questions have been proved expedient, for complications are avoided and the object aimed at better attained. The man always on the alert to make a speech or ask a "poser" is barred, controversy is minimized, and really interested inquirers receive greater satisfaction. Dr. Griffiths lectured in G. A. R. Hall, Santa Ana, on May 8th, also met the Alaya Branch and inquirers. It is Santa Ana where Mrs. Sophronia A. Smith has done so much and such excellent work. Dr. Griffiths visited Colton on May 12th and 13th, lectured on "Karma and Reincarnation", and held a quiz meeting with good effect.

BRO. FRANK NEUBAUER has moved from San Francisco to Los Angeles and been elected President of the L. A. Branch. He is doing good work. Weekly Branch meetings are conducted under an improved order of proceedings, public Sunday evening meetings have been begun, and propaganda plans are projected. Los Angeles F.T.S. have received more outside assistance than any other T.S. centre on the Pacific Coast, and they now have opportunity to demonstrate their ability to help themselves. On April 23d Mr. Neubauer lectured on "Post-Mortem States", and on the 30th, Mr. Geo. W. Aylesworth upon "Adepts". White Lotus Day was well celebrated, and the exercises closed with an address from Dr. Griffiths.

NARADA T.S., Tacoma, Wash., has enjoyed visits from Rev. W. E. Copeland of Stockton and Mrs. V. S. Beane of San Francisco. On May 7th Bro. Copeland read a paper on "The Esoteric Meaning of the Lord's Prayer", and on White Lotus Day spoke of the similarity between the early days of Christianity and Theosophy. His address to the Unitarian Conference in Seattle upon "Why Unitarians should be Theosophists" brought out many questions from the ministers. Mrs. Beane spoke in the Unitarian Church of Tacoma, April 23d, upon "The Septenary Constitution of Man", and her labors and lectures have been of deep value to the Branch.

WHITE LOTUS DAY.

The second anniversary of H.P.B.'s departure was duly observed on May 8th in the manner of her expressed wish, and reports have arrived from many Branches of the feeling and interest exhibited. It is not possible to print these, but they all show that union of reverent affection with grateful reminiscence which augurs a healthy future for the Society. Her picture adorned with flowers was a usual feature, the books she specified were read, and in some cases appropriate music was introduced. Addresses were in many Branches made. These simple but significant memorials testify to the Society's continued devotion to her, and keep alive the sense of what it and the Western World have received through her life and work. Every year should see the commemoration more general and more hearty, for every year will demonstrate more fully the value of Theosophy and of the one who re-proclaimed it.

WHITE LOTUS DAY SAVINGS BOXES.

Bro. J. D. Bond's well-conceived plan of savings boxes, the contents whereof should accumulate through the year and be transmitted to the General Secretary on White Lotus Day, has proved of material benefit to the treasury. The total received to May 29th is $625.13. A very small amount systematically placed by each box-holder in his box thus swells to a handsome sum, and the aggregate of all is of great assistance. The scheme was begun only in December, so that the above figures express the result of but four or five months. If every participant continues his exertions, and if every new F. T. S. is supplied with a box, the report in '94 will be creditable indeed. Surely in Theosophy, where Karma is so clearly recognized and honored, no one need ever be weary of well-doing.

ENGLAND.

THE INTEREST TAKEN in Theosophic teachings in London is evidently quite unabated, and among the working-classes seems to be growing. Annie Besant lectured on April 11th in Chelsea Town Hall on "Theosophy and the Labor Movement", and the hall was packed to suffocation almost entirely with workmen, and the discussion that followed the lecture showed how keenly the points had been appreciated. On the following evening Annie Besant lectured at Bow Working Women's Club on "Reincarnation in its bearing on personal and family life"; there the hall is but small, seating a little over a hundred people, but the yard outside and the passage were packed, and packed so effectually that two gentlemen who offered half a sovereign each for admission could not get in. These, and some other lectures arranged for in densely populated poor districts, are being given without charge, the halls and advertisements being paid for out of the proceeds of Mrs. Besant's lectures in the richer districts.

"THROUGH STORM TO PEACE" is the title under which Mrs. Besant is writing the story of her life in the Weekly Sun, London. The editor, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M. P., has persuaded her to pen these autobiographical sketches, and she has consented to do so in the hope that some service may be done to the Theosophical cause by thus putting before a very large public the story of the way in which she became a believer in Theosophical teachings. It seems a fresh chance of raising enquiry among many whom Theosophy may not have reached.

COUNTESS WACHTMEISTER is busily engaged on a book that is to be issued in the early Autumn, How the Secret Doctrine was Written. It promises to be of very great interest, as showing the way in which H. P. Blavatsky worked at the wonderful two volumes so well known to every real student. As Countess Wachtmeister was one of H. P. B.'s nearest friends, and was with her during the time of the writing, she can say much of the deepest interest.

THE SALE of Theosophical literature is constantly on the increase, and the H. P. B. Press is hard put to it to keep pace with the demands. A new edition of the Key to Theosophy is just through, and there are ominous murmurs as to the approaching exhaustion of the Theosophical Glossary. Pamphlets are run off by thousands, and yet the demand remains unsatisfied. And this seems to us to be one of the most solid signs of progress, for when people begin to read our cause is won.

THERE IS a little paper here, The Irish Theosophist, that we should like to recommend to some of our American friends. It is set up and published by a few earnest young fellows, who, after working for their bread all day, work half the night to get out their paper. It is really a good little journal, a monthly, and only costs 2 cents, and it is forwarded postpaid for a year for the large sum of 37 1-2 cents. Its page is the same size as that of Lucifer, and it gives twelve of them and a cover, all for 2 cents!

FOREIGN.

MRS. ISABEL COOPER OAKLEY'S visit to Melbourne, Australia, resulted in a greatly increased interest in Theosophy and H.P.B. The "Victorian Theosophic League" was formed immediately after her arrival and first address. A few days later quarters were secured, but audiences so grew that a Hall for lectures became necessary. For some time Mrs. Oakley gave interviews from 10 to 5 o'clock daily, conducted three Secret Doctrine classes and a class for beginners weekly, and lectured each Sunday evening. On April 9th was the last lecture, "Madame Blavatsky and the Messengers of the Mahatmas", there being barely standing room in the Hall. Attendance had steadily increased from twenty-five at the first to over four hundred at the last. One fruit of the work was a present to the League by Miss Minet of the whole stock of Theosophical works in her shop, the value being about $500; and another, the formation of a Debating Club with over twenty members. Mrs. Oakley visits Adelaide, New Zealand, Tasmania, and Sydney, and will be again in Melbourne next September.

A BRANCH has been lately chartered by Col. Olcott in Buenos Ayres, Argentine Republic, South America. It has already fourteen members, including two ministers, two deputies, several men of letters, lawyers, and physicians, and has established a capacious Headquarters, where, besides a large meeting-room and a library, it has seven rooms fitted up for guests and a vegetarian table for such as prefer it. Travelling brethren are entertained free of cost for a week. There is evidence of remarkable earnestness and devotion, as well as of wish for Theosophical books in various languages.

NOTICES.

BRANCH PAPER No. 33, The Gates of Life, read before the Upasana T.S. by a member thereof, was sent to the Secretaries late in May. It is a poem, and the only Branch Paper in poetry yet issued.

THE REPORT OF CONVENTION PROCEEDINGS was mailed separately to each member in good standing at the end of May. The copies for members-at-large carried also the May Forum.

MARS AND MERCURY.

IN the June PATH there was printed a review of a pamphlet issued by the London Lodge T. S., and this magazine may perhaps be construed as committed to an approval of everything contained in the pamphlet, although the private initials of the reviewer were annexed to the remarks. The pamphlet referred to brings up an old dispute which we had thought was settled by what is found in The Secret Doctrine, Vol. I, running from page 162 to 168. "Gratification of curiosity is the end of knowledge for some men", wrote H. P. B.'s teacher, and this curiosity led to a question being put some years ago to the Adepts, who furnished the main body of Esoteric Buddhism and all the important matter in The Secret Doctrine, in respect to other visible globes. The author of Esoteric Buddhism then construed the reply to mean that Mars and Mercury are two of the seven planets of the earth-chain of globes. H. P. B., the only person in actual and constant communication with the Masters, corrected the mistake made by Mr Sinnett in the pages of The Secret Doctrine to which I have referred, saying on page 164: "But neither Mars nor Mercury belongs to our chain; they are, along with the other planets, septenary units in the great host of 'chains', and all are as visible as their upper globes are invisible". Her correction of the misconception was made upon the written authority of the same Masters who sent through her the letters on which Esoteric Buddhism was written.

On the ground of authority in respect to this question, about which none of the Theosophical writers have any information independent of what the Masters have written, we must conclude that the statement in The Secret Doctrine is final. If no other point were involved, there would be no necessity for going further with the matter, but as the consistency of the entire philosophy is involved, it is necessary to advert again to this subject.

The two Masters who had to do with Esoteric Buddhism and The Secret Doctrine have distinctly said:—first, that none of the other globes of the earth-chain are visible from its surface; second, that various planets are visible in the sky to us because they are in their turn fourth-plane planets, representing to our sight their own septenary chains; third, that the six companion globes of the earth are united with it in one mass, but differ from it as to class of substance; fourth, that Mr. Sinnett misunderstood them when he thought they meant to say that Mars and Mercury were two of the six fellow globes of the earth,—and this correction they make most positively in The Secret Doctrine; lastly, they have said that the entire philosophy is one of correspondences, and must be so viewed in every part. We do not understand that Mr. Sinnett has said that H. P. B. was not reporting the Masters when she wrote the above in The Secret Doctrine, or that the Masters have denied that they hold the above views.

If we admit that Mars and Mercury are two visible planets of the seven-fold chain belonging to the earth, then the consistency of the philosophy is destroyed, for as it is with planets, so it is with man. Every planet, considered for the moment as an individual, is to be analysed in the same way as a single human being, subject to the same laws in the same way. Hence, if two of the principles of the earth are visible, that is, Mars and Mercury, then why is it that two of man's seven principles are not visible, in addition to his body? In his seven-fold constitution his body represents the earth in her septenary chain, but he cannot see objectively any other of his principles. The philosophy must be consistent throughout. If it is inconsistent at one point it fails at every other. The same Masters who have communicated through

H. P. B. with Mr. Sinnett for the purpose of having Esoteric Buddhism written, have over and over again positively stated that the law of correspondence rules throughout in this philosophy.

The earth is a fourth-plane planet. The beings upon it are now in the fourth stage, and for that reason cannot see objectively any planet that is not on the same plane of development, and every planet which they see is for that reason a fourth-plane planet. If this be correct, then Mars and Mercury must be fourth-plane planets, and hence not in the earth's chain of globes.

If we assume with the writer of the pamphlet referred to that Mars and Mercury are two out of the whole seven of which the earth is a third, then the question arises, To what principle do these two planets correspond?, for they must correspond to either prana, kama, astral body, Manas, Buddhi, or Atman. Any attempt at an answer to this question will show the confusion in the assumption; for it is admitted that Mars is in obscurity, and the natural question then would be, Which of the earth's principles is correspondingly in obscurity? In attempting to answer this from the assumption started with, we have the statement that Mars is the planet we have last been in, hence it must represent a disused faculty or principle, and not one which we are about to develop. As Manas is the next principle to be fully developed, it would follow that Mars does not represent it, and hence the whole matter falls into confusion, because the first four principles have been already developed and are not in disuse. Following this on the false assumption, then Mars would represent an eighth principle.

Mars is in a state of obscurity at the present time, as stated by the Masters and H. P. B. This is because, in that chain of development, the Egos have finished their fourth round, or because the fourth round has not yet commenced, except in respect to the planet itself as a place of habitation, the Egos having passed on to the next globe of that chain, quite as invisible from the surface of Mars as our next globe in order is invisible from our surface. The same may be said for Mercury, except in respect to obscurity, since the information vouchsafed about it declares that it is beginning to get out of the obscurity caused by the absence of Egos.

A reference to the pages of the Secret Doctrine referred to above will be found helpful on this point. It is also stated on page 163 of that book, Vol. I, on the authority of the Masters, that "No companion planet, that is, no upper globes of any chain in the solar system, can be seen." I may say that the relation borne by Mars and Mercury to the earth will not be spoken of or explained by the Masters. Furthermore, one of the Masters wrote to the author of Esoteric Buddhism in respect to this matter, stating, "You are putting me questions pertaining to the highest initiation. I can give you only a general view, but I dare not, nor will I, enter upon details."

It is not necessary for us to know the relation between Mars, Mercury, and the Earth, especially, nor to know whether Mars and Mercury are in any particular state; all that is necessary is to know, do they or not belong to our chain? And that they do not has been distinctly stated, both from the position of authority and upon the ground of consistent philosophy. Upon authority, because in no other way can we solve this riddle; upon philosophy to show the reasonableness of the authoritative statement. All such difficulties can be solved by remembering and working upon the law that, as it is in respect to man and his principles or vehicles, so it is in respect to any planet whatever.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE.

CAUTIONS IN PARAGRAPHS.

DO not make statements that tend to mix up the Theosophical Society with any religious belief, political theory, or social observance or non-observance.

Beware of the proposition that the rich or those in social life needing theosophy as much as the humbler ranks should therefore have special efforts made for them while they fail or refuse to openly help the Society with their countenance and effort.

Do not be misled by the fancy that special effort to "convert" a scientific celebrity will lead to any great benefit to the theosophical movement, or sufficiently offset the time thereby lost from the general work among those who are ready to listen.

Never cry down the efforts of a sincere member to disseminate theosophy merely because it does not meet your standards of method or propriety.

Always discountenance any proposal to establish a censorship of either literature or effort in theosophical ranks, for such a censorship is against the broad and free platform on which the Society rests.

Suffer not yourself to be annoyed because scientific men claim as their new and original discoveries that which theosophical literature has always claimed; remember we are not in this movement for glory, but that men shall know the truth regardless of where the credit for discovery is given.

Never forget that a theosophical Branch is for the study of theosophy, and not for discussion upon outside topics.

Let not sentimentality make you fear to bring forward what you believe to be theosophy, even though some persons threaten to leave the ranks because their own fad seems endangered by the strength of your theory; but beware you do not mistake self-assertion in yourself for the strength of your theories.

Be not deluded by the idea that you can do great good by entering a church society in which you do not believe. Theosophy is not benefitted by being thrown among those who declare they do not want it.

Beware of the person who offers to sell spiritual science in so many lessons for a sum of money. Expositions by lectures in public of general theosophical principles for an admission fee are proper, but courses of lessons on magic arts, spiritual science, secrets of nature, and the like are eternally improper, emanate from cupidity or undisciplined intellect, and lead to nothing.

Be charitable enough to remember that the theosophist is human, and perhaps has to struggle all the harder with our common failings just because he has entered on the battle with the lower nature.

Do not fancy that because ours is called a brotherhood any exclusion of woman is inferred. English is not the only language on earth, and in many others the same term describes both feminine and masculine. Theosophy does not concern sex distinctions, and talks more of souls, which are sexless, than it does of the bodies they inhabit.

Carefully avoid confounding Brahmanism with Buddhism, and the religions flourishing outside of India with those of that country. Buddhism not being the religion of India, confusion of uttered sounds and knowledge results from calling Hindus Buddhists.

Very carefully refrain from confusing Christianity with the religion of Jesus. The latter is not the former, inasmuch as Christianity is split up into over three hundred different sects, whereas Jesus had but one doctrine.

Pay the highest respect to the sermons of Jesus, from the remembrance of the fact that in his discourses he but gave forth once again the old doctrine taught to him by the ancient theosophists of whom he was a disciple.

Do not make the blunder of mistaking the glitter of our civilization for true progress. Weigh fine houses, good clothes, mechanical devices, and universal male suffrage against the poverty, misery, vice, crime, and ignorance which go with the former, before you conclude what is the best civilization.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

THE late T. Subba Row, B. A., B. L., was a Brahmin of high caste, well known in the Theosophical movement and intimate with H. P. B., Col. Olcott, and others in India. The editor of PATH met him at Adyar in 1884, and knew how highly he was thought of by all who knew him. He died on the 24th of June, 1890. A very interesting account of him printed in July Theosophist of 1890 was written by Col. Olcott and endorsed by the family before publication. T. Subba Row left no literary work of any great moment, considering his undoubted ability.

His best work was in a series of lectures on the Bhagavad-Gita at the Convention of 1886 in India. But his name is deeply associated with our work, and H. P. B. often referred to him. There is not the slightest doubt that he was personally acquainted with the same Masters of whom H. P. B. so often spoke.

He was of the Niyoga caste of the Smartha Brahmans. Born on the 6th of July, 1856, he lived but thirty-four years. He was brought up by his uncle, who was the Prime Minister of the Raja of Pittapur. In his early years no one thought him to be very learned or full of mystical knowledge, but later on he became one of those cases where old knowledge gained in a former life came back. This was in respect to philosophy and Indian religious books, from which he was known to quote as if he had read them all.

As an individual he was genial though reserved, showing signs of power within; and, as Col. Olcott said, the fact that he lived his occult life alone gives strength to the confidential statements he made to his family and friends. His eye was large, deep brown, and brilliant, and although I had only a few conversations with him the impression he made was lasting and pleasant. One little verse he quoted to me never left my memory, and I shall always think of him with gratitude as well as pleasure. He was a friend of the T. S. as well as a member, and though engaged once in a slight controversy in respect to the theory of the constitution of the human being, he deserves a place in our gallery of friendly countenances.

KOREAN STORIES.

KOREA—also spelled Coreā—has been called "The Hermit Nation." The author of the following stories is a Korean now in Washington and a member of the Branch there. He has furnished these for the PATH through Mrs. Coffin of the Washington T. S., and may be able to give us more. He says they have many stories of Masters, or Adepts, in his country, where belief in "Masters" is universal among all classes. Indeed, when they see a venerable beggar or old man they say, "Perhaps that is a Master in disguise."—Ed.]

THE SPOTTED BUDDHA OR ADEPT.

Two young philosophers retired to a mountain to live in seclusion and practice Yoga. They lived in two huts on the opposite sides of this mountain. It was said that they had reached a similar and high stage of development. One day a beautiful young woman appeared in the hut of one of the students and asked the privilege of remaining that night. Although he felt kindly to her, he refused her request, as he did not wish to have his quiet disturbed: so he sent her to the hut of his friend, who took her in.

His heart was not in peace the whole night; he arose early next morning and went to his friend's hut, hoping to find out what had become of the beautiful woman. On opening the door there streamed upon him a flood of golden light. He distinguished two beings in this golden glory, two beings of pure gold with rays of light issuing from them, and seated on two shrines. He slowly recognized his friend in the one seated on the lower shrine; the other one seemed entirely strange to him. He then perceived they were the truly wise, whose virtues had no comparison with a lower soul like himself. He bowed down before them and wished to know how his friend had become thus suddenly wise.

His friend replied: "I kindly accepted the woman you sent to my hut, and gave her shelter. The birth of her child took place, and the infant was bathed by his mother in perfumed water brought by her. He was immediately transformed into pure gold, as you now see; whereupon the woman disappeared. The boy is he who is seated on the upper shrine: he is a spiritual being descended temporarily for the sake of humanity. With the permission of the heavenly Master I also washed in the perfumed water, and became transformed into pure gold." "May I not also wash in this wondrous water?" the other cried; but alas! he only found a few drops in the bottom of the vase. He thankfully used what remained of the holy water, but it, being insufficient to cover him, left him only spotted with golden color wherever the drops had touched him. Ever after that, he was called "The Spotted Buddha."

QUAN-URN-BODHI-SATTVA.

A man who had always devoted himself to a religious life and the search after Divine Wisdom left his family and retired to a very secret spot on a mountain where no traveller had ever penetrated, far away from the sights and sounds of the world. He ate and slept only to maintain his mortal body.

After long years of purification he had made considerable progress. One day a traveller found his way to this solitude and stopped in his hut to rest. Though he kindly treated the weary pilgrim, he felt he could not bear to have his retreat desecrated and his study interrupted. Remonstrance was useless, the stranger still remained, until finally his little hut was visited by a succession of travelers, each more disturbing and obnoxious than the preceding one. At last he despaired of attaining the great object of his life. He became half-frenzied at this waste of his life-long labors, and in a moment of anger he took the life of the last traveller who stopped in his hut.

Having committed a murder he abandoned the idea of proceeding on the Path. He left his hut and life of seclusion, and sadly prepared to return to his home, when there suddenly appeared before him a panorama of exceeding beauty composed of a group of spiritual beings. The central figure of this group proclaimed herself to be the great Quan-Urn-Bodhi-Sattva,* and requested to know the cause of his return. He replied that as he had committed a grievous sin he had no longer the hope of attaining true wisdom, and was going back to his home.

"Bring your sin to me. Bring your sin to me," said the Bodhi-Sattva. "Everything proceeds from no-thing, † so also does sin. Thinking of the past is also a sin." She then caused him to return to the mountain and pursue his studies. His heart became gradually peaceful, and he made such rapid progress that he soon became a perfectly wise man.

A WHITE LOTUS DAY ADDRESS.‡

COMMEMORATION of H. P. B. has thus far been largely of reminiscence and of anecdote illustrating her personality, and doubtless this will always have its interest, as readers of "Old Diary Leaves" can very well understand. Yet the main topics on White Lotus Day as years pass on will be more and more, I take it, who and what was this most wonderful personage of the century, what was her exact relation to the Theosophical Society. These questions appear very simple: they are really most difficult and complicated. I do not purpose to now discuss either, but merely to express a collateral thought.

To ordinary citizens of the day nothing is more astonishing than that a new religion—for Theosophy is really such—should be promulgated at this close of the nineteenth century, and that its prophet should be a woman. The era is unfavorable to revelations or to spiritual philosophy, and scornful of either when coming through a female channel. Very naturally there arises query * Quan-Urn-Bodhi-Sattva is believed by the Koreans to be one of the highest Adepts, whose spiritual virtue is only next to that of Gautama Buddha, and whose mission is to appear as a saviour at the most critical moment of human affairs. She is to work for humanity during the whole Manvantara.

The vision of this Bodhi-Sattva, varying as it does in beauty of color, sound, and form to different persons, has inspired many poems, among them a book published in Korea called Le-jung-gam-no, meaning "The sweet dew to save the people."

† That is, from thought, which is not a thing.

as to whether this new religion will take form as a Blavatsky cult, giving a semi-Divine character to the teacher, investing her words with a sacro-sanct quality, making her writings a finality in doctrine. Some such suspicion is universal among outsiders.

In respect to its estimate of H. P. B. the T. S. may be divided into three classes. One is of those who regard her fully as an Adept, an actual member of the hierarchy, endowed with its prerogatives and powers. They of course do not pretend to even conjecture her degree of advancement, though that is unimportant. The second suppose her to have crossed the line separating ordinary humanity from the Occult fraternity, and to have been entrusted with some secrets of initiation, notably that of communication with Masters, but not to have been a Master herself. The third consider her a woman of singular force and nerve, possessed in some strange way of unusual learning, but nothing more than a chela, if that.

Now through each of these classes no less than in the world outside, and in the first class (to which I belong) quite as much as in the others, exists a fixed opposition to a Blavatsky cult. No matter what may be the degree of reverence for her person or her works, it will not be conceded that she was infallible, impeccable, an authority never to be deviated from, critically examined, or suspected of inconsistency. Treatment of her as a being whose utterances it would be sacrilegious to question and perilous to deny, seems to all a mistake and a folly.

And yet, paradoxical as it may appear, possibly seeming an exaggeration, an extravagance, the extreme of a partisan, I do not hesitate to aver my conviction that the success of the Theosophical Society is in exact proportion to its loyalty and devotion to H. P. B. Like any other theory, this is a question of fact and to be tested by fact. Look at the facts. Of the Sections of the Society, which are the most active and efficient, most zealous in promulgating Theosophy, most rapidly influencing the public mind and gaining hold on the public press? Evidently the American and the European. Each is headed by an individual who was an intimate friend and close pupil of H. P. B., whose enthusiastic loyalty to the Teacher colors every utterance and moulds every project, who forms plans, methods, and efforts in accordance with her impulse, who ceaselessly upholds her name and spirit and purpose as the inspiration to T. S. work. The American General Secretary and the English Mrs. Besant are the leaders of their respective Sections, and they lead avowedly on the lines they learned from H. P. B.

Descend to the Branches. This is of necessity a matter of testimony. I unhesitatingly say from my own five and a half years of close connection with the central office that those Branches are the most earnest, active, and growing which cling most heartily to H. P. B. and keep her ever before them in loyal thought and eager service.

Descend further to individuals. Here again must testimony be taken. And here again I offer it in proof that those members of the T. S. are the most progressed in doctrine and life, the most successful in Theosophic work, the most consecrated in spirit, purse, and effort, in exact proportion as they are staunch in devotion to H. P. B., fearless in her defence and in tributes to her worth, cherishing her in thought and word as teacher, friend, superior, and guide. They advance precisely as they go closest to the footsteps of the leader.

The converse of all this is equally true. Where do we find lassitude, indifference, decay, lifelessness? Exactly where there is suspicion, doubt of H. P. B., a constant criticism of her character and ways, a forgetfulness of her devotion and utter sacrifice of self. As she is ignored or belittled, a chill settles down upon the spirit, and the work, like the promoter, loses its charm.

Nor is there anything strange, mysterious in these facts. H. P. B. has herself proclaimed that she owed all her Occult advance, faults and errors notwithstanding, to one inflexible, unvarying habit of her life,—entire devotion to the Master. His image and wish were in perpetual presence. Similarly we, far below her as was she below Him, may look to her. The qualities of utter consecration, sacrifice of self, adhesion to duty and energy and work, which she so resolutely maintained, were reflections from the august Hierarchy whose servant and messenger she was because she did thus reflect them. As we in our minor measure do the same, we are in sympathy with her as she was in sympathy with Them. We appreciate her merits because we share them. A like spirit, however feeble and imperfect, actuates us as it did her, and brings both into magnetic union. We are all in the same ray. Devotion to her is not devotion to a mere personality, honored and elevated though it is, but to the embodiment of a principle, a principle which has its highest manifestation in the Masters and which They valued in her as should we.

More than this. If in the same ray, we may be assured of the same aid. No greater encouragement ever came to the Society from its unseen prompters than that in the message printed in PATH of August, 1891. Note these two sentences: "We always help those who help us. . . . The humblest worker is seen and helped." The same reasons which made it certain that H. P. B. was sustained and aided in all her efforts make it certain that we shall be. Likeness of spirit, similarity of aim, identity of purpose,—these were what united H. P. B. to the Masters and ensured her Their support. Not less so with ourselves as the same conditions exist. For if loyal devotion to Their service gained for her the help They rejoiced to give, loyal devotion to her as Their servant will bring to us that help equally needed and ready, to us as Society, Branches, and individuals.

THE SLEEPING SPHERES.

PART I.

ONE came to me, calling me out of the form in which I dwell, and showed me the sleeping Spheres.

Now the object of this Messenger who had come to me was to make clear to me some of the hidden things: things hidden, I mean, from the eye of flesh, yet not lying so remote from our ken if we only make some mental effort toward seeing. And the further idea appeared to be that if I were to see them, as it were objectively, though with the astral organ of sight, I might be able to make this, the Devachanic State, clearer to the thought of some of my fellows. For the sleeping Spheres are Devachanic entities. In Devachan we are not yet united with the UNKNOWN SOURCE. Hence the need, on the part of the Ego, of form—or container—of some kind. I have chosen here, arbitrarily perhaps, the name of "Sphere" for this Devachanic form.

These Spheres, than which there are none more beautiful, do not lie in any given place; they are self-contained; they have condition, but no place. When I asked my Companion how this could really be so, he pointed out to me that they interpenetrated many other states of matter, cohering by means of their own vibration, just as do all other forms, of whatever kind and however ethereal, throughout the whole of Nature.

I had passed from my body into the air and the airy form, and from thence into the ether. All about me lay the sleeping Spheres, delicate milky films on the golden ocean of light. Ever and anon a thrill of faintest color trembled across their deeps, and I trembled too, for it was given to me to know that these color-motions were, in reality, Thoughts of profound delight. Yes, these palpitating Spheres had pure joy in their own opalescent motions; joy as they throbbed in the living ether, and a joy which had great meaning. This was plain to even my understanding, which at the moment was that of the airy body only. (I presuppose my readers to know even better than myself, that the consciousness of one body differs greatly from that of another. This is true whether the different bodies are all contained together in their own outer shell, or are at the time separate from that temporary covering.)

Imagine, then, that I saw these radiant shapes, now silvery, with a bluish frost upon them, now blooming into tints so translucent that the eye of the soul alone could perceive them, and that every tint was a Thought, an experience. These fair Thoughts were the dreams of the souls disengaged from earth. Dreaming thus, the Spheres slept. How blissful the dreams! For those colors were both living Light and Intelligence; each color was Thought; Thought of the most exalted order known to the human Mind. Thought quivered through the Spheres, changing their Consciousness; fusing them anew; quickening their higher Life; illumining their purer Light, in a world-plane whereon Light, Life, and Thought are one magnificent act of Being, and not the trivial things known to most men in this everyday world. Each Sphere thus became more and more incandescent with this three-fold LIFE, and I saw them blooming and growing, through this sweet iris-hued ebb and flow, as a flower unfolds towards greater perfection by means of assimilated sun-light. The unfoldment was divine, the peace profound. Silence, like a brooding mother, covered them over; it was only enhanced by an occasional soft semi-tone, the harmonious breathing of the sleeping Spheres.

Would that I need say no more!

Yet even while I watched their gracious Being, it became plain that, like flowers, they must fade. Although they were composed of atoms of living Light, Light that was itself a grand Consciousness, yet I soon observed a marked change to take place and to become prevalent in all of them. This change was at first exceeding beautiful, and consisted of a slight rhythmic motion in the atoms of a Sphere. The atoms danced; living opals shot through with tenderest Light. Seeing this, I could but ask myself, "What new Thoughts are in the dreams of the Spheres?" This motion was soon imparted to the Spheres themselves. They trembled into corruscations of Light and grandly awoke. From them, thus swaying, issued glories that no tongue may name, nor do words contain them. Each Sphere thus joining the choral dance emitted a choral song; music whose ordained instrument is the naked soul; music that is visible flames of sweetest, intensest desire. All my being awoke into delicious longings in which reverence had no place. I said to my Companion: "What is the burden of this bewitching song?" Very gravely he replied: "It sings of the Life of the world". I wondered to hear him speak so solemnly of what gave me so great delight, but when I turned again to the Spheres I felt a new perplexity. The accelerated motion had produced colors more vivid, more of the gross and solid nature of earthy pigment; the music now shrilled across the etheric spaces; there was in it the strident note of crass emerald, the bugle blare of blazing crimson. The Spheres would sleep no more. Yet I saddened now at their brilliant awakening; in my inner heart a deep voice said: "This is the end of all desire".

The music augmented in volume; the aerial dance became a mad whirl to madder—yet harmonic—sound. This sound marshalled the turbulent atoms at the spheric centers, where they set up tentative efforts towards crystallization,—form. These efforts impeded the spheric motion. Labored, troubled movements, indicative of troubled Consciousness, set in. The fair Thought of the Spheres was disturbed. Streams of red fire, strange contractive motions, throes whose every convulsion made the Spheres less ethereal, sound whose every note made the atoms more gross, until suddenly the formative nucleus at the centre shuddered forth into form—a form which caught only a dim reflection of the original Light, a form which could not exist at all on the original plane of the Spheres. Must the awakened Spheres hereafter bear that grotesque burden? Suspended there, fringed only with the gracious spheric hues, gross cause of the dispersal of beautiful Being, still I recognized it, still I wept as I said: "Comes the earth-child thus forth? Surely this is Death that I have witnessed, and not Life."

My Companion answered: "That is in truth what thou hast witnessed. A death to Devachanic existence, a birth into the material Life which thou and thy blinded fellows call 'the world'. The form whose birth thou hast seen is but the model of the earthly one which it informs. It is thy lot to know more of this matter of so-called Life and Death. Another time I will again meet thee; thou shalt then undergo some experience of Devachanic Life." He disappeared, leaving me in my ethereal body, adrift upon the night.

A PLOT AGAINST THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.

MANY plots have been started against the Theosophical Society, and all of them have failed to accomplish their object,—the destruction of the organization. The latest one, still in its early stages, we now present to the members. It is the product of the nature and temperament of a person not a member of the Society, who resides in California. For many years he has been indulging in attacks on H. P. B., and has of late endeavored to spread them as much as possible, and to some extent they have obtained a little currency in India.

The form of these attacks is an attempt to show that H. P. B. took nearly all she has written from books published by other persons. Isis Unveiled has received considerable attention in this way, and much labor and pains were devoted to showing how many things which she has said in that book may be found in other books, it being meantime well known to the members of the Society that she did not have these other books in her possession. Another method pursued is to show, if possible, inconsistencies in the writings of theosophists. For instance, in one case an attempt to prove that we have given out at various times the doctrine that there are sixteen more or less astral bodies in the human being. This is of course nonsensical, and is probably an idea acquired from superficial reading and confounding of the various aspects or powers of the astral body.

But now the Secret Doctrine is to be taken up and an attempt made to show that it is a plagiarism from beginning to end, and then the project is—though we do not certainly know where the capital is to come from—to spread the results in published form all over India. The work to be accomplished in this way it is supposed will damage the Society by damaging the reputation of the author of the Secret Doctrine. Among other things proposed, is to show that the Secret Doctrine was not “precipitated.” This will be very easy, because it is a well-known fact that it was written by hand, and no one but ill-informed and injudicious theosophists would assert that it was precipitated in any sense whatever.

There is some likelihood that slight assistance will be rendered by one or two disaffected persons in India, who in the past have aided in spreading similar attacks which have been published in spiritualistic journals. From time to time we may be able to present further plans and purposes of this brigade of plotters for the information of theosophists in advance. The plotters expect this to hurt the Society, but theosophists should know that nothing can hurt it if they remain loyal to their convictions, if they endeavor to understand theosophic philosophy, if they avoid personalities and confine themselves, as was suggested by one of the Adepts long ago, to a philosophical and ethical propaganda designed to benefit the moral nature of the community in which a Theosophist may live. No plot can prevail against this. But we have thought it well, on behalf of the conspirators, to publish this notice as a preliminary to further details when the time is ready.

REGARDING ISLAMISM.

THE conversion to the religion of the Prophet Mohammed of Alexander Russell Webb, F. T. S., and his establishing in New York a paper devoted to Islamism, together with his lectures on the subject, have caused a great deal of attention to be given to Mohammedanism. Bro. Webb is still a member of the Society, with an interest in its progress, and this is another illustration of the broadness of our platform. But he says that it has surprised him to find the members in general paying slight regard to the life of the Prophet, his sayings and his religion, as one of our objects calls for the study of all religions. In India he found many followers of the Prophet in our Branches, and among them much knowledge of formerly so-called esoteric doctrines, which are common to all religions. That such would be the case must have long ago been evident to those who have read the admirable articles which were printed some years ago in the PATH upon Sufi poetry, as the Sufis really preserve the inner doctrines of Islam. But it is natural that the religion of Mohammed has not received from Western people very great consideration. They judge it in the mass, and not from some of its teachings. The West has developed its social system and its religious belief on its own lines, and having seen that many of the followers of the Prophet are polygamists, which is contrary to Western notions, the entire Islamic system has been condemned on that ground, both in a social and religious sense.

The best Mohammedans say that the Prophet did not teach polygamy, but only permitted it in case a man could treat many wives in exactly the same way in every respect that he could one. Although over against this the Prophet himself had but one wife, and was in fact a celibate, it was quite natural that his followers should liberally construe what he said on the subject and take unto themselves as many wives as their means permitted. This is human nature, and would probably be the result to-day in the West if our people placed reliance on the words of a Teacher who had made a similar statement.

The words of the Koran upon the subject of polygamy, as given by Mr. Webb, are:

“And if ye are apprehensive that ye shall not deal fairly with orphans, then of other women who seem good in your eyes, marry but two, or three, or four; if ye still fear that ye shall not act equitably, then one only.—Koran, Sura IV, verse 3.”

The next prominent conception held by Western people about the Mohammedans is that they have forced an acceptance of their doctrines. We have such stories as that they carried sword in one hand and the Koran in the other, compelling people to accept the book under threat of the sword; that they burned books containing matter other than that in the Koran, on the ground that if it was in the Koran the books were unnecessary, and if it was not in the Koran the books were wrong and should be burned. But the disciples of the Prophet assert that he never taught any such thing, and point to much learning on the part of the Mohammedans in the past. Doubtless these disciples are right, but we know that many Mohammedans tried to coerce people, and that there is some foundation for the story in respect to destruction of that which was not found in the Koran. For these reasons the West has been opposed to Islamism without really knowing much about it. The religion has been judged by the proceedings of its followers. Similar charges might be made against Christian peoples, who notoriously both individually and as nations are in the habit of going directly contrary to the commands of their Founder.

A student of these subjects, then, comes to consider lastly the claims of Islamism on philosophical and religious grounds, and naturally asks the question whether it has any better philosophy than any other religion, and if its religion is supported by a correct philosophy. If it be found that the truths given out by the Prophet were known and written down before his time, then why should the Western student turn to the later religion, the product of a more or less undeveloped people, when he may go to the original from which it undoubtedly came? And if in that original we can find broader and more definite expositions of cosmogenesis and anthropogenesis, we may very properly use Islamism to illustrate the Theosophic truism that one single truth is the basis upon which all religions stand, but we are not necessarily obliged to adopt it to the exclusion of anything else.

Islamism seems to many to exact a belief in a God, and the conception of a God demands that that being shall be separate from those who believe in him. This view does not appeal to many Western Theosophists, because they assert that there can be no God different or separate from man. In the Rig Veda of the Brahmans there are as grand, and some think grander, conceptions of God and nature, as can be found in any Islamic book. If the two are equal in this regard, then the Rig Veda, being admittedly the elder, must have the first place by reason of age; but if the Rig Veda and the philosophy growing out of it are broader and grander than the other, then for that reason it must be more acceptable.

The five fundamental precepts of Islam are given in the Encyclopædia Britannica, as follows:

First, Confession of the Unity of God; second, stated prayer; third, almsgiving; fourth, the fast of Ramadan; fifth, observance of the festival of Mecca.

In the latest English publication on the subject, Mr. Webb says:

Orthodox Mohammedanism may be divided into six heads: First, faith in God, the one God, the creator of all things, who always was and ever will be, the single, immutable, omniscient, omnipotent, all-merciful, eternal God; second, faith in angels, ethereal beings perfect in form and radiant in beauty, without sex, free from all gross or sensual passion and the appetites and infirmities of all frail humanity; third, belief in the Koran as a book of Divine revelation, given at various times to Mohammed by God or through the Angel Gabriel; fourth, belief in God's prophets, the most preëminent of whom were Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Mohammed; fifth, belief in the resurrection and final judgment, when all mankind shall appear before God, who will reward or punish them according to the deeds they have done on earth; sixth, belief in predestination, or the inability of man to avoid, by any act of his own, the destiny irrevocably predetermined by God and written down in the eternal book previous to the creation of the world.

The religion of the Prophet contains, in common with all other religions, a secret doctrine which is the same as that found in those differently named. As referred to above, the Sufis taught a very high kind of mysticism, but not any higher than that of the Hindus, nor any different from the mysticism of the Christians, both of early and later times. They taught union with God; so do the Hindu and the Christian. They spoke of their wife and their mistress and their concubines or houris; so do mediæval alchemists, and many of the Indian Yogis speak in a similar strain; so that in whatever direction we turn it is found that there is no substantial difference between Islamism and any other religion except in respect to age, and it is really the youngest of all, excepting perhaps the later Christian development found among the Mormons of America or Latter-day Saints. In fact, some Western Theosophists have said that it would be just as well to accept Mormonism as Islamism, since the teachings are identical and the practices are also. The Mormons say that polygamy is not taught, but they practice it; they have their mysticism, their prophecy, their various kinds of frenzy, and among them are many extraordinary examples of prevision, notably with Brigham Young, the second prophet.

Americans might be inclined, if they were about to make a change, to accept their own natural product in preference to an Arabian one. Certainly in regard to morality, honesty, thrift, temperance, and such virtues, the Mormons stand as well as the followers of the Prophet Mohammed. But as we know little about true Islamism, a careful consideration of it will no doubt add to our knowledge and broaden our conceptions, since it must end in our seeing once more that none of the religions of the day are true ones, but that a single body of truth underlying them all must be the religion of the future.

HADJI ERINN.

RIG-VEDA ON GAMBLING.

THE following excellent remarks are probably the oldest in the world upon the vice of gambling. They are found in Rig Veda, x, 34. It is admitted that these Vedic hymns are anterior to the time of Homer and Hesiod. The Hindus claim an antiquity for them which carries us back thousands upon thousands of years prior to the oldest date allowed by European Orientalists. Those who have a theosophical acquaintance with the Vedas will incline to the estimate of the Hindus, inasmuch as European opinion is constantly altering on the subject, and besides has not had quite a century of experience in which to form itself. Muir says these hymns were composed certainly 1000 years before our era, but that is too ridiculously low an estimate and will have ere long to be revised upon further proofs and discoveries. The present hymn is given as showing what was then thought of gambling.

The tumbling airborne products* of the great Vibhidaka tree delight me as they continue to roll upon the dice-board. The exciting dice seem to me like a draught of the soma-plant growing on Mount Miyavat. My wife never quarrelled with me nor depised me; she was kind to me and to my friends. But I for the sake of the partial dice have spurned my devoted spouse. My mother-in-law detests me, my wife rejects me. In my need I find no comforter.

I cannot discover what is the enjoyment of the gambler any more than I can perceive what is the happiness of a worn-out hack horse. Others pay court to the wife of the man whose wealth is coveted by the impetuous dice. His father, mother, brothers cry out, "We know nothing of him; take him away bound!"

When I resolve not to be tormented by them because I am abandoned by my friends who withdraw from me, yet as soon as the brown dice, when they are thrown, make a rattling sound I hasten to their rendezvous like a woman to her paramour. The gamester comes to the assembly glowing in body, asking himself "Shall I win?" The dice inflame his desire by making over his winnings to his opponent. Hooking, piercing, deceitful, vexatious, delighting to torment, the dice dispense transient gifts and again ruin the winner; they appear to the gambler covered with honey. Their troop of fifty-three disports itself, itself disposing men's destinies like the God Savatri whose ordinances never fail. They bow not before the wrath of the fiercest. The king himself makes obeisance to them. They roll downward, they bound upward. Having no hands they overcome him who has. These celestial coals when thrown on the dice-board scorch the heart though cold themselves.

The destitute wife of the gamester is distressed, and so too is the mother of a son who goes she knows not whither. In debt and seeking after money the gambler approaches with trepidation the houses of other people at night. It vexes the gamester to see his own wife and then to observe the wives and happy homes of others. In the morning he yokes the brown horses—the dice; by the time when the fire goes out he has sunk into a degraded wretch. He who is the general of your board, the first king of your troop, to him I stretch forth my ten fingers to the east in reverence. I do not reject wealth, but I declare that which is right when I say:

Never play with dice; practice husbandry; rejoice in thy prosperity, esteeming it sufficient. Be satisfied with thy cattle and thy wife, the god advises.

O dice, be friendly to us and no more bewitch us powerfully with your influence. Let your wrath and hostility abate: let others than we be subject to the fetters of the brown ones, the dice.

TEA TABLE TALK.

THE TALE OF THE FIRST COMPANION.

THERE is a land but little known to men. There, at a point where several roads crossed, three travellers, all journeying to the same goal but by different roads, met and sat down to rest. They were companions, though they had never met before.

After a time, the youngest of these travellers said to the eldest: "Brother, have you ought to tell us of the place where the unseen is seen?"

The old man lifted his head, his eyes burning brightly under his shaggy eyebrows.

"It is the place of darkness where things are made visible", he replied. "Last night I saw there the Angel of the Flames".

"Who is he?" asked the others.

"He is one who stands where the upper heavens divide from the lower heavens, at the point where the manifested world begins. Above all is the one Dark, the Triangle of which the point only is from time to time seen. Then comes the great Triangle of the Upper World (fig. 1): below that the lower, the earth triangle, opens out (fig. 2): and the two together make one (fig. 3); but they disappear, one into the other (fig. 1) when they meet the Dark (fig. 2); for then the two manifested Triangles, the upper and the lower, become one. The earth one glides over and becomes the outer face; the heaven one passes beneath and becomes the inner side. But that is in the Hereafter. Meantime there are the two, thus"—and he drew the figure (fig. 3) again in the sand. "Here the upper and lower manifested touch. Down from the upper heaven come the flames, the lines, surging down along the rays. Thus is the real figure (fig. 4).

At the point there is a vortex, and there stands the Angel of the Flames, with drawn sword. As the flames come down to enter into manifestation, it is through the vortex they must pass before coming where the lower Triangle opens out—the lower world. This is as it is then". He drew again, making this figure (fig. 5). "At the point marked 'V' the Angel of the Flames is seen to stand. As the flames, the souls, come downwards, some shudder at sight of the vortex and would turn back. Others would fly off into the further boundaries, undeterred by "The Ring Pass-Not", which flames, indeed, may overpass. But there is the Angel. He stretches forth his sword, he guides the flames into the vortex; they must descend, and, descending, they become creatures and beings in the lower manifested world, according to their nature and according to their power. Whence, O Companions, have they that nature and that power?"

"From Karma," answered the others. Then all these Companions saluted the name of the Law.

"Thus pass the flames downward; some tremblingly; some slowly but surely; others with hesitation and wavering; and a few with a fierce swift splendor. All must travel the ways of the lower world, all must enter the vortex and, emerging therefrom, must pass through every form of Life, conquering all, ere they mount the further side—the unseen side—of the lower triangle and return to the upper heavens as gods. The Angel is the agent of the Law. The descending flames are given over to his guidance; they must obey. But those who ascend are greater than he; they are the conquerors; he salutes them as they pass; he is blown backwards by the velocity of their upward flight. The passage to the upper heavens is the right of the Flame-Souls who have become men and have achieved perfection."

"How looked this Angel?" the youngest Companion asked.

"Like a column of white fire, stately and glorious; his sword was a seven-tongued, seven-colored flame, shooting forth like an Aurora of the North. His countenance was not a face at all; it was an Eye of deep, dark glory; he was not as men are, but as flaming souls are seen to be in the world of souls."

The third Companion spoke:

"Why was this power given unto him? Is not Karma enough?"

Saluting, the aged traveller answered:

"The Law is All. But manifested agents must be had as its vehicles in manifested worlds. There must be a focus. As there is a vortex, whereby momentum is attained, so there is a guide, by whom direction is maintained. Understand this, however, if you can: the vortex and the guide are one thing. At that point there is but one power, in two forms, to be understood of men. One form is the vortex, the other form is the Angel of the Flames; both are symbols of the one unseen force residing at that point and reigning within the Ring."

The Companions said no more, but all meditated together.

JULIUS.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE THEOSOPHIC THINKER has been started in Bellary, India, by Bro. R. Jagannathiah, and was briefly noticed last month. It deals largely with Puranic lore, and discusses everything from the Hindu or Aryan standpoint, from which its founder thinks it has a claim upon theosophists for help, in all parts of the world, as the Hindus are so poor. The subscription price is very small, being but two rupees a year, with extra postage abroad. Those who wish to forward a good object may very well subscribe. In detail, its objects are to show that there is a scientific basis in the Puranas, to show that those and the Indian literature deal with and give expression to the teachings of the Secret Doctrine, to reconcile the teachings of the Puranas with those of H. P. B. We hope that the magazine will have a success.

THE RAMAYANA OF TULSI DAS, translated from the original Hindi by F. S. Growse, and for a long time out of print, has been reprinted by pundit Kundan-Lal and other members of the Fâtehgarh T. S. in India. There are three volumes of about 250 pages each, paper bound, and the price for the three, which may be ordered from THE PATH, is $1.50. The translation has been commended by competent reviewers as being faithful and animated. This Ramayana is the one which is more popular and more honored by the people of the north-western provinces of India than the Bible by corresponding classes in Europe or America. The other Ramayana is in Sanscrit by Valmiki, and this was written in the vernacular. It has been asserted by certain Indian writers that the sage who wrote the Sanscrit Ramayana reincarnated as the author of this under the name of Tulsi Das. However that may be, the poem has the greatest repute in India, and it would well repay theosophists who like to inquire into Indian religious books to have this Ramayana, as it is in a very convenient form. Purchasers of the work will also benefit the publishers, who have been at considerable expense in getting this book out. All orders should be sent to THE PATH, on the understanding that there may be a slight delay in filling them in consequence of having to send to India for the book. A copy of this work has been put in each of the three libraries at Headquarters.

REINCARNATION, by Dr. Jerome A. Anderson. The appearance of so thorough a treatise by the ablest Theosophical writer in the American Section is an epoch. Perhaps it is unfortunate that the title should not have varied from that of the works by E. D. Walker and Mrs. Besant, as confusion may occur, but the book itself is worthy to rank with them. Its Introduction is on "The Nature and Origin of the Soul"; and the fourteen chapters are: The Physiological Evidence of the Existence of the Soul; The Psychological Evidence of the Existence of the Soul; The Evolution of the Soul; The Individualization of the Soul; Reincarnation—Philosophic and Logical Evidence; Reincarnation—the Scientific Evidence; The Composite Nature of the Soul; The Reincarnating Ego; The Personality; Post-Mortem States of Consciousness; Hypnotism and the Human Soul; Objections to Reincarnation; Karma; Ethical Conclusions. Dr. Anderson's treatment is that of an educated thinker skilled in science and its methods, and he exacts and furnishes the rigorous proof indispensable to an analyst, a scientist, and a logician. Advancing only from point to point as each is demonstrated, the whole work has a flavor of certainty, and the most crisp and felicitous illustrations illuminate the successive propositions. Most of the treatise is admirably clear, parts of Chapter VI being possibly the only exception, and most of it is abundantly convincing. Yet this perhaps cannot be said of the first half of the second paragraph on page 104; nor of the assertion on page 126, "There is no pure matter in the Cosmos, as there is also no pure spirit"; nor of the position on page 134 that a brutal and sensual body proclaims that the Higher Ego has need to evolve opposite qualities, therefore calling for all our sympathy instead of aversion: "It is as though we were to turn shudderingly away from a pure, saintly prisoner because the cell in which he is confined is loathsome". But how does this comport with the first sentence of the paragraph: "It is thus apparent that man's soul and body are each the exact complement [not antipodes] of the other"! "Casual" on page 172 should be "causal". Among the noblest parts of the book are pages 156, 214-218, and the treatment of Ethics. A beautiful spirit of tenderness and devotion and geniality and hope shines through the whole work, and nothing is truer and sweeter than this: "Altruism is the law; compassion, the means; self-sacrifice, the surety, of existence upon the stable spiritual planes of being. (Cloth, $1.00, paper, 50 cents.)—[A. F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI, No. 4, is on "Theosophy and Modern Science", by H. T. Edge. It succinctly states what are the inadequacies of present science (a) its materialism, (b) its method by induction, (c) its divorce from the religious element of human thought; analyzes the "working hypothesis", and shows the contradictions in the Atomic Theory. One quotation from Stallo is particularly fine. The article is valuable because analytically explaining why Theosophy is so cool towards scientific thought, and because giving fact instead of mere denunciation. A reprint from the Theosophist, "The Symbolism in Yagna", follows, and contains much instruction.—[A. F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI, No. 5, gives a lecture before the Adelphi Lodge T. S. by Sapere Aude upon "Death". It states nothing which has not been often stated before, and is not really an addition to our literature, but it is well done, in particular the last paragraph on page 7 and on page 8. Two articles are reprinted from the Theosophist, neither of much consequence.—[A. F.]

MAY LUCIFER. "On the Watch-Tower" is even more interesting than usual. Mr. Mead concludes his paper upon "Nirvana", which, though not perhaps altogether intelligible, is erudite and profound. "The Dream of Ravan" is styled "a mystery", and there does seem difficulty in conceding to it any meaning. A treasure to real Theosophists is the little article of eighteen lines called "Gurus and Chelas" by a Hindu chela. Condensed in it are thoughts and facts which are invaluable, touchstones for correction of many a misconception and error. Mr. John M. Pryse makes a delightful contribution on "Reality in Personal Theosophy", one of those sensible, sound, practical expositions, luminous through anecdote and illustration, which clear up things puzzling to many Theosophists and teach lessons salutary for all. Mrs. Besant's "Death—and After?" concludes with close analysis and exposition of the various possible communications between the earth and other spheres. Mr. Mead begins a review of Max Müller's "Theosophy or Psychological Religion"—[A. F.]

MAY THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XIV" begins a careful analysis of the various possible modes in which Isis Unveiled might have been produced by H. P. B., seven being suggested and the last two considered. One cannot yet forecast the one favored by Col. Olcott, but the whole discussion is absorbingly interesting and raises intricate questions in psychology. No doubt verbal slips and mnemonic lapses are part of the problem in that complex personality, and they have to be considered even when proffered less as a contribution to the problem than as a warning against the undiluted reverence of disciples. No such danger is exemplified in the "Leaves". Mr. E. Desikacharya treats severally the "Aphorisms on Karma" given in March Lucifer and PATH, judging them too familiar in Hindu literature to merit publication as novel.

"Sorcery Mediæval and Modern", by W. R. Old, is somewhat confused at first, but becomes both readable and instructive after the first page.—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHY AND SCHOOLBOYS is an earnest adjuration by O. L. Sarma of Madanapalle that Indian F. T. S., by Branches or as individuals, provide Theosophical schools for the neglected children of that country. This he urges as a conformity to H. P. B's wishes and teachings.

MRS. ANNIE BESANT'S "Death—and After?", originally appearing as a serial in Lucifer, is now issued as Theosophical Manual No. 3. It is a popular exposition of post-mortem states, according to the Esoteric Philosophy now known as Theosophy; a map of the country that lies on the further side of the gateway of Death, and a description of its inhabitants. It sketches the views of the persistence of the soul held by many nations; the perishable and the imperishable parts of man; body, soul, and spirit; the fate of the body; life in death; Death an unrobing of the soul; the moment of death; the astral double; the astral corpse; the region called Kama Loka, the world of spooks, elementaries, and elementals; communications between inhabitants of Kama Loka and persons on earth; the length of stay in Kama Loka of the disembodied soul; the fate of suicides and of persons suddenly killed; earth-walkers; shells; Devachan, or paradise; "illusion"; the life there the real life; effect of earth-life on life in Devachan; working out in Devachan of spiritual and moral causes; the soul in Devachan surrounded by all it loves; Death separates bodies, not souls; love has its roots in Eternity; the return to Earth; Nirvana; communications between the earth and other spheres; different classes of communications. (The PATH; cloth, 35 cents.)

MR. CLAUDE F. WRIGHT'S Theosophy; a Popular Exposition, which the publisher who bought it agreed to issue in May, 1892, has undergone delay after delay, been in the hands of three different printers, suffered from electrotypers, and has now received its coup de grace by the publisher's failure in business. He had always claimed that "the devil was in the book", it being the habit of publishers, as of other men, to seek any other explanation than personal incompetency or sloth. It is unfortunate for the T.S. that it should be involved in the publisher's Karma, but, alas, how often such things happen!

MR. W. T. STEAD, the famous editor of the Review of Reviews, has projected a quarterly magazine called Borderland, to be devoted to the study of phenomena now called "supernatural". Mr. Stead has recently given great thought to problems and experiments of an occult nature, and now wishes a more thorough, systematized, and continuous investigation by regular classes who shall tabulate and report results. Valuable assistance has been procured from two skilled students, and Borderland will chronicle the more important developments, adding a character sketch and a monograph on some branch of occult science. The first issue will be in July, and succeeding ones every quarter thereafter. Single numbers will be eighteen pence.

THE MOSLEM WORLD, Mr. Alex. R. Webb's periodical devoted to the interests of the American Islamic Propaganda, issued its first number in May. It is of sixteen large pages, with admirable type and paper, its first page giving a fine picture of the Cathedral Mosque at Agra, India. Various articles expound and defend Islamism, correct misconceptions, and show the moral contrast between it and Christianity. Very interesting is the description of its mission as elaborated in the "Salutatory"; and the article "The Islamic Propaganda" gives the system of work contemplated, part of it being a free library and reading-room at 458 W. 20th St., N. Y. C. Later will be established free lectures by Indian, Egyptian, and Turkish Missionaries, as well as weekly discussions upon doctrinal and historical subjects. It does not appear probable that any large turning to Mahomedanism will occur in this country and in this age, but it is certainly very nice to see the missionary business reversed. A mosque on Fifth Ave. and a muezzin summoning to Friday prayers would be one of the most delicious spectacles outside of Punch.—[A. F.]

MR. WILLIAM Q. JUDGE'S OCEAN OF THEOSOPHY was issued early in June. It is a very neat book of 154 pages, printing and binding excellent. Its great merit is the extraordinary number of Theosophical topics compactly brought together in so small a space, the analyzed Table of Contents of the seventeen chapters being astonishing. A Preface of one page states in the most straight-forward way why certain subjects receive no treatment and why a tone of conviction as to others is used, but disclaims either authority or originality, proclaiming that no reader is a less good Theosophist because he disagrees from some positions, and that the book but hands on matter taught to the author and verified to him. Very many questions uprising as the student advances in reading receive here a clue to settlement, and he cannot but perceive that the book has behind it a lengthened tuition and a nearness to teachers which impart a very different quality from that in ordinary Theosophical literature. And it is entirely possible that the passages which do not now secure assent may do so in measure when readers shall have reached the stage of the author. At all events, it is well to see them thus presented and so strong an impulsion given to thought on topics of such moment and influence. Nobody can read the work without being instructed, and few can read it once without the purpose to do so again. A misprint on page seventy of "years ago" for "A. D." wrongly dates the Council of Constantinople, but the correct date is given on page sixty-four. (THE PATH; cloth $1.00, paper 50 cents.)—[A. F.]

MR. EDUARD HERRMANN, member of the Aryan T. S., New York, has performed for the Cause the great service of translating into German H. P. B.'s Key to Theosophy. It makes a book of about 220 pages, the print being noticeably clear. At present it is only furnished in paper covers, and the price ($2.00) seems therefore somewhat high, but no better arrangement could be made with the Leipzig publisher. The introduction into the German world of so important a book is a notable matter, one for which the T. S. may well feel grateful to Bro. Herrmann. Copies may be ordered through the PATH.

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI, No. 6, is a wise reprint of two important articles by H, P. B. in Lucifer upon "Psychic and Noetic Action". There are a few places where the thought is somewhat confused or at all events not quite clear, and it is hardly possible that pneuma can be properly translated "Mind", but otherwise these papers are of great value, distinguishing the personal from the individual in man, treating of memory and of mediums, giving clue to the settlement of many questions encountered by students.—[A. F.]

THEOSOPHY, by G. H. Pember, is a solemn effort to show that the ancient Mysteries and modern Theosophy were devised by a personal Satan, who also anticipated the fulfilment of genuine prophecy by arranging a parody in the case of Buddha. Of course the notion itself and the twisted Bible texts used to support it are deliciously comic, and one does not quite understand why the Father of Lies should have invented for his own benefit so sternly moral and devotional a system as the Theosophic; but to a true Evangelical logic and humor are mere carnal phrases. Yet Mr. Pember is of value in this,—that he repeatedly proclaims the astonishing advance of Theosophy in the West, using that fact as clear proof of the near approach of Antichrist and of doomsday, when all but a small coterie of the friends of Jehovah will be engulfed in a precipice “from the abysmal depths of which the groans of their blasted companions ascend”. Not bad that, though still short of the graphic power of Tertullian!—[A. F.]

Mirror of the Movement.

THE THEOSOPHICAL CONGRESS AT CHICAGO. The provisional programme for the discussions at the Congress of the Society at the World's Fair has been made out with the following nine main heads:—1st, Theosophy Defined; 2d, Theosophy Historically Considered; 3d, The Philosophy and Psychology of Theosophy; 4th, Theosophy the Underlying Truth of all the World's Scriptures and Religions; 5th, The Theosophic Movement in its Organized Life; 6th, Theosophy and Modern Social Problems; 7th, Theosophy and Modern Religious Problems; 8th, Theosophy and Ethics; 9th, Theosophy and Science. Under each of these main heads there are subheads, those under No. 3 being eleven in number. The main heads are intended to cover the whole field; the sub-topics will be assigned to speakers as shall appear judicious, and not necessarily in the order given. The whole length of the time for discussion will be from eight to ten hours. The Congress will be on the fifteenth and sixteenth of September, and Mrs. Besant has promised to attend as well as others from abroad. The General Secretary would like to be notified by members who have not received a copy of the first bulletin.

THE CHAPIN AFFAIR newly illustrates the astonishing hold Theosophy has upon the press. Miss Lizzie Chapin of Brooklyn, for ten years teacher in an unsectarian day-school in New York, zealous, successful, and popular, was dismissed by the Directors because a Theosophist. Miss Chapin had never dissolved her connection with the Presbyterian Church or taught Theosophy to the children, and her membership in the T. S. only casually became known. On the following day eight of the New York morning papers contained articles on the subject, some over a column long and that of the Times being given the first place on the first page. The next day's issues followed up the matter, reporters called at the New York and the Brooklyn Headquarters, interviewing also the Directors and a Reverend spy, and the Press printed a cartoon of a pillory wherein stood Dr. Briggs and Miss Chapin, each bearing a placard announcing the offense. Miss Chapin's portrait was also given by the papers. Two other teachers who are Theosophists notified the Board of their own liability to dismissal, Miss Chapin claims the salary due her on the broken contract, the journals state that Col. Ingersoll is to conduct her suit, editorials and private letters pour contempt on the Directors, and—worst of all to those “Christian” women!—the enormous publicity given to the case is throwing a halo around Theosophy and bringing the "disciples of Christ" into disrepute. If the friends of Theosophy had planned together some scheme by which it might be given immense gratuitous advertisement and orthodox intolerance made to appear contemptible and ridiculous, they could hardly have devised anything equal to this. And yet the orthodox furnish it freely, delight in their "zeal for Thine house", and only begin to quake when they find their frightful blunder and how everybody else is grinning at them. Miss Margaret Collins was the Trustee who wrote to discharge Miss Chapin. Collins was the name of the Y. M. C. A. President in Oakland who refused Mrs. Besant his Hall and thereby packed the Opera House. Collins too was the name of an earlier adversary, who attacked H. P. B. and was driven back with loss. Valuable indeed has the family been to the T. S. Surely there must be a scion of it in the Central States who can help things along there as have his cousins on the Pacific and the Atlantic Coast! One single Collins can accomplish for Theosophy what hundreds of Theosophists might vainly attempt. Imagine a representative of the family in each State! A blundering enemy is simply invaluable, and we thank him, bless him,—almost love him. [A. F.]

Mrs. ELIZ. A. KINGSBURY has again visited Vineland, N. J., with missionary intent, and on June 4th and 11th lectured on "The Ministry of Death" and "Christianity viewed in the light of Theosophy". The intensely hot weather kept many away, but the fifty who braved it were repaid, and some inquirers returned for further light.

Mrs. ELIN M. C. WHITE of Seattle lectured on June 19th in Swedish before the Swedes of Jamestown, N. Y., presenting Theosophy to them in their own tongue and by one of their countrywomen. It is among the possibilities that in time a Swedish Branch may be formed there. And this again excites the wish that the Countess Wachtmeister may accompany Mrs. Besant to the States next September.

A SOUTH-WESTERN THEOSOPHIST has presented to the New York Headquarters Reference Library the following books: Hindu, Persian, and Arabic Grammar, Palmer; Tibetan Grammar, Jäschke; Sanscrit Grammar, Edgren; The Dawn of History, C. F. Keary; The Apocryphal New Testament; Natural Inheritance, F. Galton; Dhammapada, (Tibetan version), Rockhill; Hindu Philosophy, Davies; Upanishad, Part II, Max Müller; Sacred Laws of the Aryans, Part I; Manu; Vedanta Sutras, Part I; Bhagavad Gita; Dhammapada; Buddhist Suttas; Saddharma Pundarika. Another friend has presented Max Müller's Upanishad, Part I.

MR. CLAUDE F. WRIGHT is so persuaded of the importance of continuing the Aryan T. S. Sunday evening lectures through the summer that he has offered to be personally responsible for them if the Hall may be used. The lectures secured by him for June were: 4th, Rebirth, Claude F. Wright; 11th, Theosophy not Anti-Christian, Wm. Q. Judge; 18th, Work-a-Day Theosophy, H. Alfred Freeman; 25th, Some Evidences of Theosophy, B. Harding.

BROOKLYN T. S. Sunday evening lectures in June were: 4th, The Dual Man, Leon Landsberg; 11th, Why and How We Think, Dr. A. P. Buchman of Fort Wayne; 18th, The Mission of the Theosophical Society, Claude F. Wright; 25th, The Threshold of the Unknown, S. E. Clarke.

PRANAVA T. S. has dissolved and its members have united with the Arjuna Branch, thus greatly consolidating and strengthening Theosophic life in St.

Louis. A fine large room has been secured exclusively for Branch use at 3100 Olive street on the ground floor, and here will be held the Sunday evening public meetings. Mr. Seth Wheaton has been elected President of the Arjuna, and Mr. Benedict Loevy, 3007 Cass Avenue S., Secretary. The harmony of the late action, together with its wisdom, promises well for the future, and St. Louis has now more hope of energy and growth Theosophically than ever before. The roll of American Branches is reduced to seventy-five.

MRS. ANNIE BESANT'S passage for the States has been taken in the City of Paris, which leaves Southampton Aug. 26th.

KRISHNA T. S., Philadelphia, has secured the use of a large room at 1219 Chestnut street, in connection with two other societies. It will seat from 150 to 200. Much benefit is expected therefrom.

OBITUARY. Mr. Wm. Throckmorton, long time President and then Secretary of the Pranava Branch, St. Louis, relinquished this incarnation on June 7th. Bro. Throckmorton was a Theosophist of the most sincere type, and his convictions gave him support in the long and painful illness he so patiently underwent. In accordance with his expressed wish, his body was cremated on June 8th, and his ashes were sent to the care of the General Secretary at the New York Headquarters, there to be fittingly preserved. As like disposition may be made of their innocuous remains by other Theosophists anxious to rest in death as in life among the Brethren, might it not be well for a chamber in the Headquarters to be arranged as a columbarium, or, if that is impracticable, for a columbarium to be built elsewhere?

THE GENERAL SECRETARY

sailed for England in the City of New York on June 17th, purposing to attend the Annual Convention of the European Section on July 6th and 7th. If his voice sufficiently rallies, Mr. Judge will deliver various lectures in England. Final arrangements respecting Mrs. Besant's address at the Parliament of Religions in Chicago next September will be made during this visit. Towards the close of July Mr. Judge will return to the States.

A THEOSOPHICAL SUMMER REST HOUSE.

MR. MASCHMIDT of the Brooklyn T. S. has practically begun something that has been talked of for a long time, that is, a place in the country where Theosophists may go for rest in the summer at a very cheap rate. He has a farm nine miles from Saratoga, near Corinth. The scenery is beautiful, the farm lying among the hills. It is two miles from the Hudson river. There is a house which has been enlarged and improved; a piano has been furnished and a horse and carriage added to the establishment. It has accommodations for between twenty and thirty persons. Several have already expressed a desire to go there, and some of the New York and Brooklyn members, including Mr. Harding, Mr. Pryse, and Dr. Hyatt, have gone out to help in adding to the improvements by working themselves on the spot. It is intended to have Miss L. Chapin and Miss Bellows take charge, together with Mr. Maschmidt's sisters. The cost of getting there from New York and returning is about $6. The weekly charge for board will be very low. Any Theosophist desiring to obtain information about this or to go, should write to Miss L. Chapin, Maschmidt Farm, Corinth, Saratoga Co., N. Y. The house will be open July 10th, and any applicant must give a notice of at least ten days.

ORIENTAL DEPARTMENT.

THE issues of this department were, in the American Section, suspended temporarily in June, 1891, with No. 12, which completed a year. Lack of funds and also lack of the time required for such work compelled suspension. But as the European Section had then begun its Oriental Department, the work projected was really carried on elsewhere. The second year begins with an issue, in this June, of sixteen pages under a new style as to size of printed page. No obligation having been taken to issue monthly, it is contemplated to have the papers appear less often than during the first year, and, if possible, to devote more space for the present to studies in Oriental religions and thought. "The Game of Knowledge" given in No. 13 is extremely interesting, illustrating as it does the fact that the social life of India is moulded almost entirely on the religion of the country. We believe this is the first time this game has been described in a publication in our language. In subsequent issues I hope to be able to present studies of different Oriental religions in the form of compilations from the best authorities, as our funds will not yet allow the continuance of a salaried pundit in Hindustan.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE,

General Secretary Am. Section. T. S.

PACIFIC COAST.

THE LEAGUE IN TACOMA has been reorganized under the promptings of our Rev. Bro. Copeland, and this has resulted in the obtaining of a hall, 15 x 56 feet, upon the corner of two of the main streets, as a Headquarters. The League has established there a free reading room, open daily from nine A. M. to nine P. M. A large sign in white with gold letters is upon the front of the building, "Theosophical Headquarters". The Branch is out of debt and has funds on hand.

THE DAILY SURF of Santa Cruz, Calif., has subserved Theosophical interests by giving space to five hundred words weekly, thus publishing a summary of several of Mrs. Besant's treatises and a number of Press Scheme articles. Thanks to the editor, Mr. A. A. Taylor, whose paper is among the leading ones in the county and with wide circulation, the article on the Astral Body was much noticed throughout the State, calling forth comment from at least seven journals. May Karma bless him and all other helpers!

THE PACIFIC COAST LECTURER spoke in Oakland, Calif., on May 20th, San Francisco May 28th, Alameda June 3d. Branch, Committee, and other meetings were also attended.

TRIANGLE T. S. of Alameda has changed its meeting time from afternoon to evening and feels the consequent benefit. Regular sessions, held in Red Men's Hall, are open to the public. Help from San Francisco members is given to Triangle, and systematic work is now done.

ARRANGEMENTS ARE BEING PERFECTED to issue the Pacific Theosophist from San Francisco by the Pacific Coast Committee as a monthly. It has been heretofore ably conducted by Bro. F. I. Blodgett of Seattle, but both parties are clear that better work can be done by the transfer and by the fuller reports hereafter possible of work on the Coast. Dr. Jerome A. Anderson will be the Managing Editor, and will conduct it as a purely Theosophical paper.

INCREASE OF INTEREST in Theosophy on the Pacific Coast has so enlarged the work and the impulse to work more that an addition to the Staff at Headquarters has become necessary. The office of Corresponding Secretary has been created, and Mrs. Vera S. Beane has been elected thereto.

SAN DIEGO T. S., formed by the union of the Gautama and Upasana Branches, was chartered on June 1st. The roll of American Branches is thus reduced to seventy-six. The consolidated Branch has taken and furnished a hall in a central location, and the sign "Theosophical Hall and Library" fronts three corners. The Library will be kept open every afternoon. Each Sunday evening is a public meeting, and lectures are given to fair audiences.

AUCKLAND N. Z. For five months past the Auckland Branch has been preparing the way for a visit from Mrs. Cooper-Oakley, by delivering fortnightly Lectures. When Mrs. Oakley therefore arrived on the 3d of May she found the way in a measure prepared, and up to the time of writing has had large audiences at her Lectures. The local clergy, however, view the movement with considerable alarm, and are warning their flocks (ineffectually) against Theosophy, and have descended to the use of gross personalities in the course of their discussion. Mrs. Oakley remains in Auckland until June 4th, when she purposes to go to Dunedin in the South of N. Z.—(Communicated.)

VICTORIAN THEOSOPHIC LEAGUE, Melbourne, Australia. Our visitor Mrs. Cooper-Oakley passed through Melbourne on her way from Adelaide to New Zealand, and on 24th April addressed the members of the League on "The Spiritual Aspect of Theosophy and Occultism". The room was crowded by a very attentive and intelligent audience. Mrs. Oakley's mission has already borne good fruit in a considerable increase of members. "White Lotus Day" was honored by a meeting held at "Maybank", Mrs. Parker's residence, when a choice programme was gone through—an address from the President, and readings which were kindly undertaken by Mr. James Smith, a leading local Spiritualist. The League continues to progress. We are moving into larger quarters on Monday next at Austral Buildings, Collins St., which address please to register.—(Communicated.)

LONDON LETTER.

I have been asked by the Editor of Lucifer to send you a monthly letter on the leading features of the month as illustrative of the progress of thought and organization for which the Theosophical Society is peculiar.

Considerable interest has been excited among us by the recent publication of Max Müller's "Theosophy or Psychological Religion", which, it is pretended by some, is an endorsement more or less direct of the Theosophical doctrines, but which is regarded by others more in the light of an attack upon Esotericism and Occultism as elaborated by H. P. B. Max Müller takes the view that Buddhism has no Esoteric Side and that the Mahatmas of Tibet are nothing more than the "baseless fabric of a vision". Mr. Sinnett has answered the attack in the Nineteenth Century, and further refutations are looked for from our ablest exponents.

The Blavatsky Lodge has lately experienced some crowded meetings, more especially on the occasions of Mrs. Besant's lecture on "Theosophical and Darwinian Evolution" and G. R. S. Mead's "Mystery of Satan". At the close of the latter Edward Maitland gave a brief resumé of his philosophy in its bearing on the office of Satan as the guardian of the outer wall of the Cosmos.

showing how popular ignorance has confused this Satan with the Devil of darkness and negation of being which lies beyond him.

Mrs. Besant, Herbert Burrows, and others continue to keep the main doctrines of Theosophy before the masses, and to judge by the constant enrollment of fresh members and the establishment of new Lodges in England there is after all something in Theosophy which appeals to the British public, all that has been said to the contrary notwithstanding.

Next month I hope to be able to include interesting news of the extension of the Club for working men lately founded by Mr. M. U. Moore, and of a new line of Theosophical propaganda.

REGINALD HODDER.

INDIA.

The Kumbaconum T. S. has embarked upon good work. It intends to print and circulate in India not less than three-thousand pamphlets every month on Theosophical subjects. Any number of copies can be had for circulation from the Secretary by forwarding stamp for every five copies required. They also intend to create a permanent fund to carry on their scheme by means of publishing books. The first of these latter will be Some Thoughts on the Gita, containing twelve lectures on the first four chapters; it is expected to be ready in June. Information about this can be had from M. C. Krishnasamy Iyer, Kumbaconum. Pamphlet No. 3 is upon Our Duties. This is the same Branch which has been publishing many translations of the Upanishads.

EXECUTIVE NOTICE.

THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.

PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
ADYAR, 27th May, 1893

The Managers of the World's Parliament of Religions having granted us permission to present the views and policy of our Society with respect to the questions of Religion and Ethics, on the 15th and 16th September next at Chicago, the undersigned, being prevented by his Asiatic engagements from personally attending, hereby deposes Mr. William Q. Judge, Vice-President T. S., to represent him on that occasion. All steps heretofore taken by Mr. Judge in connection with the said representation, in pursuance of his correspondence with the undersigned, including the formation of Committees, are hereby ratified, and he is fully empowered as the President's substitute to adopt such further measures in the premises as may to him seem necessary. Of course it is to be distinctly understood that nothing shall be said or done by any Delegate or Committee of the Society to identify it, as a body, with any special form of religion, creed, sect, or any religious or ethical teacher or leader; our duty being to affirm and defend its perfect corporate neutrality in these matters.

The undersigned also deposes Mrs. Annie Besant as a special Delegate from the President, to address the meetings in question on behalf of the whole Society, and to convey to them his fervent hope that this truly representative Theosophical assembly of people of all races and religions may result in the spread of that principle of brotherly love and religious tolerance which is the foundation and cornerstone of the Theosophical Society.

The undersigned most earnestly calls upon all Sections, Branches, and willing Fellows of the Society throughout the world to put themselves in correspondence with Mr. Vice-President Judge, and do all that lies within their power to aid him in bringing this very important matter to a successful result.

THE ADEPTS AND MODERN SCIENCE.

MODERN science is a bugbear for many a good Theosophist, causing him to hide his real opinions for fear they should conflict with science. But the latter is an unstable quantity, always shifting its ground, although never devoid of an overbearing assurance, even when it takes back what it had previously asserted. The views of scientific men have frequently been brought forward as a strong objection to the possibility of the existence of Adepts, Masters, Mahatmas, perfected men who have a complete knowledge of all that modern science is endeavoring to discover. Many trembling members of the Society, who do not doubt the Masters and their powers, would fain have those beings make their peace with science, so that the views of nature and man put forward by the Mahatmas might coincide with the ideas of modern investigators. It will be profitable to try to discover what is the attitude of the Adepts towards modern science.

The question was raised quite early in the history of the Society in the correspondence which Mr. Sinnett had with the Adept K. H. in India, and there is in the answers published by Mr. Sinnett in the Occult World enough to indicate clearly what is the attitude of such beings to modern science. That book will often have to be referred to in future years, because the letters given in its pages are valuable in more senses than has been thought; they ought to be studied by every member of the Society, and the ideas contained therein made a part of our mental furniture.

It is evident from the remarks made in the Occult World that the persons to whom the letters were written had a high respect for modern science; that they would have liked to see science convinced of the machinery of the occult Cosmos, with all that that implies; that they thought if modern scientific men could be convinced by extraordinary phenomena or otherwise about the Masters and Theosophy, very beneficial results to the Society would follow. There can be no doubt that if such a convincing were possible the results would have followed, but the hope of convincing our scientists seemed vain, because no way exists to alter the attitude of materialistic modern science except by a complete reform in its methods and theories. This would be a bringing back of ancient thought, and not agreeable to modern men. To pander in any way to science would be impossible to the Masters. They hold the position that if the rules and conclusions of nineteenth century science differ from those of the Lodge of the Brothers, then so much the worse for modern conclusions, as they must all be revised in the future. The radical difference between occult and modern materialistic science is that the former has philanthropy as its basis, whereas the latter has no such basis. Let us now see what can be discovered from the letters written by K. H. to Mr. Sinnett and another.

Mr. Sinnett writes, "The idea I had especially in my mind when I wrote the letter above referred to was that, of all tests of phenomena one could wish for, the best would be the production in our presence in India of a copy of the London Times of that day's date. With such a piece of evidence in my hand, I argued, I would undertake to convert everybody in Simla who was capable of linking two ideas together, to a belief in the possibility of obtaining by occult agency physical results which were beyond the control of modern science". To this he received a reply from K. H., who said: "Precisely because the test of the London newspaper would close the mouths of the sceptics it is inadmissible. See it in what light you will, the world is yet in its first stage of disenthralment, hence unprepared. . . . But as on the one hand science would find itself unable in its present state to account for the wonders given in its name, and on the other the ignorant masses would still be left to view the phenomenon in the light of a miracle, every one who would be thus made a witness to the occurrence would be thrown off his balance and the result would be deplorable." In this is the first indication of the philanthropic basis, although later it is definitely stated. For here we see that the Adepts would not do that which might result in the mental confusion of so many persons as are included in "ignorant masses". He then goes on to say: "Were we to accede to your desires, know you really what consequence would follow in the trail of success? The inexorable shadow which follows all human innovations moves on, yet few are they who are ever conscious of its approach and dangers. What are they then to expect who would offer to the world an innovation which, owing to human ignorance, if believed in will surely be attributed to those dark agencies that two-thirds of humanity believe in and dread as yet?"

Here again we see that Adepts will not do that which, however agreeable to science, extraordinary and interesting in itself, might result in causing the masses once more to consider that they had proof of the agency of devils or other dreaded unseen beings. The object of the Adepts being to increase the knowledge of the greater number and to destroy dogmatism with superstition, they will not do that which would in any way tend to defeat what they have in view. In the letter quoted from, the Adept then goes on to show that the number of persons free from ignorant prejudice and religious bigotry is still very small. It is very true that such an extraordinary thing as the production of the Times in India across several thousand miles of ocean might convince even hundreds of scientific men of the possibility of this being done by a knowledge of law, but their belief would have but little effect on the immense masses of uneducated persons in the West who are still bound up in religious bigotry and prejudice. The Adept hints that "the inexorable shadow that follows all human innovations" would be a sudden blazing forth again of ignorant superstition among the masses, which, gaining force, and sweeping all other men along in the immense current thus generated, the very purpose of the phenomenon would then be negated. On this the Adept writes a little further on, "As for human nature in general, it is the same now as it was a million years ago, prejudice based upon selfishness, a general unwillingness to give up an established order of things for new modes of life and thought—and occult study requires all that and much more—proud and stubborn resistance to truth if it but upsets the previous notion of things: such are the characteristics of the age". "However successful, the danger would be growing proportionately with success", that is, the danger would grow in proportion to the success of the phenomenon produced. "No choice would soon remain but to go on, ever crescendo, or to fall, in this endless struggle with prejudice and ignorance, killed by your own weapons. Test after test would be required and would have to be furnished; every subsequent phenomenon expected to be more marvelous than the preceding one. Your daily remark is that one cannot be expected to believe unless he becomes an eye-witness. Would the lifetime of a man suffice to satisfy the whole world of sceptics? . . . In common with many you blame us for our great secrecy. Yet we know something of human nature, for the experience of long centuries, aye of ages, has taught us. And we know that so long as science has anything to learn, and a shadow of religious dogmatism lingers in the hearts of the multitudes, the world's prejudices have to be conquered step by step, not at a rush." These simple remarks are philosophical, historically accurate, and perfectly true. All spiritualistic mediums know that their visitors require test after test. Even the dabbler in psychic matters is aware that his audience or his friends require a constant increase of phenomena and results, and every earnest student of occultism is aware of the fact that in his own circle there are fifty unbelievers to one believer, and that the believers require that they shall see the same thing over again that others report.

Proceeding with this matter to another letter, the Adept says: "We will be at cross purposes in our correspondence until it has been made entirely plain that occult science has its own methods of research as fixed and arbitrary as the methods of its antithesis, physical science, are in their way. If the latter has its dicta, so also has the former." He then goes on to show that the person desiring to know their science must abide by their rules, and taking his correspondent as an illustration, he says: "You seek all this, and yet, as you say yourself, hitherto you have not found sufficient reasons to even give up your modes of life, directly hostile to such communication". This means of course that scientific men as well as other inquirers must conform to the rules of occult science if they wish to know it, and must themselves change their modes of thought and action. He then goes on to analyze the motives of his correspondent, and these motives would be the same as those impelling science to investigate. They are described to be the desire to have positive proofs of forces in nature unknown to science, the hope to appropriate them, the wish to demonstrate their existence to some others in the West, the ability to contemplate future life as an objective reality built upon knowledge and not faith, and to learn the truth about the Lodge and the Brothers. These motives, he says, are selfish from the standpoint of the Adepts, and this again emphasizes the philanthropy behind occult science. The motives are selfish because, as he says, "The highest aspirations for the welfare of humanity become tainted with selfishness if in the mind of the philanthropist there lurks a shadow of a desire for self-benefit, or a tendency to do injustice, even where these exist unconsciously to himself. Yet you have ever discussed but to put down the idea of a universal brotherhood, questioned its usefulness, and advised to remodel the Theosophical Society on the principle of a college for the special study of occultism".

The Adept makes it very clear that such a proposition could not be entertained, showing once more that the Brotherhood, and not the study of secret laws of nature, is the real object the inner Lodge has in view. Brotherhood as an object is the highest philanthropy, and especially so when connected with science.

In another letter, written after consultation with much higher Adepts, who have never been mentioned and who are utterly unknown even to Theosophists, being too high to be encountered, he takes up the same subject, saying, "In conformity with exact science you define but one cosmic energy, and see no difference between the energy expended by the traveller who pushes aside the bush that obstructs his path and the scientific experimenter who expends an equal amount of energy in setting the pendulum in motion. We do; for we know there is a world of difference between the two. The one uselessly dissipates and scatters force; the other concentrates and stores it; and here please understand that I do not refer to the relative utility of the two, as one might imagine, but only to the fact that in the one case there is brute force flung out without any transmutation of that brute energy into the higher potential form of spiritual dynamics, and in the other there is just that. . . . Now for us poor unknown philanthropists no fact of either of these sciences is interesting except in the degree of its potentiality for moral results, and in the ratio of its usefulness to mankind. And what, in its proud isolation, can be more utterly indifferent to every one and everything, or more bound to nothing but the selfish requisites for its advancement, than this materialistic science of fact? May I ask, then, what have the laws of Faraday, Tyndall, or others to do with philanthropy in their abstract relations with humanity, viewed as an intelligent whole? What care they for man as an isolated atom of this great and harmonious whole, even though they may be sometimes of practical use to him? Cosmic energy is something eternal and incessant; matter is indestructible: and there stand the scientific facts. Doubt them and you are an ignoramus; deny them, a dangerous lunatic, a bigot: pretend to improve upon the theories, an impertinent charlatan. And yet even these scientific facts never suggested any proof to the world of experimenters that nature consciously prefers that matter should be indestructible under organic rather than inorganic forms, and that she works slowly but incessantly towards the realization of this object—the evolution of conscious life out of unconscious material. . . . Still less does exact science perceive that while the building ant, the busy bee, the nidificent bird, accumulates each in its own humble way as much cosmic energy in its potential form as a Hayden, a Plato, or a ploughman turning his furrow. . . . The hunter who kills game for his pleasure or profit, the positivist who applies his intellect to proving that plus multiplied by plus equals minus, are wasting and scattering energy no less than the tiger which springs upon its prey. They all rob nature instead of enriching her, and will all in the degree of their intelligence find themselves accountable. . . . Exact experimental science has nothing to do with morality, virtue, philanthropy—therefore can make no claim upon our help until it blends itself with metaphysics. Being a cold classification of facts outside of man, and existing before and after him, her domain of usefulness ceases for us at the outer boundary of these facts; and whatever the inferences and results for humanity from the materials acquired by her method, she little cares. Therefore as our sphere lies entirely outside of hers,—as far as the path of Uranus is outside the earth's,—we distinctly refuse to be broken on any wheel of her construction. . . . The truths and mysteries of Occultism constitute, indeed, a body of the highest spiritual importance, at once profound and practical for the world at-large, yet it is not as an addition to the tangled mass of theory or speculation that they are being given to you, but for their practical bearing on the interests of mankind.”

We have in these extracts a clear outline of the exact position of the Adepts towards modern science, together with the statement of the reasons why they do not come forth by astounding phenomena to convince the world of their existence. The reason for the refusal is that the world is not ready, but is in such a condition that the end would be obstructed and damage be the result. Their attitude to modern science is that they accept the facts of science wherever they prove the truths of Occultism, but they consider modern science to be materialistic and also devoid of philanthropy. This we must admit to be the case, and as the student who has had experience in these matters knows for himself that the Adepts have the truth and possess a knowledge of nature's laws, he approves of their refusing to come down to science and of their demand that science must rise to them. He also knows that in the course of the cycles the mass of men will have been educated and developed to such a position that a new school, at once religious and scientific, will have possession of the earth and rule among all men who possess civilization.

AN INCIDENT WITH MADAME BLAVATSKY.

I HAD not the felicity of knowing Madame Blavatsky so intimately and familiarly as I would have liked, nevertheless I beg to add my tribute to the memory of that illustrious woman.

In 1878 or 1879 I called at the rooms occupied by Madame Blavatsky in West Forty-Seventh Street. She was holding an informal reception, many people being present. I was received with that charming cordiality which won every fair-minded and disinterested individual who approached this wonderfully gifted woman. We chatted for a few moments when she greeted me, and then walked slowly to one of the windows, lingering there together for a moment or two, when she left me to give her attention to other guests.

I remained alone in this window for perhaps fifteen minutes. I was fully conscious of the assembly, conscious of the hum of conversation, the sound of gentle mirth fell upon my ears, the coming and going of the people were plainly perceptible to my senses, all the incidents of time, place, and circumstances were palpably apparent, real, and in every respect in conformity with the receptions held by any hostess who dispenses hospitality; all the routine of life in the thoroughfares without passed before my eyes in the usual manner, and yet—I knew that “I” stood upon the margin of a stream that flowed freely past where I stood; the ripple of the waters was continuous, soothing, and placid; grasses waved in unison with the murmur of the river; the under-current of insect life mingled with the sighing of the wind; birds twittered and fluttered in the luxuriant foliage; all the voices of nature blended in a harmonious melody that seemed the very soul of silence breathing through a musical cadence that was attuned to sacred themes. All appeared familiar to "myself", and I enjoyed the sensations produced precisely as any individual enjoys any naturally pleasurable sensation. How long my consciousness of this "Soul Sense" continued I know not, possibly fifteen minutes.

Madame returned, smiling, to my side, and I greeted her with "What is it?" She simply replied, in the most matter of fact manner, "That is sacred music. You are on the banks of the Ganges."

While I am of Anglo-Indian origin, my grandmother having been a Hindu, Madame Blavatsky had not been advised of that fact, and I am fully convinced that I was not hypnotized. I attribute the circumstance to her intuitive knowledge of those with whom she came in contact, although I do not doubt that the Indian blood in my composition made me more en rapport with her than I might otherwise have been.

We had a short, pleasant conversation, and she told me, among other things, that I would return to my own. I have become a member of the Theosophical Society, and have indeed returned to my own, as Madame Blavatsky predicted I would; for no sooner had I read the philosophy of the Theosophical doctrine than I recognized that it was what I had believed all my conscious life.

Whenever I visited New York City I sought Madame Blavatsky and found a new charm in each visit. I could not fail to see and appreciate the extraordinary character which she possessed, and I believe her to have been thoroughly in earnest, thoroughly honest, unwaveringly truthful, single-minded, clean of heart, high souled, and of spotless purity.

ASTRAL BODIES AND ASTRAL VOYAGINGS.

THE term "astral body" is very loosely used by the ordinary writer upon occult subjects, and sometimes Theosophists who ought to be better informed in the same manner. Astral body is indifferently applied to the Linga Sarira, or the model upon which the physical body is constructed; to the "thought forms" in which the Adept makes his journeys when he prefers not to use the physical; to the kamic "shells" formed after death from the wreckage, so to speak, of the dead personality; and to all the many varieties of dream-forms, "wraiths", or apparitions. A brief study of these different bodies, such as will be attempted in this paper, will not only serve to urge a more accurate use of their distinguishing names, but will also assist to a better comprehension of the septenary nature of man in some of its aspects.

A good starting-point for analysis will be to remember the theosophic postulate that Consciousness is One, and that the appearance of separate states which it manifests in Nature is caused by the lucidity or density, as it were, of the matter with which it is associated as its vehicle, just as a ray of white light will be colored, or rendered more or less dim, by the color, transparency, or opaqueness of the medium through which it is transmitted.

The Ego of man may be said to represent a unit of consciousness, a vortical or atomic center in the Logos, or Thinking Principle of the Universe, which has evolved to Self-consciousness. This is the result of long and varied experiences in many material bases, which have enabled it at length to realize that its present state differs from past ones, as well as from the consciousness of other entities by which it is environed in Nature. In other words, it has acquired consciousness of consciousness—which constitutes self-consciousness. But in the processes of the evolution of this self-consciousness it has long since passed the point or possibility of directly functioning in the molecular matter of this material plane, because self-consciousness is not possible in a vehicle so dense. Consciousness is too deeply buried in matter to exhibit self-consciousness; therefore this remains a potentiality only, a dim future possibility, to be only fully realized when the Ego, the Pilgrim through the Cycle of Necessity, reaches the Manasic plane with its appropriate substance. This our (Higher) Egos or real Centers of Consciousness have done, and it is for the reason that they are unable to relate themselves directly to matter upon this earth that fleshly bodies and a reflection of themselves, or the Lower Manas, are interposed.

The Higher Ego, the Thinker, the real "I am I", is, then, entirely unrelated to and unable to function upon the Material Plane except through and by means of its reflection in the physical brain, the Lower Manas. But being thus related, it is not only capable of creating for its use a body on the physical plane of matter, but bodies as well upon any of the several planes through which it must pass to reach the physical. This it does by virtue of the creative or constructive force it possesses because of its emanation from the Monadic Source of all creative construction upon any plane of Nature. It is not, therefore, limited to its material form, but can and does create finer, more subtle or ethereal, ones on any of the planes between the physical and that upon which it has its own proper habitation. And it is, then, these various bodies created by it which we have to classify and study in this paper.

The lowest of these, and standing next to the physical in point of grossness or heterogeneity, is the Linga Sarira, or astral double of the body. This is nothing more than a senseless counterpart of the latter which serves as a model in and upon which the physical molecules are aggregated. It can hardly be said that the Higher Ego consciously constructs the Linga Sarira. Its attraction to and brooding presence, under the law of karmic affinities, over the parents at the moment of conception, calls into activity the "lower Builders", or those forces in Nature whose consciousness does not rise to the self-conscious plane. These construct the astral body known as the Linga Sarira, and build within it the physical one under the play of two opposing influences. First there is that of the Higher Ego again seeking incarnation, and bringing with it in the form of "skandhas", or kinetic psychic energy, tendencies to construct a body calculated to best give them expression. But these are met by another karmic stream of purely physical and lower psychic tendencies or impressions derived from the parents under the law of physical heredity. This force unmodified would exactly repeat the form of the parents, as is done so accurately and constantly in the kingdoms below man, and would be hard indeed to overcome were it not already divided against itself by the impossibility of exactly repeating the form of both parents because of their dissimilarities. So a compromise must be the outcome; the form desired by the Higher Ego being modified by the physical line of evolutionary forces, and vice versa.

The Linga Sarira, thus constructed then, is as senseless as far as any higher consciousness is concerned as are the molecules of the physical body when the Lower Manas retires from its active supervision either in sleep or death. During the life of the body it acts as a medium between this and the Life Principle upon one hand, and the Kamic Principle upon the other. For the Universal Life Principle, like the Thinking Principle, is much too subtle to act directly upon physical matter. It first encounters the Linga Sarira and is reflected by this medium into the coarser matter of this plane, being changed by this very reflection and dissociation from the Universal JIVA into the terrestrial Prana, the Vitality or Life upon the material plane. In like manner is the purely spiritual, or direct, or intuitional perception of the Higher Ego changed by its reflection through the Linga Sarira to the physical plane into Sensation, or perception by means of the physical senses. At death its functions of course become nil, and it fades out as the physical body decays. It is the "wraith" often seen in graveyards, for it may exude out of the body either in life or after death. In the latter case it is utterly senseless; no more than a shadowy wisp of vapor; in the former, which often occurs at so-called "spirit" séances, it may become the vehicle for a sort of intelligence reflected into it by the medium from whom it has exuded, or from some of the "sitters" present. In either case it cannot go very far from the body, owing in life to its so largely depriving this of its vitality—of which, as we have noted, it is the vehicle—and in death, to the attraction still exerted by the decaying form.

So intimate is its connection with the body that an injury inflicted upon it is often "repercussed" upon the person from whom it has exuded, thus explaining a seemingly mysterious phenomenon of spiritualism. It is also the agent in another large class of these so-called "spirit" manifestations, such as table-tipping, slate-writing, object-moving, etc. Under the stress of the intense desire for these things, the "medium" will extrude his own Linga Sarira and do them all without the faintest suspicion that it is himself and not some denison of the spirit world anxious to make his presence known. This, of course, is only possible in those natures who, by cultivating their astral faculties at the expense of both the physical and the truly spiritual, have so loosened the attachments between this and the physical body that such separations, in whole or in part, become quite easy of performance. But in the case of the ordinary medium this is done entirely upon the sub-conscious planes of his being, under the stress of his will, and so, being quite unaware of their source, he jumps at the conclusion that the "spirits" are the agents in their production. He is confirmed in his opinion because science refuses to recognize any super-physical intelligences or forces, and answers his demands for an explanation of those which he knows are veritable facts by pooh-poohing their existence, while intimating to the unfortunate but thoroughly honest "medium" that he is a knave, a fool, or a promising candidate for a lunatic asylum. Theosophy alone offers a reasonable and logical explanation for these phenomena, more of which will be reached and accounted for when we take up a class of higher "astral" bodies. The Linga Sarira is universal in nature; everything, whether "organic" or inorganic, has its astral counterpart—its medium for relating it more or less closely with Prana.

The next astral man with which, taking them in an ascending scale, we have to deal has been termed the Kama Rupa, or Body of Desire. Unlike the Linga Sarira, it is only formed after death, and arises in the following manner. The reïncarnation of man's spiritual Triad in a new, purely animal body sets up in the latter a distinct Thinking Principle, possessing potentially all the powers, creative and constructive, appertaining to the True Thinker, the Higher Manas. This, known in Theosophical literature as the Lower Manas, becomes united to Kama, or the lower sensual desires, in its efforts to elevate these to its own plane, for the whole scheme of evolution is viewed by Theosophy as elevating to their own plane of the consciousness of entities "crucified" in matter below them by Hierarchies consciously and intelligently acting from above. It is the direct outcome of an Infinite, Intelligent, and Divine Compassion, and not the result of blind force seeking unconsciously the lines of least resistance, as modern science would fain have us believe. This imparting of its own qualities to Kama enables the latter to create for itself an astral body of greater or lesser vitality and durability according to the degree to which it has received and conquered the Manasic Essence. For, if Manas have conquered in its association with the sensuous desires of Kama, the latter is so weakened by the consequent elevation and transmuting of its essence to Manasic planes that the Kama Rupa will be but a faint, short-lived will-o'-the-wisp; but if Kama conquer, then does the Manasic essence become degraded or "fallen" from its plane, and the Rupa will be proportionately vigorous. But, although possessing enough borrowed or stolen force to construct sub-consciously a body, this Rupa has no Thinking Principle, or "I am I" center of consciousness, within it, and at once sinks to the animal condition of consciousness, even below the higher animals. It drifts helplessly about on the astral plane, drawn hither and thither by currents of desires generated by men. Hence it is a constant element at spiritual séances, and a most dangerous one. For it is but a vile, conscienceless bundle of desires and unsatisfied passions, unconsciously seeking expression upon the material plane, the only one capable of affording this. Drawn to a "circle", it may have a spurious semblance of self-consciousness reflected upon it by the minds of those present, just as a physical corpse may for a time be galvanized into a semblance of life by electricity. Or, perhaps, its condition is more like that of a hypnotized person whose consciousness is also deprived of its synthesizing center by the force of the hypnotizer's will, and who therefore simply reflects whatever is projected into his mind as though it had originated there.

It will at once be apparent how undesirable is traffic with these Kama Rupas in séance rooms. Nothing pure, unselfish, or aspiring can come from such a source, while it is quite possible for a person, and especially so weakly an organized one as a "medium" must be, to have one or more of such entities attach themselves permanently to him. Especially is this to be feared when there is a strong bond of magnetic attraction between the "spook" and the kamic nature of the personality to which it has been thus attracted by similar impure desires.

SANSKRIT DERIVATION OF "AMERICA".*

ACCORDING to Hindu geography the Continent of America was divided into three parts: Southern, Central (including what are now Mexico and the United States), and North America. South America was known by the name of Ramanaka, and is thus called in the Vishnu Purana. The word Ramyaka can be used to derive America from. †This last word means "the beautiful all around".

The Mahabharata describes South Americans as "men of fair complexion and of handsome personage". Central America was known as Heranmayaka, and took its name from a very large river carrying gold. [This may be the Orinoco.] This division was said to contain three mountains, one of gold mines, another of silver mines, and the third of diamonds. One of these mountains was situated near the abode of a famous lady of that land, who was known by the name of "Swyamperbha" or "self-illuminated". Of her the Mahabharata says, "Here lies the permanent abode of that lady the disciple of Sandalia, a famous philosopher, who was dissatisfied with the Vedic teachings and tried to find the way to emancipation by her own yoga". We read of this lady Swyamperbha in Ramayana, where she is described as an enchantress and magician, having her abode somewhere in southern India, and who assisted the Ambassador Sugriva to find the abode of Sita in Ceylon.

S. T. KRISHNAMACHARYA.

Thinking over the name of "America" and being attracted to a philological investigation of the word, I find that it is in fact a Sanscrit one. This does not seem to have been thought of before, and I give it now for the benefit of studious Theosophists as well as Brahmins like myself. Amrâvati is the capital of Indra. From this word is derived or is taken the word Amrâ, i. e., "where the Devas live", which would signify a very beautiful land. According to the rules of Sanscrit grammar the word Amrâ becomes Amrika (or America), i. e. the place of the Devas.

Now if we add to this the hint given by H. P. B. that America is the land of the new race, and if we reflect on the great progress made in America, upon the industry of its inhabitants, their ingenuity and freedom of thought, together with the wealth found in it—for every kind of natural wealth has been discovered in America, this derivation of the name is extremely interesting and will no doubt be instructive to a great many.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

THE name of Keightley is probably as intimately associated with the Theosophical work of H. P. Blavatsky as is that of any other person, and one or other of the two Keightleys has always been working steadily in all parts of the Society's organization. The present article introduces the picture of Bertram Keightley as one of our old friends.

Bertram was born on the fourth of April, 1860, at Birkenhead, England. His father was a solicitor in Liverpool, and he also is a member of the bar. He says that his parents were both influenced to some extent by Swedenborgian thought. His education began at the Charterhouse, a famous school, was then carried on in Germany and France, and finished at Trinity College, Cambridge. There he took the degree of Master of Arts, after mathematical Tripos.

He came into Theosophy quite naturally. Having studied Mesmerism at Cambridge, that led to his reading Eliphas Lévi, and then mediæval mystics and neo-Platonic writers. Later, having read Mr. Sinnett's Esoteric Buddhism and recognizing in it the outline of a system which would coördinate previous study and furnish a complete philosophy, he decided to make the acquaintance of the author. This is another proof of the value of that book. Keightley obtained an introduction to Mr. Sinnett and attended meetings of the local Lodge, and then, early in 1884, was admitted to the Society, together with Archibald Keightley and Mr. and Mrs. Cooper-Oakley, by Col. H. S. Olcott, then in England.

He first met H. P. B. at a special meeting of the London Lodge in Mr. Hood's rooms in Lincoln's Inn, H. P. B. turning up then quite unexpectedly to the astonishment of all, as they supposed her to be in Paris. I may add here that H. P. B. was in Paris just before this meeting, and suddenly informed me that she was ordered to go quickly to the London Lodge, although she was then not feeling well. Brother Keightley spent much of the spring and summer of 1884 in H. P. B.'s company in Paris and England, going with her to Germany. At the same time while in England he met me for the first time, as I was on my way to India.

In 1885 Brother Keightley was Hon. Sec. of the London Lodge until the formation of the Blavatsky Lodge upon the return of H. P. B. to London. In 1887, H. P. B. being sick at Ostende, he went over twice to that city to urge her to come to London and help them, accompanying her back to one of the suburbs of London after the second visit. In the same year he joined with Archibald Keightley and the Countess C. Wachtmeister in forming the celebrated Lansdowne Road household, where H. P. B. lived for a long time. After that he worked with Archibald Keightley, helping H. P. B. on the Secret Doctrine from May, 1887, until its publication.

According to a request made by H. P. B., Brother Keightley came to New York in the fall of 1889, and visited nearly the greater part of the Branches in the United States, attending the Convention at Chicago in 1890 as special delegate, returning in 1890 to Europe. Then a month afterwards, again at H. P. B.'s request, he went to India, where he was elected General Secretary of the Indian Section, which office he has held since then. While in India he visited all parts of it, and some places several times. In 1891 he came for a brief visit to London, after the death of H. P. B., returning to India shortly afterwards, and leaving India again in January, 1893. Being in London in April, 1893, he again travelled to America and was a delegate from the European and Indian Sections at the American Convention of that month. Both Bertram and Archibald Keightley have been thus associated with the Society for several years, and while Archibald has not been in India, where Bertram went so often, he has been in Australia where Bertram never went, and both of them have been several times in America, each having visited not only the Eastern but also the extreme Western Coast of the American continent. Brother Keightley is therefore well known to a great many members, who may like once more to see his face or to show his picture to those who have heard of him. His constitution is strong, his energy very great, and his ability to deal with Theosophical doctrines has never been doubted by those who have heard him speak. As he says himself, no one can tell of the future, so that future he leaves to itself.

SOME LOST CHORDS:

OR ESOTERIC CHRISTIANITY.

THE Prince of Peace was said to have come to bring peace on earth and good-will to men; but since he toiled in agony centuries ago up the steeps of Calvary hill (or rose to the Higher Self) it has been, in the main, one long tragedy. Something the future will greatly mourn and wonder at. In the name of Christ thousands upon thousands have been slaughtered or terrorized, countless treasure has been expended in wars or proselyting, the human family has been full of enmities, and the mind of man dragged in the dust behind the chariot of ignorance and superstition.

Hence to-day a civilization exists in which the precepts of Christ cannot be fully carried out, as even the church admits; and all this has resulted because the letter and not the spirit of his teachings has been followed: or, in other words, because esoteric Christianity has not been comprehended or practiced. The early Christians had been fully warned, for Paul says, II Corinthians, ch. iii, v. 5-6:

Not that we are sufficient of ourselves to account anything as from ourselves, but our sufficiency is from God; who also made us sufficient as ministers of a new covenant; not of the letter, but of the spirit; for the letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life.

And beginning at the twelfth verse of the same chapter, he contrasts the teaching of Moses thus:

Having therefore such a hope, we use great boldness of speech, and are not as Moses, who put a veil upon his face, that the children of Israel should not look steadfastly on the end of that which was passing away; but their minds were hardened; for until this very day at the reading of the old covenant the same veil remaineth unlifted; which veil is done away in Christ. But unto this day whensoever Moses is read, a veil lieth upon their heart. But whensoever it [man, or manas] shall turn to the Lord, the veil is taken away. Now the Lord is the Spirit: and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.

In ch. iv, v. 3. he says:

But and if our gospel is veiled, it is veiled in them that are perishing: in whom the god of this world hath blinded the minds of the unbelieving, that the light [illumination] of the gospel of the Glory of Christ, who is the image of God, should not dawn upon them.

Again in II Timothy, ch. vi, v. 3-4, he says:

For the time will come when they will not endure the sound doctrine; but, having itching ears, will heap to themselves teachers after their own lusts; and will turn away their ears from the truth, and turn aside unto fables.

No Christos, whether Buddha or Jesus, ever committed his teachings to writing. This may have been done by certain of his followers, but their works are valuable only in proportion to their spiritual advancement. The disciples of Jesus, with the exception of Paul, were admittedly ignorant men, having a mixture of the carnal and the spiritual, and Paul himself confessed that he did not have the full knowledge. It therefore follows that the books of the New Testament, even if written by the persons to whom they are ascribed, must contain imperfections and call forth the attack of scientific, historical, and literary criticism. A few of the books are fragmentary and unworthy of serious notice, but the others contain a mixture of exoteric and esoteric teaching. The former is of no value to us as Theosophists, and, if we have no comprehension of the latter, or esoteric teaching, the whole is a stumbling-block, and we can understand why so many cast aside the New Testament as of no value. A man may have a great intellect, yet be as a child so far as intuition is concerned. To him certain books are sealed up.

I do not purpose here to discuss an historical Christ, or the authenticity of the New Testament, but will briefly consider a few of teachings therein as laid down in the books as they now are.

Jesus was born of a holy virgin, Mary, or matter; went into Egypt (the allurements of the physical body); and, having put them under his feet, returned as Christ—"that it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord through the prophet, saying "out of Egypt (the body) did I call my Son'." Being now free from the passions and disturbances of the carnal body and the lower mind, he taught from Jerusalem and round about. His teachings, stripped of the forgeries and conceits of men, were few and simple. He declared, mystically, that he was the Son of God, and that all men were or could become so. He taught in the Sermon on the Mount and elsewhere the doctrine of meekness, purity, and altruism to its fullest extent. The Sermon on the Mount was not delivered until he had fasted and been tempted by the Devil (or lower mind). During this temptation he refused at the promptings of the Devil to show phenomena for unworthy purposes, or lest he should seemingly gratify his own vanity, nor did he later ever show phenomena for the mere love of them. He openly said the people could not understand esoteric truths, so he veiled many of them in parable. To his disciples he said (Mark, iv, v. 11):

Unto you is given the mystery of the kingdom of God; but unto them that are without all things are done in parables.

It did not, however, follow that the disciples always grasped the esoteric meaning, for we find them asking him to explain the parable of the tares of the field (Matthew xiii, v. 36). I conclude from the text that the Sermon on the Mount was given both to the disciples and the multitude. The latter could understand the simple teachings set forth, but they were astonished and could not carry them out, any more than modern society can. The admonition, "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast your pearls before swine", etc., was obviously for the ears of the disciples, and referred to arcane truths. Paul affirms this in I Corinthians, ii:

But we speak God's wisdom in a mystery, even the wisdom that hath been hidden. . . . But unto us God revealed them through the spirit. . . . For who among men knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of the man which is in him? Even so the things of God none knoweth save the Spirit of God. . . . Now the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; and he cannot know them, because they are spiritually judged.

And in the next chapter he continues:

I fed you with milk, not with meat, for ye were not yet able to bear it: nay, not even now are ye able.

And in chapter vii, v. 7, he asserts that all men are not on the same plane, thus:

Yet I would that all men were even as I myself. Howbeit each man hath his own gift from God, one after this manner and another after that.

When Christ stood before the Pharisees and was questioned by an intelligent man, a crafty lawyer, as to the great commandment, he condensed his teaching into a few words.

Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind. This is the great and first commandment. And a second like unto it is this, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments hang the whole law and the prophets.

Paul says, Romans, xiii, 9:

And if there be any other commandment, it is summed up in this word, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

And in Galatians, v, 14:

For the whole law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.

If the two commandments of Christ are exoterically and esoterically followed, they will be found to comprehend and lead to all things.

Of God Christ says there is one God, a Spiritual God, whom no man (the physical senses) hath seen. Paul in I Timothy, vi, 16, speaks of a God "who only hath immortality, dwelling in light unapproachable; whom no man hath seen, nor can see". Neither Christ nor His disciples anywhere speak in favor of the anthropomorphic God of the Old Testament.

Where is God? In His kingdom. Where is His kingdom? "The kingdom of God is within you", says Christ (Luke, xvii, 21). In Romans, x, 8, Paul says:

But what saith it? The word is nigh thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart, that is, the word of faith, which we preach.

And in I Corinthians, iii, 16-17, he says:

For we are God's fellow-workers; ye are God's husbandry, God's building. . . . Know ye not that ye are a temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man destroyeth the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.

Reading again Christ's answer to the lawyer, we shall see that he meant that we should love the Lord within us, or aspire to our seventh principle, Atma, and practice altruism, or regard all men as brothers, in our relations with our fellows. The worship of an anthropomorphic God is limiting and illogical, and the worship of an impersonal power, on the other hand, is something the mind cannot grasp.

As to prayer, Christ did not condemn it, but he enjoined (Matthew, vi:

When thou prayest, enter into thine inner chamber, and having shut the door [to the external senses] pray to thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which is in secret shall recompense thee.

In the Key to Theosophy it is fully shown that He meant by prayer an aspiration or desire unto the highest principle in man, the spiritual spark, the Atma. The passage quoted has been misconstrued by the orthodox for centuries, for they have built costly palaces to pray in, and even pray on the street corners, just as the hypocrites and Gentiles did in the time of Christ.

Christ taught reincarnation in the case of the man born blind and in his reference to John. Paul taught Karma in I Corinthians, iii, 8:

Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one; but each shall receive his own reward according to his own labor.

And in Colossians, iii, 25, where he says:

For he that doeth wrong shall receive again for the wrong that he hath done, and there is no respect of persons.

See also Galatians, v, 7:

For whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap.

Nothing has been so much adduced to the world at large to show the divinity of Christ as the alleged fact that he performed miracles, or contravened the laws of nature. That he did so

Theosophists will respectfully deny, and assert that anyone who has become a Christos has such powers, entirely within the laws of nature, as to perform acts which seem to the ordinary eye wonderful or miraculous. Things which years ago would have been called a miracle, or sorcery, are to-day commonplace: for instance, our great power over the forces of nature, which is as nothing to what will be. The border-line of the mysterious is being daily passed and its field becoming more and more limited, and to-day the scientific or metaphysical mind pays no attention to the word "miracle" in a literal sense. For one, I believe that the so-called miracles of Christ have a spiritual explanation, if the events took place. He never boasted of them, and said of those alleged to be dead that they were not dead. In all ages miracles have been declared, and are said to-day to be performed at the shrines of Roman Catholic saints, etc. The miracles of Apollonius of Tyana, in a gross sense, are as well, if not better proven than those of Christ; and wonderful things are done by Indian Yogis and by Adepts, but they are all within the law of nature. If Christ performed miracles, others did in his day. (See Mark, ix, 38.)

John said unto him, "Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy name, and we forbade him, because he followed not us." But Jesus said, "Forbid him not: for there is no man which shall do a mighty work [or better, who has a mighty power] in my name, and be able to quickly speak evil of me. For he that is not against us is for us."

The same circumstance is repeated in Luke, ix, 49-50, and the answer is the same. Now just before this Jesus was said to have cast out an evil spirit from a child; and his reply above was not only an admission that those on his plane could do like things, but also a plea for toleration. In Acts, viii, we find Simon Magus performing wonders in Samaria, but as to him read the able articles of Mr. Mead in Lucifer, our London magazine.

If you ask why the church has so largely departed from the esoteric doctrine, I answer, Because the Church was founded on Peter. Christ foretold that he would betray him. He did betray him before the crucifixion, and afterwards, for he understood not the inner teaching and taught largely the exoteric doctrine. He sowed dissension among the congregations, and Paul preached against him and Barnabas boldly, but the words of Paul were not understood by the many, and were gradually forgotten. The only reason why Paul stands preëminent among the Apostles is because he knew and taught esoteric Christianity.

A CHINESE STORY OF REINCARNATION.

WANG-SU-IN was the Governor of a province in China, and lived about one thousand years ago. In this province there was a temple in which for years the priests had kept sacred from intrusion a cabinet or box. This box had been closed by a high priest of the temple before his death, which had occurred fifty years previous, with the strict injunction that it should never be opened. The Governor, hearing of this box, conceived the most intense desire to view the contents; this being refused by the priests in charge, he was obliged to use his authority to have it opened, whereupon he discovered a paper within inscribed with a verse giving the number of years since the box was closed, the age and name (Wang-Su-In) of the Governor who now opened the box, and saying that "he who had shut the box was he who opened it". All this was written in Chinese characters or hieroglyphs, so that it left no question as to the identity of the Governor with the Priest who had died fifty years before and who had been able to foresee his next reincarnation. This story and its hero were so well known and so popular among the Chinese that since then the Confucians have some belief in a future state. Confucianism, being a moral philosophy rather than a religion, is of materialistic tendency, and contains no teaching of a future life.

The foregoing is the verse of Chinese characters found written on the paper within the box.

TIGER STORY.

There was a young man who ardently longed for knowledge. His heart was sad, not knowing where to find a Master to lead him to Divine Wisdom. He feared that he might not be able to become the pupil of such a Master should he find one, and perhaps the earth was all too unholy to still contain such wonderful beings. One day he heard a vague story that in a certain mountain there lived a Master whose wisdom was like unto that of a God. But no one could tell him how to reach this Teacher, who was said to live in the deepest recesses of the mountain, and the path which led to Him was surrounded with so many dangers that no human being could possibly pass them all in safety.

The young man was so eager to find a Master that he determined to try, although all was so difficult and uncertain. After weary search he discovered a narrow path almost obscured by long grass. He traversed it patiently until between high hills this path disappeared in a stream which crossed his way. So foul and so terrible was this stream that he dared not risk the crossing, but after a little his strong faith forced him through, and he gained the other shore only to find his further progress checked by thousands of poisonous serpents. Despairing he sat all day on a distant hill, hoping they might disappear, but, alas, the serpents only increased in number. With sorrow he thought he must abandon his noble desire to press on, but he reflected it were neither manly nor righteous to cowardly relinquish his task; rather would he lose his life than give up his search after Divine Wisdom. With invincible determination he pressed through the army of serpents without injury. Elated with his success, he had proceeded but a short distance when from high banks came a thick shower of rocks, any one of which falling on him would kill him. Sad and discouraged, he dared not return for fear of again encountering the army of serpents, so he bravely ventured on and remained uninjured. All these trials over, he hoped to see some traces at least of the Master he sought, but all was silence. At last this unhappy traveller lifted his weary eyes, only to behold advancing on him a tiger of tremendous size. It approached so near there was surely now no escape; he thought, "Is this the end of all my labors, to be torn in pieces by this wild beast?"

Suddenly his intuition awakened. Rushing forward he fearlessly threw his arms around the tiger's neck and cried: "My Master, I know you are my Master". The tiger disappeared, and in his place stood a dignified and holy man, who kindly accepted this earnest seeker as a pupil. The young man eventually became a great Adept through the teaching of this wonderful Master.

LITERARY NOTES.

JUNE LUCIFER. Bertram Keightley's "Necessity for the Study of Metaphysic" is both able and useful, full of nutrition for Theosophists. "Free Will and Karma" by W. Kingsland is a fine paper and with wise distinctions, but the assertion that the unit of consciousness we call "I" is the aggregate and sequence of the cells or molecules of our body is a rather startling dictum of extreme materialism. Dr. Hartmann in "The Foundation of Christian Mysticism" administers a powerful blow to certain metaphysical theologians: "An unconscious God, a God not knowing His own existence, would not be a God." Mrs. Besant's "Theosophy and its Practical Application" is another of those grand articles which uplift one with enthusiasm, especially the first two paragraphs and the bearing of Reincarnation upon the slums. Why is H. T. E. so savage against the Brown-Sequard elixir? Is it worse to put animal matter into the veins than into the stomach? "Karma and Astrology" is a deeply interesting paper by R. B. K. Laheri, though possibly making Karma a trifle mechanical. "The Fourth Dimension", by Herbert Coryn, delights and instructs: it is admirably done. Not so with "Unconscious Development", an apparent effort after striking paradox, really the utterance of absurdity. Fancy "conscious effort towards moral or spiritual progress" as "of no use"! —[A. F.]

THE NEW CALIFORNIAN for June contains two papers of extraordinary merit. "A Brahmanic Legend", Carl Burell, is exquisite, simply exquisite. Dr. Jerome A. Anderson's "Dealings with the Dead" is a clear and close analysis of spiritualistic phenomena, eminently valuable and instructive. Yet many of us must strongly oppose the statement (p. 384) that the consciousness of the physical cells is synthesized in the Atmic Ray, man's Seventh Principle! —[A. F.]

JUNE THEOSOPHIST is a monumental number. "Old Diary Leaves XV" is of such singular, transcendent interest as perhaps to be surpassed by nothing in literature. Col. Olcott gives further details as to the agencies writing by or through H. P. B., one a famous Platonist disincarnated in 1687, others Masters, each distinctly individual, and recognizable by the bodily mannerisms she at the time displayed. Strange, thrilling incidents are told of these various inhabitations, and the reader seems brought closer to Masters than ever before. All this in the unsurpassed diction of Col. Olcott, the grave and the gay alternating, as in the excessively comic story of the kiss and in the pregnant lesson after an anecdote of the Platonist: "So emotions may, like beauty, be sometimes but skin deep. Sins, also: think of that!" What a profound truth is here! Dr. Weisse's analysis of the sources of words used by ten renowned English writers shows that H.P.B. in Isis used 46 classic, 51 Gotho-Germanic, 1 Celtic, and 2 Semitic, almost the same as Dr. Johnson. Herbert Burrows's lecture on "Theosophy and Life" is noble both in its thought and its language, noble enough to be by his old friend and teacher, Mrs. Besant, and strikingly like her in both. "Sorcery—Mediæval and Modern" exhibits abounding faith in talismans and witchcraft, and considers the mediæval laws against witchcraft to be proof of its reality, but it is a readable paper and by no means a mere revival of defunct superstitions. "Modern Indian Magic and Magicians" and "Astrology under the Cæsars" are most interesting, and Mr. Old's White Lotus Day address at Adyar is grand.—[A. F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI, No. 7, is mainly of "Emerson and Theosophy" by P. C. Ward, an intelligent and pains-taking exhibition of likenesses. Then comes a reprint of the Theosophist article, "The Qualifications needed for Practical Occultism", an article of enormous value as clearly stating the exactions indispensable to every one before beginning the first exercises of a real training.—[A. F.]

OCCULTISM, Mr. Joseph M. Wade's new monthly, dispels none of the misgivings aroused by its prospectus. It is a meandering rivulet of words, quite without any definite purpose or meaning, and free from the restraints of grammar. An opening ode to "The Deity" is said to have been "done in the astral", and certainly its indifference to metrical structure is unlike anything in terrestrial spheres. The Theosophical Society seems to be the bête noire of Mr. Wade, possibly because of its stress on intelligibility and sound sense. Occultism impresses one as a sickly babe, with several symptoms of paresis, and its parent most truly predicts on page 20, "This magazine will never grow old."—[A. F.]

THEOSOPHY AND CHRISTIANITY is a reprint by Atma T. S., New Haven, Conn., of Branch Paper No. 29 by Rev. Wm. E. Copeland, F. T. S. It refutes the notions that Theosophy is hostile to genuine Christianity and that members of the Theosophical Society need to abandon their churches and religious rites. Coming from a minister it has the more cogency, and its diffusion through religious circles will help to set right a very common error. (For sale by PATH, or M. S. "H.P.B." T.S. Sunday evening lectures in July were: 2d, History of the Soul, B. Harding; 9th, Is Theosophy Practical?, Geo., D. Ayers; 16th, Concentration, Claude F. Wright; 23d, A.B.C. of Theosophy, H. T. Patterson; 30th, Harmony, Miss A. M. Stabler.

THE PROGRAM for the Theosophical days in the Parliament of Religions at Chicago in September has been sent out with the Forum in order that it may reach all F.T.S. in good standing, and is given at end of PATH. One thousand copies have been sent to the Adyar Headquarters for distribution, and twelve hundred to the Headquarters in London.

BLAVATSKY T. S., Washington, D. C., has elected Mr. Geo. M. Coffin as President and as Secretary Mrs. Marie A. Watson, 413 G st., N. W. There is a slight improvement in the condition of Mr. J. Guilford White, who has been for weeks so dangerously ill. Mr. White has been not only the devoted President of the Branch, but for long time a most faithful and earnest worker. The loss by death of Capt. Boush and Mrs. Carey is serious, yet prompts to more zeal in those left.

WORK AT CHICAGO Headquarters goes steadily on in spite of warm weather and numerous "counter attractions". Attendance at Branch meetings and Sunday evening lectures continues good, while even a perceptible increase of enthusiasm is manifested. One of the pleasantest features of the summer is the coming among us of so many members from outside points. Toledo, O., has sent several, among them its Branch President, Brother Wheeler, and his wife. Mrs. Manning of Minneapolis was with us several days, and lectured Sunday, June 25th, on the "Universal Brotherhood of Man". July 3d a conversazione was held at Headquarters, when visiting Theosophists from many centers were present. Among our guests were friendly natives of Ceylon and four Hindus. Chicago cordially invites to its Headquarters and meetings all members and friends who may hereafter visit the city.

A DAYTON BROTHER has arranged for a Theosophical badge in form of a button with shank, which may be put in a button-hole on the coat. It is simply the seal of the Society, neatly made and colored, of course without the motto. The price thereof will be $1.50, and it may be ordered from the PATH. It is purposed also to make the badge as a pin for women and as a charm for watch-chains.

PACIFIC COAST.

DR. GRIFFITHS arrived in Portland, Or., June 15th. He was met at the dock by a number of Brothers and given a cordial welcome. Branch and private meetings were held; and public lectures given in auditorium of A.O.U. W. Block, June 20th and 25th. Large audiences and full press reports. The Oregonian printed a column interview. Great interest was manifested at the Lectures. At the last one, "Conclusions upon Reincarnation" was the subject. Written questions were answered after the lecture. It was 10:45 o'clock when the audience dispersed. The Willamette Branch has done good work in Portland. Wherever and whenever a local Branch does persistent and good work, good audiences in number and intelligence invariably attend lectures given by speakers from afar. A general lecture on Theosophy was given by Dr. Griffiths in Vancouver, Wash., June 27th. The mayor, the Superintendent of Public Instruction, and the two editors of the local press attended. After the lecture the mayor remained and was introduced to the lecturer, saying he had read Theosophical literature and was interested in Theosophy. A party of Theosophists from Portland accompanied the Lecturer to Vancouver and formed the acquaintance of many present with a view of carrying on the work begun by Dr. Griffiths. Routes and dates for a Willamette Valley tour had been arranged by the Pacific Coast Lecturer, but upon the eve of starting he received a telegram from home stating his daughter was dangerously ill with typhoid fever, and for him to return to San Francisco at once. Thus the Willamette Valley trip is deferred for the present, to be taken a little later.

SAN FRANCISCO T. S. has just added five new members to its roll, present number being twenty-three. Excellent work is being done, and the new additions to membership are a proof.

PUBLIC LECTURES have been delivered at Headquarters by Mrs. Sarah A. Harris on The Astral, Mrs. Vera S. Beane on Man, Abbott B. Clark on Theosophy, and Miss Marie A. Walsh on The Progress of Theosophy.

SAN DIEGO T. S., formed by uniting Gautama and Upasana Branches, has elected as President Sidney Thomas, and as Secretary Eli T. Blackmer, 1232 F. street.

LONDON LETTER.

The American General Secretary, Bro. Judge, arrived at Southampton June 24th, where Dr. and Mrs. A. Keightley met him, and he got to Headquarters on the evening of the same day. The most interesting object he brought is the original precipitation upon white satin by H. P. B. which Col. Olcott has described in "Diary Leaves". It was given by Gen. Lippitt, to whom H. P. B. gave it, to Annie Besant, and Bro. Judge brought it over, after keeping it a while to show his friends. It will probably be hung upon the wall in H. P. B.'s room at 19 Avenue Road. We all supposed that Bro. Judge's voice would not permit any talking and certainly no speeches, but were delighted to note a great improvement.

Blavatsky Lodge met as usual on June 9th, the subject being Adepts as Facts and Ideals. This is the title, slightly altered, of a recent article in the PATH. Annie Besant discussed it at the meeting, which was literally packed. Bertram Keightley and George Mead followed her, and then Bro. Judge spoke for half an hour as Chairman on closing the meeting.

On Saturdays members of the B. T. S. who desire to study meet in the Hall, as the regular meetings are too crowded by the public. Whenever Annie Besant is to speak, then each member gives away so many tickets that there is always a larger audience than the Hall will hold.

A working man's club started by Bro. M. U. Moore and now self-sustaining exists near by in Henry Street. It is called the Lotus Club. No liquors are permitted; they have billiards and other games, and a piano. It is generally crowded.

A Hindu lectured in London just before Convention at Essex Hall, attempting to belittle Theosophy. His name is Nagarka, of Bombay. Being a member of the Brahma Somaj, he could not well go very hard against Theosophy, and only succeeded in showing that the latter had really a good hold on India. Bro. Geo. Mead was given the platform at the close, and really turned the meeting into a Theosophical one.

The PATH prophecy about the Queen's death has had confirmation from a clairvoyant, who on examining the palm of the Prince of Wales said his mother would die at the date as given by the Hindu correspondent of the PATH.

New lodges have been formed from centres at the following places; Middlebury, Edinburgh, Bristol, Bow. At Bow the Working Girls' Club is still in good order and doing well. There is no change in the general arrangements of the Avenue Road Headquarters, and everything seems full of the interest and activity inspired by H. P. B.

Bro. Judge spoke at the meeting of the Blavatsky Lodge preceding the Convention on the subject of Theosophy and Spiritualism, on which I believe he has lectured in New York. He said among other things that it was a pity that the misuse of the term spiritualism by those who had run after mediums had made it necessary for theosophists not to use the name, but that it was a good one and that Theosophy was in fact real spiritualism.

Decoration of the ceiling of the B. T. S. Hall has been done by Bro. Machell, who painted many allegorical scenes and figures upon the wooden roof. It is very effective. The next improvement will have to be a larger hall and better ventilation.

A traveling van under charge of Bro. Campbell assisted by Reginald Hodder has started for the South Coast. It will carry Theosophical literature, the two members in charge will talk Theosophy to all as they go on, and good is expected to result. If the U.S. were not so wide the same thing might be done there. This work takes a good deal of courage to perform.

The precipitated picture on satin made in 1874-75 in Philadelphia by H.P.B. and then given by her to Gen. F. J. Lippitt was brought to London by Bro. Judge, as Gen. Lippitt had presented it to Mrs. Besant. It has been very fully described by Col. Olcott in "Old Diary Leaves" for the month of June, 1892, in Theosophist. The picture now hangs in H. P. B.'s old room at 19 Avenue Road, and though eighteen years old shows but slight traces of change in color or brilliancy. It is a remarkable object because of the manner in which it was made.

THE WITNESS.

CONVENTION EUROPEAN SECTION.

The Third Annual Convention of the European Section assembled in the Hall of the Blavatsky T. S. in London at 10 a.m., July 6th. Bro. G. R. S. Mead as General Secretary called the meeting to order and organized the Convention by calling for delegates and proxies. Bro. Mead was made Secretary, with Bros. Hargrave and H. T. Edge as Assistants.

Brother B. Keightley represented India, Bro. W. Q. Judge America, two from Spain, Xifre and Roviralto; Dunlap, Wing, and Russell from Ireland, Mesdames Meulman and de Neufville from Holland, M. Coulomb from France, Count A. Wachtmeister answered for Sweden. England was fully represented by the various members of English lodges, and Scotland sent its delegates also. Mrs. L. A. Off from Los Angeles, Calif., was also present as a visitor. The meeting therefore in its members presented a wide field of theosophical activity. Blavatsky T.S. had thirteen votes and Sweden ten votes, those two being the two largest bodies.

Bro. William Q. Judge, Vice-President T.S., was elected Chairman of the Convention. On taking the chair he drew attention to the idea of unity, so that the Convention should not consider itself as acting only for Europe; and also said that thought should be given to the best method of activity for the next twelve months. A telegram was read from Col. Olcott, the President, reading :

Best wishes for a successful Convention.

The General Secretary then read his Annual Report. It showed great activity. Of books, magazines, and pamphlets, the record is 240 in all: seventeen in English, eleven new pamphlets; seven in Swedish; five Dutch; six translations in Dutch; one in Italian; seven in German; two Bohemian; five in French; four in Spanish. The total number of lodge meetings was about two thousand in all or more. Annie Besant delivered during the year 223 lectures, including those in the United States.

The meetings of the first day were all crowded and lively interest was shown.

A subscription was opened for expenses of the Chicago Theosophical Religious Congress, and some $450 were subscribed. The following persons were appointed to represent the European Section at Chicago: Annie Besant, Miss F. H. Muller, B. Keightley, H. Burrows, to act in case they can attend. Mrs. Besant and Miss Muller are pretty sure of coming. Very great interest was shown on this subject.

A debate took place on the question of voting on general T.S. questions, and it was recommended that the alternative system, called Hare's, be used. Delegates from different points of Europe addressed the Convention in French and Spanish.

A photograph was taken in the garden of No. 17 of nearly all present. The second day's sessions were two in number, and just as crowded as the first, notwithstanding great heat. At 4:30 the chairman, Bro. Judge, brought the meetings to a close and dwelt upon the need for harmony, and adjured the Section to avoid "red tape" or else they would cramp all effort. He also spoke of dogmatism, advising against it, but warning them not to speak of it as existing when it did not prevail, for if they did that would produce it. He had not found it, but saw the contrary, and advised all not to mistake earnestness, devotion, and loyalty for dogmatism. Private meetings were then held and preparation made for the public meeting in the city.

PRINCE'S HALL MEETING. At 8:30 p.m., July 7, a large public meeting was held at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, Bro. Judge in the chair. The speakers were the chairman, Bro. Mead, A. P. Sinnett, Bro. Burrows, Dr. A. Keightley, B. Keightley, and Annie Besant. The first gave an account of some of our work: Mr. Sinnett dwelt on the new instruments for Science found in the inner faculties of man; Mr. Burrows paid a tribute to H.P.B. and denied that Science had given its last word; Dr. Keightley spoke of the conditions of life, including something on Karma and Reincarnation; B. Keightley took up Ideals; and Mrs. Besant closed with a magnificent address, showing that Science would lead us, on its own admission, only to death by ice or fire, with selfishness over all, but that Theosophy upheld the immortality of man. The hall was completely filled, although the evening was intensely hot and the attraction of illuminations on the marriage of the Prince's son were all about that part of London. This gave the finale to the convention meetings and proved that the movement is marching steadily forward every year. Harmony and energy marked all the meetings and discussions.

THEOSOPHICAL CONGRESS AT WORLD'S FAIR.

PROGRAM AND OUTLINE OF TOPICS.

The seven divisions of the subject are intended to cover the whole field. The sub-topics will be assigned as shall appear judicious, and not necessarily in the order given. The whole length of time for discussion will be from eight to ten hours. The sessions will be held in the Art Memorial Building in the Park on the Lake Front, September, 15—16, 1893.

I.—THEOSOPHY DEFINED.

1. The Theosophical Doctrine of the Unity of all Spiritual Beings.
2. The Eternal Unity of Spirit and Matter.
3. Theosophy as a System of Truths, discoverable and verifiable by perfected men.
4. These truths are preserved in their purity by the Great Brotherhood of Initiates, the Masters of Wisdom, who promulgate them more and more fully as the evolution of man permits.

II.—THEOSOPHY HISTORICALLY CONSIDERED AS THE UNDERLYING TRUTH OF ALL THE WORLD'S SCRIPTURES, RELIGIONS, AND PHILOSOPHIES.

1. As found in the Sacred Books of the East.
2. As found in the Hebrew Books and in the New Testament of the Christians.
3. As found in Greek and Gnostic Philosophy.
4. As found in European Mediæval Philosophy.
5. Esotericism in European Mysticism.
6. Esotericism in Religions.
7. Links between Religion and Science.
8. Revelation not a special property of any one religion.
9. The Secret Doctrine and its Guardians.

III.—THE PHILOSOPHY AND PSYCHOLOGY OF THEOSOPHY.

1. The Cosmos Septenary in its Constitution.
2. Man, the Mirror of the Cosmos and Thinker.
3. The Inner and the Outer Man.
4. States of Consciousness.
5. Evolution of the Soul.
6. Karma, the Law of Causation, of Justice, and Adjustment of Effects.
7. Reincarnation of the Soul a Law of Nature.
8. The doctrine of Universal Brotherhood as a fact in Nature.
9. The Theosophical View of Death.
10. Man a Sevenfold-Being, thus corresponding to the Cosmos.

IV.—THE THEOSOPHICAL MOVEMENT IN ITS ORGANIZED LIFE.

1. The Objects of the Theosophical Society.
2. Its relation to Civic Affairs and Education.
3. The Mission of the Theosophical Society.
4. The Constituted Methods of Admission and Work; the conduct of Branches and their Autonomy; Propaganda.
5. The Society absolutely Unsectarian, without a creed and open to persons of all faiths. Acceptance of doctrines largely taught in Theosophical Literature not incumbent; Universal Brotherhood the only theory required to be embraced.

V.—THEOSOPHY AND MODERN SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

1. Its insistence on Justice and Unselfishness as the basis of Community Life.
2. Its doctrine of Evolutionary Reincarnation as applied to the Sexes.
3. Its claim that social evils have their roots in mental faults, and that in addition to legislative, educational, and social improvements, the truths and laws of being must be taught for the fundamental regeneration of Society, and the recognition of Karma and Reincarnation must be made the basis of concerted public as well as private efforts.

VI.—THEOSOPHY AND SCIENCE.

1. Theosophy hostile to Science only when Materialistic, when it repudiates all spheres and processes other than physical, or denies the reality of Soul and Spirit and the Unseen Universe.
2. Theosophy as a Universal Philosophy appropriates all Spheres of Being, and claims a scientific investigation of each.

3. Modern Science held to be hopeful when it adds to its intense minuteness that recognition of hyper-physical forces which made Ancient Science so incomparably grander, more copious and exact.

VII.—THEOSOPHY AND ETHICS.

1. The foundation of duty in the fact of the Divine Nature in Man.
2. Altruism incumbent because of common origin, common training, common interests, common destiny, and indivisible unity.
3. The sanction of Right Ethics found in Universal Brotherhood as a fact and not merely a sentiment; enforcement of Right Ethics found in the power which the knowledge of Karma and Reincarnation has on the individual.
4. Theosophy offers no new system of Right Ethics, since Right Ethics do not vary but are always the same as taught by all great Religious Teachers.

Further information regarding the Theosophical Congress may be obtained by addressing Mr. Wm. Q. Judge, Chairman of the Advisory Council, 144 Madison Avenue, New York; Mr. Geo. E. Wright, Chairman of the Committee on Organization, Room 48 Athenæum Building, Chicago; or Mrs. M. M. Thirds, Secretary of the Central States Committee, Room 48 Athenæum Building, Chicago.

BRAHMIN AT THE PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.

Theosophists have everywhere greatly desired the presence at the Parliament of Religions, World's Fair, Chicago, September 15th and 16th, of a high-caste Brahmin as a representative of Brahmanism. Arrangements have been made whereby Mr. Ganendra Nath Chakravarti, Professor of Mathematics, a man of fine presence, high education, and fluent command of English, and an earnest Theosophist, will accompany Mrs. Besant to Chicago, and in his address to the Parliament correct current misconceptions of Brahmanism, Theosophy, and the T.S.

As the expense of Prof. Chakravarti's visit must be met by Theosophists in Europe and America, I earnestly invite our members to send to me whatever they can spare for this object. Such great advantages to better knowledge of Eastern Philosophy, and, in particular, to the status and welfare of the Theosophical Society and Cause, are ensured by this step that I think the occasion well meriting the participation of all brethren.

As it was necessary to borrow a part of the needed money in order that Prof. Chakravarti might sail in time, I am anxious for speedy response that this may be repaid and the remainder ensured. Friends will kindly send their gifts to me.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE, Gen. Sec.

SUPPORT OF THE T. S.

Below I submit report of the progress of the Fund up to and including July 15, 1893.

Subscribers in the 10c.-per-month Class:—A. M. S., C. A. H., E. W. P., C. M. C., and L. B. S. Total, 50 cents per month. $6.00 per year.

Subscribers in the 25c.-per-month Class:—P. S., L. S., O. K. K., E. W. P., H. H., C. T., A. C. F. T., A. E. P. Total, $2.00 per month. $24.00 per year.

Subscribers in the 50c.-per-month Class:—M. E. H., J. F. L., S. P. C., E. M., S. F. H., A. H. P. Total, $3.00 per month. $36.00 per year.

Subscribers in the $1.-per-month Class:—M. H. B., F. B. D., W. H. T., C. H. M., S. W. C., J. C. H., R. W., (not limited), J. H. C., G. B. H., B. W., W. H. W., J. A. J., S. E. W., M. J. B. Total $14.00 per month. $168.00 per year.

Subscribers in the $2-per-month Class:—J.M.G.W. Total, per year, $24.00
 Subscribers in the $3-per-month Class:—J.D.B., C.T., G.E.H. Total, $9.00 per month. $108.00 per year.

Subscriber at $10 per Quarter:—J.F.Mc.E. Total, per year, $40.00.

Subscribers in the $10-per-month Class:—C.H.L., D.D.C. Total, $20.00 per month. $240.00 per year.

Total Subscribers to Fund, 40. Grand Total pledged per year, $646.00.

While it is very gratifying to be able to make as good a showing as the above at this time, I wish to state that there is still plenty of room in all of the classes for every Member, and I hope that many more of them will avail themselves of the opportunity to contribute their mites to the great Cause. Please bear in mind that the amount pledged cuts very little figure. Of course large subscriptions are always very welcome, but subscriptions at but ten cents per month are just as gladly received, and are as conclusive evidence of your good-will.

Presidents and Secretaries of Branches are requested to bring the matter before their members at an early date. I believe that every member will join us, if the matter is once properly presented to his notice.

My thanks are especially due to Bro. C.T. and other members of the Providence T.S. They have taken hold of the matter there in earnest, and I expect to enroll every member of the Branch.

For the information of intending subscribers, I wish to state that all payments are to be made to me at Dayton, Ohio. Accounts are accurately kept, and remittances made to Headquarters monthly.

G. E. Harter, 247 Green st., Dayton, Ohio.

THE THEOSOPHICAL BOOK EXCHANGE.

This is a work which was for some years carried on by Brother F. W d'Evelyn in Glasgow, Scotland, where he was the Secretary of the Centre, and which he now continues in London. The Theosophical Book Exchange is designed to provide members of the Theosophical Society with a medium through which to sell, exchange, or buy literature relating to Theosophy, Occultism, and kindred subjects, many of the best books on which subjects, being old or out of print, are unprocurable except at second hand.

Hundreds of books have changed hands through the Exchange, the value of the business done during two months this year being over £30. Brother d'Evelyn makes no charge for his services, and earnestly invites co-operation on the part of those who have surplus books in their libraries to assist in the spread of Theosophical literature. He will be glad to receive lists of books, etc. wanted or for sale, in any language, ancient or modern. (Lists should state price wanted and price when new. Postage always to be included.)

Bro. d'Evelyn's list post-free. Address: 77 St. Dunstan's Road, West Kensington, London, England.

Matter having passed through millions of forms has acquired an irresistible tendency to seek for an ideal form constructed by intelligent thought.—The Shaman's Book.

ASTRAL BODIES AND ASTRAL VOYAGINGS.

(Concluded.)

THE third Astral form with which we have to deal in studying these productions arising out of the composite nature of man, is the most terrible of all. It is at once apparent that when, in speaking of the persistence or impermanency of the Kama Rupa, it was pointed out that this depended upon the extent to which the Manasic essence succeeded in transmuting the kamic or permitted itself to become tainted with the desires of Kama, that there was a possibility of the whole of the reflected Lower Manas being dragged down to the kamic plane. That this is a real danger to every human being is a true and terrifying fact in nature. When it unfortunately occurs, the astral body of such an entity, though differing in degree only from the Kama Rupa proper, has enough distinguishing characteristics to entitle it to a separate place. It belongs to a distinct genus in this; that it has dropped out of the evolutionary impulse altogether, has no part in the general advance upon the human plane, and constitutes truly a "lost soul". It retains all of that reflected feeling of "I am I" which, though an illusion, is yet at the base of our earthly personalities. Consequently this entity has a feeling of personality as strong as while living; can think, act, and generate karma; can even reincarnate as a human monster, and is the source of many of those cases of true obsession which so largely help to fill that flower of our modern "intellectual" civilization—the insane asylum. It can and sometimes does relate occurrences of its past earth-life quite accurately, although its love of evil is so great that it nearly always resorts to falsehood, even in this particular. No one can have attended many spiritualistic séances without noticing how largely suicides and accidental deaths preponderate when genuine communications are had. For there are no accidents in nature, and those who are cut off in their prime, while not all by any means lost souls, are so cut off because of causes they themselves have generated, and with such there is, on account of the large amount of vitality suddenly transferred from the physical to their astral form (not to the Linga Sarira, but to the Kama Rupa), an intense desire to resume their earthly habits and occupations, and which only very slowly fades out. Such, together with really "lost souls", become "guides" to their poor mediums—in reality obsessing vampires, destroying both moral tone and physical vitality in their unfortunate victims. The "guide" of such an one, with whom the writer was at one time familiar, admitted to his intimates that he had been a pirate, although on ordinary occasions he was wont to parade as an examiner! In discussing his probable nature with a friend in the privacy of his office, the writer characterized the "guide" as a vampire, which fact was promptly reported to him at the next time he saw the medium; thus showing that these evil entities are entities, and not phantoms of the imagination, as materialists would fain classify them.

In taking up the next class of astral forms we have at length reached a more agreeable portion of our subject, where we no longer deal with the denizens of the lowest astral realms. For there the creative work of Manas was at best a blind, sub-conscious groping, so far below its own state had its essence become buried, even before reaching the physical plane. But now we come to a series of Thought Forms, ranging from those still sub-consciously constructed, as in dream, to the Mayavi Rupa of the Adept, which he consciously creates, endows it with the necessary qualities, and transports it wheresoever he wills with the rapidity of thought. Perhaps the very faintest, most fleeting, of these forms are those creations by means of which we dramatize our thoughts in ordinary dream. For, when not viewing actual scenes in the Astral Light, which can only happen when the consciousness is partially or wholly awake on this plane, one only sees his own creations. It is true these creations are "subjective", so-called, but modern philosophy is fast beginning to realize that the subjective to the perceiver is a great deal more real than the objective. These dream creations of ours are actual entities, capable of functioning so long as our will holds them in existence, just as an universe objectivises itself so long as the great Cosmic will falters not nor wearies in its manvantaric projection. A step higher than these are those forms—true Mayavi Rupas—which the soul creates for itself when it abandons the body during sleep. For clothed in one of these, it can travel immense distances from the physical form without the danger to this which would result, should the Linga Sarira be attempted to be used. As the consciousness begins to awaken in these forms and upon these planes, there is often the memory of persons and places brought back and impressed upon the physical brain with sufficient distinctness to be remembered and recognised when awake. Thus the father of the writer dreamed that he was travelling along a familiar road until he came to and passed far beyond any point he had ever reached when awake. While exploring this to him new territory, he came to an object he had never before seen—a corduroy bridge. This novelty so impressed him that he vividly remembered the supposed dream. It chanced that sometime thereafter he removed from that State, and by the road he had taken when dreaming. At the point at which he dreamed he had seen the strange structure he found the bridge, exactly as he had seen it while dreaming.

To these semi-conscious dream forms we have to relegate those "wraiths" of the dying which appear so often to a distant person at the moment of death. For the consciousness of all of these dream forms is derived from the lower Manas, which has to win self-consciousness upon any plane before its consciousness upon it is anything more than a confused, uncertain dream. This self-consciousness has been partly gained in the case of clairvoyants, who actually visit other places clothed in these thought forms, when their physical descriptions are really accurate. Of course ordinary clairvoyance is simply seeing upon the astral plane by those who have evolved the power to transfer their self-consciousness to their astral organs, but there is a kind of clairvoyance which uses these forms, and which approaches somewhat the true Mayavi Rupa of the Adept.

This, the Mayavi Rupa or illusion body of the Adept, or of those who have won the right and attained the power to consciously create and inhabit it, is the next we have to consider. About it we ordinary mortals know very little. But it is evident that it is but a natural power to which the whole human race will attain in the course of its evolution, and which these advanced Ones have anticipated by the supreme efforts of an unselfish and purified will. That they can transport these bodies to any place, however distant, with the rapidity of thought, and make them both invisible to the ordinary eye, or apparently as solid and real as flesh and blood, has been well attested by the most competent witnesses. Not only did a Master do this, in a visit to Col. Olcott in New York while his physical body was in India, but he actually left behind him an article of his apparel when he disappeared, and which the Colonel still possesses. It will be claimed that such an event is only evidence to those who witness it, but this can hardly be so classified when we consider the really vast mass of testimony which shows that this projection of astral forms is only a natural power of every soul, and which we at present exercise feebly and unconsciously, while Adepts but do the same thing consciously.

Higher still than the Mayavi Rupa is the Nirmanakaya body, the form woven by those who have conquered every illusion of matter, who have won the right to Nirvana, but who refuse their reward in order to still toil, unseen and unfelt by those for whom they have sacrificed so much. It is from such high and holy Beings, clothed in their Nirmanakaya vestments, that genuine inspiration from spiritual sources comes. It is their duty and their delight to daily and hourly contend with the enemies of humanity by such help and inspiration, given in the hour of need. Yet by this is not meant a "communication" such as comes from "Summerland" by any means. For the inspiration in this case but obeys the universal law that all true power proceeds from within outwards, and so these always seem to come from the recesses of our own being, and are utterly indistinguishable from those which really do proceed from our own Higher Ego. So, unnoticed, except by the Adept clairvoyant, uncredited, unthanked, do these highest and holiest of Earth-evolved beings proceed with their compassionate tasks.

There are higher forms yet, but they can hardly be classified as Astral. Such are the Augoeides, the Radiant Forms of our Divine Fathers in Heaven, spoken of by Bulwer Lytton; the Dharma-kaya vestments of those Buddhas of spiritual selfishness how but gain Nirvana to "disappear forever from the hearts and memories of mankind", instead of donning the humble Astral robe of the Nirmanakaya. There is, too, that undescribed mysterious vestment which clothes us in our devachanic rest. But enough have been classified to show their common origin, their different uses and functions, and to enable the student to satisfactorily assign each to its proper place and plane of consciousness. Thus, in the case of table-tipping, slate-writing, etc., he will instantly know that the astral organ of some living and present person is the actual factor in the phenomenon; the intelligence, if any, being reflected from the minds of those present. If there be forms materialized, he may be sure that one or more Linga Sariras of those present have exuded and attracted to them enough of molecular matter and vitality to form a transient Rupa for a Kamic entity, or, perhaps, a lost soul to regain for a few moments those earth sensations and experiences for which it longs. Let a sensitive person observe the startling depression of vitality, as well as the horrible charnel-house smell remaining in the room after a genuine "materialization", and he will be at no loss to account for the source of the power or of the "conditions" necessary to accomplish the result. He may seek in vain among the paradoxes and platitudes of the so-called "communications" for evidence of any high or really spiritual entity, for Nirmanakayas do not seek the atmosphere of the séance room any more than does the ordinary man or woman the horrors of the morgue or dissecting rooms of our colleges, which are their nearest physical counterparts. And if there does come uncalled into his mind a suggestion to labor altruistically for humanity, a longing to live upon a higher, holier plane than that which he realizes he now occupies, he will not disturb or flatter himself by the thought that perhaps a Nirmanakaya is endeavoring to impress him, for he will realize that the plane of a Nirmanakaya, which is that of his own Higher Ego, is too near the Divine for any feeling of selfish proprietorship, of "this is mine and not thine", to mar the Unity of thought and purpose towards which we now feebly strive in our endeavors to "form the nucleus of a Universal Brotherhood". And if in his sub-conscious construction of these lower, transient entities, he finds a promise and prophecy of a time when he shall consciously and joyously take part in the creation or construction of such worlds as he now inhabits, then will his study of even these lowly, unscientific "astral forms" not have been in vain.

JEROME A. ANDERSON, M. D.

ESOTERIC TEACHING.

SOME recent references in the PATH to portions of the original esoteric teachings embodied by me in Esoteric Buddhism seem to call for remarks on my part in reply. The line of criticism in question has culminated in an article which appears in the PATH for July, entitled "Mars and Mercury".

The point at issue is this:—In the original teaching which I received from the Masters I was definitely informed that the planets Mars and Mercury formed part of the septenary chain to which our own world belongs. The question is one which, on its own merits, will only be of interest within the area of serious Theosophic study; but the controversy that has now arisen really involves some of the deepest questions affecting the future well-being of the Theosophical Society and the progress of the movement. It is for this reason that I now feel bound to take it up.

For a long time after the publication of Esoteric Buddhism the statement concerning Mars and Mercury remained unchallenged. It scarcely seemed possible that any one imbued with respect for the Masters' teaching could challenge it, because, as has been publicly stated, after the publication of Esoteric Buddhism the great Adept who gave me the information wrote to me declaring explicitly that it constituted a correct exposition of his teaching. His words were:—"Be certain that with the few undetectable mistakes and omissions notwithstanding, your Esoteric Buddhism is the only right exposition, however incomplete, of our occult doctrines. You have made no cardinal, fundamental mistakes, and whatever may be given to you hereafter will not clash with a single sentence in your book, but, on the contrary, will explain away any seeming contradiction." In later years when the Secret Doctrine was published by Madame Blavatsky, I found to my great surprise that she had asserted a new view of the planetary chain, altogether at variance with that previously given out, and had represented the seven planets of that chain as seven different states of this earth, making out Mars and Mercury to be in no way associated with the evolution of our human family, but simply to be themselves the objective planets, corresponding to the earth, of other chains. On the basis of this declaration some Theosophical students have felt bound by their loyalty to Madame Blavatsky to put aside the earlier teachings of the Masters conveyed through myself, and to argue that I misunderstood my instructions. This view is emphasized with great vigor in the ПАТН,—in the article above referred to, signed by Mr. Judge,—and the really important point developed by the controversy has to do with the question, What was Madame Blavatsky's position really in the occult world, and what kind of authority should be attached to the writings she has left behind her?

I hope no one will take the explanation I am now forced to give as implying any abandonment by me of the position respecting Madame Blavatsky I have always maintained. I showed in the fragmentary biography I put together at her own wish, with the assistance of herself and members of her family, under the title Incidents in the Life of Madame Blavatsky, that she was truly in close relations with the great Masters of esoteric wisdom. That she was one of their partially initiated disciples was also unquestionable for anyone who has been in independent touch with the realities of the occult world. She was what she always called herself, a chela, or pupil of the Masters, generally described by them by the term upasika, well-known in the East as signifying a female chela; and when the teaching first came to me in preparation for the book which I ultimately wrote, Madame Blavatsky eagerly perused the letters I received in reply to my elaborate questions, assuring me constantly that the information they contained was almost as new to her as it was to me, except in so far as a part of it was vaguely present to her mind without having ever been formulated with precision. Through her it was in the first instance undoubtedly that I came into communication with the Masters, and in many ways for many years, during some of which she had few other friends, I endeavored to show my appreciation of the debt of gratitude, in this respect, I owed her. But the matter we have now to deal with has nothing to do with personal relationships. I have to defend the teaching of which I was made the exponent, and now that the subject has been forced so prominently to the front, I cannot leave Theosophists to suppose I acquiesce in the claims that have been made to correct my faithful exposition of the occult doctrine.

It is not my business here to offer hypotheses to account for the strange misapprehensions into which Madame Blavatsky fell when writing the Secret Doctrine, not merely as regards these questions of Mars and Mercury, but also in regard to some other points which have not yet attracted attention. That Madame Blavatsky was capable of making mistakes when endeavoring to amplify and expand the occult teaching of the Masters is the all-important conclusion to which I think all unbiassed minds in the Theo sophical Society must be brought by a consideration of the matter under discussion. In endeavoring to show, on p. 163, vol. 1 of the Secret Doctrine, that I misunderstood the teaching in reference to Mars and Mercury, Madame Blavatsky quotes a question which I put to the Master, K. H., and his reply. Here I must add a few words of explanation of the circumstances under which the correspondence in question came to be available for quotation. When I returned to England in 1883 and published Esoteric Buddhism—long before Madame Blavatsky ever thought of returning to this country—the most earnest Theosophists of that day were exceedingly eager to see the original papers on the basis of which that volume had been written. I used to read portions of the correspondence at meetings of the Society, and many members pressed me eagerly for permission to take copies of them. I referred the matter to the Master himself, and in the first instance he distinctly expressed disapproval of the idea. The letters, as he pointed out, were written to me, to inform my own mind, in order that I might in turn put out their substance in a suitable literary shape. They would not be intelligible to others unfamiliar with the course of the correspondence on both sides, and so on. The urgent desire, however, of certain Theosophists made me feel as though I were selfishly withholding from them documents which we all revered very sincerely, and at a later date—to my lasting regret—I was induced to apply a second time to the Master for leave to have some of these letters copied. He gave me that leave then, enjoining me to take a solemn pledge from persons to whom I gave the copies that they would never be made use of in any way without my permission. Under these conditions the great bulk of my correspondence with the Mahatmas, in so far as it related to Theosophical teaching, was copied and treasured for a time by the persons to whom I gave it. Several years later, when Madame Blavatsky was living in this country, she naturally acquired overwhelming influence over a great many members of the Society. She desired one of these to give up to her the copies that had been received from me. The member in question conceived her orders to over-ride the original pledge, and gave them up. They have since been scattered about the world, so that I have seen extracts from them in the PATH and elsewhere, and for want of the interpretation that would have been suggested if the original letters of enquiry from me had also been printed, provoking misapprehensions on the part of those who only in this way read half the correspondence.

Now, the original question relating to Mars was as follows:—

“What planets of those known to ordinary science, besides Mercury, belong to our system of worlds?” The question took that form because information concerning the association of Mercury with our chain of worlds as the next planet on which this body of humanity was destined to evolve, had been given to me previously. The answer was:—“Mars and four other planets, of which astronomy knows nothing. Neither A, B, nor Y, Z are known, nor can they be seen through physical means, however perfected.” The answer is incorrectly quoted in the Secret Doctrine, and is made to run,—“Mars, etc., and four other planets . . .” The interpolation of this “etc.” lends color to the view Madame Blavatsky was at the time maintaining, viz., that while I had intended to ask a question concerning our chain, the Master thought I meant to ask a question about the solar system at large. This idea is a strange one for an occultist to have accepted. An Adept dealing with his pupil could not make such a mistake about his meaning. But internal evidence makes it obvious that no such mistake was made. If the question had related to the solar system, it would have been absurd. “What planets besides Mercury belong to the solar system?” The question would have been ridiculous in that form—the answer almost more so,—“Mars and four others . . .” invisible to telescopes. What about Jupiter and Saturn, and all the invisible planets of the other world systems? Madame Blavatsky, as all who knew her intimately are well aware, was capable of making any imaginable mistake in matters relating to physical science. Her mind was out of tune with all such matters. But how the friends who helped her with the proofs of the Secret Doctrine, even without having their eyes opened by knowing that the “etc.” was an interpolation, could have let this passage pass, is very surprising. Finally, be it observed that “A, B, and Y, Z,” were the names assigned by agreement at that period of my correspondence with the Master to the first, second, sixth, and seventh globes of our chain. The notion that there could be any ambiguity about my question or the answer, in the circumstances, is an insult to common sense,—not to speak of Adept wisdom. I am entitled to add that at a very recent date, within the last few months since this subject has been under discussion, the Master himself in communication with me made the following comment on the situation:—“If I had been capable of paltering with the truth, and playing with words in the way which has been attributed to me, not one line of all the manuscript of mine in your possession would have been worth the paper it is written on”.

Few persons in touch with the principles of occultism will be surprised to hear me quoting recent words addressed to me by the Master. Relations like those which were established between my humble self and Him in days gone by are of a kind that do not come to an end except through the misconduct or faithlessness of the pupil. During Madame Blavatsky's lifetime my privileges of communication with the Master through channels of which she knew nothing were private and personal, and I was precluded from speaking of them. That prohibition has since been removed. Madame Blavatsky disliked anything that savored of interference with her rights as founder of the Theosophical Society, and while she lived no one else would have been allowed to speak on behalf of the Masters to the Society at large. But it will be obvious on reflection that unless the whole design of occult teaching is a delusion also, fresh neophytes as time goes on must come within the scope of the personal teaching of the Masters. In this respect we are moving forward now in a new era. I should be the last person to claim any monopoly—such as Madame Blavatsky in a certain sense enjoyed while she lived—of the honor of conveying teaching from the Masters. No one now left in the Society, I should think, could be so unwise as to make claims of that nature. But as it has been my duty in the past to put the teaching of the Mahatmas before the world, so it looks probable that such tasks will present themselves again, and on this account it is that I am bound at the present crisis to speak rather more plainly than inclination in other circumstances would have prompted. For many Theosophists, I know, Madame Blavatsky represented the whole movement, but, great as she was, the movement is something much greater. For many such persons Madame Blavatsky may have been the only teacher from whom they received occult enlightenment. Immense as my respect is for her attainments, for her industry and devotion to the work she undertook, it is, nevertheless, a fact that I myself did not receive my Theosophic teaching directly from her, but in the way described; and long before her death my relations with the Master were carried on through the intermediation of one of his chelas, quite outside the range of Madame Blavatsky's connexions. It ought to be for all earnest workers in the Theosophical movement a matter of great satisfaction that this is so, because in this way an entirely independent line of confirmation is provided for much that Madame Blavatsky has taught, for the bona fides of her position in its broadest aspects, and for the much-discussed existence of the Masters.

Following the quotation from my letter given in the Secret Doc- trine as above described, comes a letter as printed in that volume with many passages omitted, in which Madame Blavatsky seems to give a correction, derived by her from the Master himself, confirming her view of the planetary chain. Here, again, minute comment upon the entangled situation is very difficult. I can only say that the omitted passages would materially alter the interpretation the letter seems to bear, and that some words obviously put in by Madame Blavatsky in parentheses must not be understood to have existed in the original.

Of course it matters very little for most people in this country first awakening to the significance of Theosophic teaching, whether Mars and Mercury are connected with this earth in the manner described or not; but what is of immense importance—in order that the movement, carried on loyally and rationally, shall always continue a healthy living organization, in touch with higher wisdom—is that all persons interested in its progress should shun the disastrous mistake of stereotyping the utterances of Madame Blavatsky—or of anyone else outside of the Masters—as the final word of esoteric teaching, and an infallible testimony to constitute a new body of dogmatic scripture and lead the human understanding once more into the quagmires of bigotry and sectarianism.

A few words must be given in conclusion to some points in Mr. Judge's recent article. When he says the two Masters who have had to do with Esoteric Buddhism and the Secret Doctrine have decided distinctly, first, that no other globes of the earth chain are visible from its surface, etc., etc., and that "Mr. Sinnett misunderstood them when he thought they meant to say Mars and Mercury were two of the six fellow-globes of the earth", I can only affirm for the guidance of those who may be able to feel that I speak with some claim to be listened to in such a matter, that I am quite sure Mr. Judge entirely mistakes, and that the Masters in question never said anything of the sort. The argument which endeavors to draw a correspondence between the organization of the septenary chain and the seven principles of man is one which rests on an entirely false analogy. It would be as reasonable to attempt to trace an analogy between the seven principles of man and the seven days of the week. There is an analogy between the principles of man and the principles of the earth—or of any other individual planet, visible or invisible,—but seven is a terrible stumbling-block for Theosophical students who know there is something in it without knowing very much more.

Finally, in quoting from one of the letters to me by the Master which were got at under the circumstances I have described above, Mr. Judge represents him as saying, "You are putting me questions pertaining to the highest initiation. I can give a general view, but I cannot and dare not enter upon details." It was scarcely fair of Mr. Judge to bring in the passage quoted, as though it bore on the matter in hand. It related to enquiries which had nothing to do with Mars and Mercury, but to a totally different question.

A. P. SINNETT.

HOW TO SQUARE THE TEACHINGS.

PLACE has been given to Mr. Sinnett's admirably written article "Esoteric Teaching" for two good reasons: first, because he requested its publication, and second, because the theme is excellent and the time propitious. But by its appearance the PATH is not bound to the conclusions of the learned author.

Roughly summarizing the history of the recrudescence of the teaching of the Lodge for this century, we find H. P. B. publicly beginning it, though guardedly, in Isis Unveiled as herself the messenger of the real Teachers behind. At that time (1875) she gave private teachings* in America to certain persons. Then in India in the Theosophist, with H. P. B. as editor, it proceeds to further unfolding in articles entitled "Fragments of Occult Truth". It is a pity this name was not preserved and used for the book which the "Fragments" afterwards became—Esoteric Buddhism. Later the Occult World came out in 1884, and also Esoteric Buddhism. During all this time H. P. B. was doing her own work with others, explaining the same philosophy as was given to Mr. Sinnett, and contributed to literature the Key to Theosophy and the Secret Doctrine. The fact—not denied by Mr. Sinnett or anyone—is that the letters from the Masters from which the matter for Esoteric Buddhism was taken came in the main through H. P. B., for although it is true she "showed surprise" to Mr. Sinnett on seeing certain things communicated to him in letters from the Masters, the surprise was not at teachings which were new to her, but surprise that they were divulged at all, for she knew the teaching, inasmuch as she taught it under pledge as far back as from 1875 to 1878 in America.

In her Secret Doctrine, availing herself of the same teachers to whom she introduced Mr. Sinnett, she corrected two errors into which she said he had fallen, i.e., respecting Devachan and our companion planets. It is a perfectly unthinkable proposition to say that she was not advised by the Masters when writing the Secret Doctrine. I who saw many of the Masters' letters in 1888 in reference to the Secret Doctrine certainly cannot give up the evidence of my inner and outer senses. I know as surely as I know any fact that the same teachers were giving her in 1887 and 1888, as before, information for that book, in black upon white, and I am certain they dictated the corrections given in Secret Doctrine upon the points now before us. Evidence, eye-sight, and tradition confirm it, for in 1876 to 1878 I was given by her the same theories and the clue to the misunderstanding which a desire for consistency as to mere words has now aroused.

Even in 1888 it was not the time to make the point precisely clear to the public. Times have rule in occult teaching more than most readers—or writers—of theosophical books suspect. But the clue was given, a broad hint was thrown out. It is now the time when what I was told in 1876 and 1878 by the Masters through H. P. B. may be told, since the prohibition put personally upon me has been withdrawn.

The questions respecting Mars and Mercury—and I might add those which might have been but were not put about Venus—did touch upon other questions on the outskirts of higher initiations and which never are and never will be answered before the right time. The statement in the Master's letter to Mr. Sinnett that the questions put by the latter approached too near to secrets of higher initiations did not, it is true, refer directly to these questions about Mars and Mercury, but that does not alter the fact that all the questions then propounded on this planetary subject touched the delicate area; and whether Mr. Sinnett or anyone else liked it or not, attention had to be drawn off even at the risk of creating a temporary confusion on the topic. But in 1888 time had rolled on further, and now it is 1893 and nearer and nearer to another cycle. The clue may now be given. It may be noticed, if readers will observe, that the many questions raised in reference to Mars and Mercury served the additional purpose of so distracting the attention of questioners that hardly any queries were raised about the subject of "Cycles" on which the Masters had the completest information but about which the Lodge is more careful to remain silent than in respect to other points—yet the cycles are more important and have more bearing on life than Mars and Mercury.

Mars, Mercury, and Venus have a special and direct relation to this earth and its invisible companions. Those three visible spheres have to do with certain cosmic principles and lines of influence in and on the earth, while the remaining visible planets of the Solar System have not the same relation. Read it thus, as taught before Mr. Sinnett was in the T. S., and as repeated in the Secret Doctrine :

The unseen companions of your earth are united with it in mass, though different as to quality of substance. The visible planets of your Solar System which have a relation special and peculiar to Earth are Mars, Mercury, and Venus. But what that peculiar—nay wonderful—relation is do not ask, for we will not tell you. If while the current is open you persist in the question, you will arouse in yourselves a perplexity which the answer obtained will not relieve. Is there not a spirit of irritation, of rage, and another of wisdom and active judgment in man and Nature which may relate to visible planets which are not an actual part of earth's own special family? This is as far as we will now go.

The whole misunderstanding hinges on the word "relation". It was a word which led up to many things. The presence of Mars and Mercury in the sky presents a relation to the earth, yet they have another relation to it which Saturn, Jupiter, and so on have not, while the latter bear the same relation to us of proximity as do the first. Admit the proposed construction above given, and at once there is complete concordance between Esoteric Buddhism and Secret Doctrine as to esoteric divulgements. But continue the controversy to try and show that Esoteric Buddhism had not a single blunder, and perplexities of all sorts impossible to relieve will spring up on every hand. The Masters have commended the book, and well so, as it is made up from their letters. But that does not prevent one making slight mistakes, as, for instance, the one that all men stay in devachan for 1500 years. This is not the fact, nor is it according to reason. And I make bold to say that it is not 1500 years since I was last in devachan, but much less; and this assertion is made on personal knowledge supported by confirmatory statement from the same Masters. But it is true that the general run of the human race stays in devachan for the average time of 1500 years of mortal time.

Mars, Mercury, Venus, then, are a part of our system in the sense of having an extremely important relation and influence with the human race and its planets, and having that in mind it was quite permissible for the teacher to reply that Mars and Mercury belong to our system.

ON THE FUNCTIONS OF A DOORMAT.

AS I paused on the threshold of Headquarters one day, I found myself sympathetically regarding the doormat at my feet. What position could be lowlier than it held? Not even permitted to enter the house, but having the humble duty assigned it of cleaning the feet of those more favored ones who were admitted to the sanctum. It did not utter a word of complaint; I think no one ever knew it to remonstrate; and as to thinking that it was shamefully neglected, and that it had as good a right as the stair-carpet to climb to the innermost offices of the PATH, and even to repose beneath the Editor's desk,—I doubt if such a notion ever occurred to it.

Instead of complaining, of bewailing its unfortunate destiny, of accusing the powers that be of favoritism, or of trying to blazon its own virtues to the world, it remains with a divine patience where it was put, and does what it can to make the ways of others pleasant. It preserves the halls and stairways from the dust and mud of the street, and it lies there to be trampled upon, day after day and month after month, by the busy feet of those who never give a thought to the patient service it renders them. Talk about recognition! it never has any, it would not know the meaning of the word. Much less does it claim the reward of gratitude for what it has done, a gratitude expressed in smiles and pleasant words, as a circus horse expects lumps of sugar after he has gone through his tricks. Once in a while it suffers a furious beating, for no fault of its own, but simply to free it from the impurities heaped upon it by others, and this too it undergoes in silence and without even a murmur. To remonstrate never occurs to it, much less to rise up in rebellion and oppose the hand that strikes it or the heel that grinds it into the dust.

So perfect is its humility, so absolute its patience, that I set myself to learn the lessons that it taught; and what higher ones could be studied by a scholar than those of trust, submission, humility, and patience? It is hard sometimes to be content with a place upon the threshold, where we feel ourself trodden under the feet of those who "go up higher", but if we can help those feet, we too have part and lot in their advancement. And if we have really learned the lesson of trust, we know that the place assigned us is the place where we belong, and where we can do the most good, if we will only consent to work with our own tools and not grasp at another's. What says the Gita? "It is better to do one's own duty, even though it be devoid of excellence, than to perform another's duty well." But one of the most insidious forms of that ambition against which we are so strenuously warned, is what we call emulation, the desire to distinguish ourselves as we have seen others distinguish themselves, the feeling that, given the chance, we could do great things. But the greatest thing is to use the chance we have, for "to him who hath shall be given", and to learn the lesson of trust in those great Powers that have set us in our places and know better than we can what we are fitted to do.

This lesson of trust springs out of humility, for it is only when we recognize our own feebleness that we learn to confide in the strength and wisdom of others. In Letters that have Helped Me we are told, "The Karma of your present life is the higher patience", and this is explained by the compiler to mean "the fine line between pride and humility". The doormat does not fling itself into the gutter in a foolish fit of self-abasement, but it remains at the top of the steps, in a place of its own, which is "the place neither too high nor too low", on which Krishna told Arjuna to sit.

Submission does not imply grovelling, or even self-depreciation, but only the consent to do a lower duty that someone else may the better perform a higher, for which he has a better equipment than ourselves. A private holds as honorable a position as a captain, and without privates there could be no captains. In the army of the Lodge promotion never goes by favor or by seniority, and when we are fit to be captains we shall find ourselves marching at the head of our regiments. Till then, let us trust in our commanding officer and obey his orders as we would like to have our own obeyed.

The doormat was never known to complain that it was not appreciated, nor even to be despondent because it had to lie there alone with no one to help it, even to recognize its efforts. And when we have learned this lesson of silent devotion, we shall learn to know all that the Masters meant when they wrote, "Ingratitude is not one of our failings. The humblest worker is seen and helped".

The crowning grace of service is joy, and verily this is its own reward.

KATHARINE HILLARD.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

IN our last we gave a picture of Bertram Keightley, and now follow with one of Archibald Keightley. Dr. Keightley was born in Westmoreland, England, on the 19th of April, 1859. His father was Alfred Dudley Keightley of Liverpool, who came of Swedenborgian stock, and Margaret Wakefield, whose parents were Quakers. Like Bertram, he began his education in the Charterhouse, then finished at Pembroke College, Cambridge, where he took the degree of B. A., after natural science tripos. He then took the degree of B. M., licentiate of the Royal College of Physicians, London, and passed as member of the Royal College of Surgeons, England, and Master of Arts and Doctor of Medicine of Cambridge. Within the last two years he also passed the examination required in the State of New York and qualified as a physician under our law, and practiced for awhile in this city. He has also traveled a great deal, both in Europe and America, and took a long trip to New Zealand.

While in college he became interested in the phenomena of Spiritualism, as indicating unseen and unknown forces, and studied the mystical philosophical works in the library there, as well as neo-Platonic philosophy. While engaged in this he noticed an advertisement of Esoteric Buddhism, bought the book, and after reading it was drawn to the subject. An introduction to Mr. Sinnett in 1884 followed, and with others he met to study some of the letters from the Mahatmas received by Mr. Sinnett, and then in the latter's house he met Brother Judge, who was on his way to Paris. He says he first saw H. P. B. at a meeting of the Society arranged to settle questions which had arisen in respect to the management of the movement in London, she coming over suddenly to the meeting unknown to anyone; this is the same meeting referred to at which Bertram Keightley saw her in Mr. Hood's chambers. Later he went with the party and saw H. P. B. off to India.

Later on, having a feeling with others that H. P. B.'s presence was necessary, and she being then at Ostende, he wrote jointly with others to her to come over to London and help in the work, and finally assisted her on her journey to the Capital, where she, Bertram Keightley, Dr. Keightley, and the Countess Wachtmeister joined together in a household at Norwood, which was later removed to 17 Lansdowne Road. This was in 1887, and nearly all his time was taken up then in helping in the editing and correcting of the Secret Doctrine. The Blavatsky Lodge and Lucifer were started at Norwood, but the greater part of the work was carried on at Lansdowne Road. In the following spring, at H. P. B.'s request, Dr. Keightley went to the first American Convention at Chicago, for which he started on short notice, arriving a little ahead of time, and thus being able to do some work on the Eastern Coast of America for the Society. Directly after that Convention he returned to Europe.

The following year it was proposed that he should again travel, but H. P. B. was against it for a long time. On a certain Sunday night she was opposed to it, but early the next morning at half-past six she summoned Dr. Keightley to her and asked him:

"When can you start for America?", to which he replied:

"By the next steamer," and on Tuesday night he was again started for America.

On this visit he went to Chicago, Cincinnati, Boston, Washington, and Philadelphia, and on that occasion first made the acquaintance of his wife. Towards the end of the next year he traveled around the world with his sister for her health, spending six months in New Zealand. From there he went to San Francisco and visited the Branches on the Coast, doing a great deal of lecturing. Came across the continent, attended the Boston Convention in 1891, and returned to England in the summer of that year. He returned to America shortly before his marriage to Mrs. J. C. Ver Planck, and settled in New York, practising medicine and lecturing for the Society. In the spring of 1893 he went back to England and began the practise of medicine in London.

Dr. Keightley is well known to very many Theosophists in America and is loved by them all, as his genial ways and sincere character endear him to every one who makes his acquaintance. Very true is it that the name of Keightley is inseparably associated with our movement.

OUR CONVICTIONS.

SHALL WE ASSERT THEM?

TO THE PATH:—Please resolve a doubt. Are members of the T.S. required to become flabby in character upon entering the Society, and to give up their convictions for fear of a vague future dogmatism? I ask this because in some of our magazines I have seen objections raised to a free promulgation of one's ideas on such subjects, for instance, as the Adepts or Masters, Reincarnation, Karma, and so on. If we are so required, then I would ask why we have a free platform in the T.S., and when were the statements made in the President's inaugural address of 1875 withdrawn?

Fraternally,

S. F. HECHT.

Admitted to the T.S. May 5, 1892.

This question seems easy to answer. It is presumed that the correspondent refers to an objection to my plainly stating either in our journals or in any other way my own personal beliefs. It is evident that S.F.H. is thinking of the objection made in the Theosophist by N.D.K. to my plainly saying I believe in the existence of the Masters of whom so often H.P.B. spoke. N.D.K., taking up a letter of mine, quoted this sentence; "And when we come to examine the work and the foundation of the T.S. and its policy, I find it perfectly proper for me to assert, as I do in accordance with my own knowledge and belief, that our true progress lies in our fidelity to Masters as ideals and facts". S.F.H. is perplexed because N.D.K. seemed to object to that, but the perplexity need not exist nor need we become flabby in our convictions.

For, as will be seen by reading, and not straining, the sentence quoted, the "policy" of the T.S. referred to by me therein is that of leaving everyone quite free to express his views on all these points. Although N.D.K. would appear to think I meant that the T.S. policy was for it to make these declarations, it is easy to see by consulting the constitution that its policy is the opposite. The policy is freedom to members and perfect neutrality on the part of the T.S. To have any other, or to say that merely because one is in a society such as ours, or is an officer, he cannot give his own opinions so long as he accords the same privilege to another, would be a monstrous thing, contrary to our constitution and quite against a long history in which, from H.P.B. and Col. Olcott down, all members have had perfect freedom of expression. So S.F.H. need have no fear; our policy of freedom is not altered; all have a right to their convictions; and it is certain that if anyone is becoming flabby the oldest members of the T.S. will at once adjure him to strengthen his sincere convictions and not hesitate to give them expression, always allowing to every one else the same liberty of thought and speech. And to aid our correspondent we will give some further light if possible.

Let us take first H. P. Blavatsky. She began in the T.S., with its free platform, immediately to preach and promulgate her own personal view that the Masters were facts, and facts of very great magnitude, and this she did and continued against the most violent opposition and the fiercest ridicule. She also proclaimed unequivocally, as Cagliostro did many years before in Paris, a belief in the occult machinery of the Cosmos with all that that implies. Moreover, in the name of the Master she did very wonderful phenomena, which one of the same Masters has said, as published by Mr. Sinnett, have puzzled men for a good part of a century. And while thus freely expressing her own views she allowed the same freedom to all others, and was herself the agent for the taking into the T.S. of many who did not believe as she did but who often scouted at her convictions. Then, further, she proclaimed a system of philosophy with all her ardor just as she had a right to do, and merely laid it before the world within the pale of a free Society, which is not compelled to accept but whose members fortunately do in great part. And in saying they are thus fortunate I am now giving expression to my own views.

Next consider the career of Col. H. S. Olcott since he began the work of the T.S., President then as he now is, as and we hope he will remain. He is our highest officer. Yet he has not failed to assert his undying belief in the Adepts and Masters universal and particular. It is a good example for those who have the same belief. It was done in the T.S., not as officer but as man, as individual member, and it would be a poor sort of constitution that would have prevented him. Long ago he said they existed and tried to prove it. He worked with the Psychological Research Society of London to prove to them the existence of the Masters and the truth of the doctrines given out by them as to occult phenomena. That may have appeared to be disastrous, but it was done with good intent and still under the constitution, for if against the constitution why was he not charged and put out? Because it was within his right. And in various places since then he has made the same assertions. At the Convention of the European Section in 1891 he publicly said on the platform that the Masters existed and that he had seen them himself, and spoke also of more than the two most spoken of in the T.S. and its literature. Then last, and now, he repeats it all with greater detail and particularity in his own series of Diary Leaves in his own magazine which has always been called the only organ the T.S. has. For, mark you, the PATH and Lucifer have never been made the organs of the T.S.; nor, indeed, should they be.

Mr. Sinnett stands out in high relief among those who have in public and private, within the T.S., asserted with all his strength his belief in the Masters' existence and tried his very best to prove his assertion. His books, his pamphlets, his speeches in public and private, all show this. Was he wrong, was he not fully justified under the constitution? And has he not gone even further and taken up the cudgels in battle for his views?

It very clearly appears, then, that under the Constitution we all have the fullest right to proclaim our views, not once but as often as we see fit, so long as we give others the same right and do not say that the T.S. as a body is responsible, for it is not. This is the beauty of our law. We are free just as the United States constitution is free and proclaims for no creed and no sort of god but leaves all men to say what they please, if they do not interfere with the liberty of others.

Entry into our ranks in no way infers a becoming flabby, by which it is supposed the querent means a fear of saying what and in what each individual believes, because this is a brotherhood free from dogmatism. Earnestness and sincerity are not dogmatism at all, and it is undeniable that a reform in philosophy and thought such as ours could never prosper if our members were to grow flabby in this or in any other particular. Then again, if some of us have found that for us the Masters exist, it is our human universal duty to tell others, so that they may find out also or be able to show by good substantial proof that we are wrong. When they shall have proved this to our satisfaction it will be time for us to disband, for then will have fallen the theory of the possible spiritual evolution of man, and we can then leave the field to the scientific materialists who not long ago declared the possibility of that high evolution. But as this is a reductio ad absurdum we may all continue our preachments of views, some for and some against man's great inheritance. The PATH will continue to say its editor believes in humanity and in the great Masters of Wisdom.

Him I call indeed a Brahman who, though he be guilty of no offence, patiently endures reproaches, bonds, and stripes.—Dhammapada, v. 399.

THE CASE OF INDIA.*

SIR:—I have gone through your letter of the 5th April last with great interest and take the earliest opportunity to answer it. I am a high-caste orthodox Brahmin of Bharatdwija Gotra, tracing my spiritual ancestry to Brihaspati and Shang-Yu. I am also intimately acquainted with Col. Olcott, and I think therefore that I have a right to speak on the subject. It is certainly true that many Hindus do not support the Theosophical movement, and some believe it only masked Buddhism; it is also true that the evil is a growing one; but the causes are not those you mention, though individual indiscretions may have fanned the flame.

Ever since the advent of the Theosophical Society in India, skepticism, a sickly hybrid, began to give place to orthodoxy; with orthodoxy is coming bigotry and in some cases superstition, even among Hindu Theosophists who certainly should have known better. Soon after the first sign of the revival of our glorious religion, sprang up a class of interested persons who impose upon the public by pretending to be possessed of more knowledge and power than they really are. Dabblers in Occultism and Tantric ceremonies, impostors and pretenders of Shastric Knowledge with oracular condemnation of everything foreign, find the Theosophical Society a great stumbling-block to the carrying out of their nefarious trade of leading astray the ignorant and unwary, and both these "Masters" and their "Chelas" persistently maintain that there is nothing in the Theosophical Society, and that it is a mere Buddhistic movement.

But our Shastras are being translated in the Vernaculars, published and read with avidity, and ere long the eyes of the public will be opened, but not before, alas! many well meaning persons going over to the other Path, hopelessly wandering for the rest of their present incarnations. Such a sad spectacle is often met with among friends, Theosophists and others, a slave to the order of his "Guru", a wreck of spiritual aspirations and independence of thinking.

In the meantime, the prominent members of the Theosophical movement in India are calmly looking on, implicitly expecting that everything will be right in course of time. Dormant branches are allowed quietly to die, everyone fondly hoping that they would come to life through their own exertions, forgetting the fact that a diseased Branch, like a diseased child, requires constant care and attendance.

Indians have a natural repugnance to foreigners: beef-eating, wine-bibbing Europeans with a rampant sense of superiority are not the class of persons a good Brahmin likes to associate with, much less to impart to them a real knowledge of his Shastras; and the open hate and contempt with which almost every one of the European residents in India treats the Indians are certainly not productive of that belief in earnestness of purpose without which it is idle to expect that the real teachings the Brahmins still possess would ever pass on to the foreigners. Regarding the Gita, for instance, now published in Europe and America, no one can understand it fully without, as I hear, the commentary by Hanumanta, the "Monkey God", who was present throughout the teaching.

Then again, you address to those Hindus only who are acquainted with your language, while your enemies have the advantage of speaking and writing in the vernaculars; and those that do not know the English language, or are acquainted with it very imperfectly, judge of the Society only from what they hear against it. The Indian Section has yet to learn fully and clearly that, to reach the mass or the great middle class, it must utilize native agencies and use the native dialects.

Now I think I have laid before you some at least of the principal causes that hamper the Theosophical movement in India. I hope you will not resent my plain speaking, for it is only thus that we can understand each other. I most sincerely thank you for your earnest appeal and for your favorable opinion of us. May our still living Rishies reward you!

Yours etc.,

THE SECRET DOCTRINE AND PHYSIOLOGY.

THE HEART AND PLEXUSES.

I FIND on p. 92 of Vol. 2, Secret Doctrine, the heart of man described as consisting of four lower cavities and three higher divisions. I cannot reconcile this statement with human anatomy. If the two auricles and two ventricles are to be regarded as the four lower cavities, which are the three higher divisions? If the aorta and pulmonary artery are to be regarded as two of them, then the two vena cavae and the pulmonary veins must also be counted. Again on the same page it is asserted that there are seven nervous plexuses, which (each of them, I suppose, is meant) radiate seven rays. . . . There are sixty nervous plexuses enumerated in works on anatomy. Of all of these, one only (the epigastric) has seven subdivisions (included in the above sixty). On the same page it is asserted there are seven layers of skin; physiology counts only four. If there are seven, which are they and where to be found? These difficulties present a serious obstacle to the acceptance of the statements of The Secret Doctrine on matters less capable of verification.

M. R. LEVERSON, M. D.

In my opinion the three cavities of the heart are (1) the pericardium, (2) the right auricle, (3) the left auricle. The four cavities below are (1) the right ventricle, (2) the pulmonary artery, (3) the left ventricle, (4) the aorta. The pulmonary artery and the aorta are prolongations of the heart; the one to the lungs and the other to all parts of the body. Their pulsations and structure are like and correspond with the pulsations and structure of the central organ. They are simply the going out of the heart to all parts of the organism, terminating in the wonderful capillary system through which life and nourishment are dispensed. The system of veins is composed simply of tubes for conveying back to the heart and lungs the used-up blood, which, after passing through the capillary system, has to be revived before it is again fitted to give life and nourishment to the body. From this it is seen how completely the great heart fills the physical form. It is a much larger organ than is generally supposed. What is called heart, ordinarily speaking, is simply the central portion only.

J. H. S., M. D.

In this matter very much depends upon what is called heart and what not, as also upon the system of anatomical analysis. I think the four lower cavities are the two auricles and the two ventricles. The three other divisions are the two auricular appendages and the foramen ovale, which latter is a passage between auricle and ventricle, strongly marked in the foetal heart but nearly obliterated in the adult.

K. H., F. T. S.

IN that part of the Secret Doctrine which is referred to by Dr. Leverson, it cannot be strictly said that the author "describes" the heart as consisting, etc., but she does speak as if taking it for granted that such is the division. I therefore understand her to refer to the true division or analysis of the heart, and not to the one presently accepted among physicians. The medical fraternity have not always been right, and their conclusions have from time to time been revised. It was thought that the discovery of the circulation of the blood was unique in the West, but in fact it has been known in the East for many centuries. Even the nervous system has been known and is spoken of in ancient Hindu books. In one place it is said, "a thousand and one roads lead from the heart in every direction," and goes one to state that in those ramifications the inner person resides or functions during sleep. This may very well refer to the use of the nervous system, especially in sleep.

In respect to the divisions of the skin, Occultism says that there are actually seven divisions, and medical scientists can only state that they do not know of those seven, but have no right to say that there are not seven. If one reads the Secret Doctrine and takes its statements in respect to science as intending to refer to science as it now is, and then finds a difficulty because the author does not agree with science, there never of course could be any reliance placed upon it; but that book does not agree with science and does not pretend to, except in so far as science is absolutely correct. It is well to suspend judgment in regard to matters where there is a disagreement between the Secret Doctrine and Science, inasmuch as medical and other schools have not yet uttered the last words in their respective departments, and much has to be found out and many revisions of theories made before science will have come to its final determinations. But I have no doubt that these final conclusions will be in concordance with the Secret Doctrine.

The "seven nervous plexuses" spoken of are the seven main divisions, of greater importance in the human frame, known to Occultism, and the masters of that science do not deny that Western science has enumerated sixty on its own account, but these sixty are all included in the seven great plexuses. These latter are well known to students of Occultism who have proceeded by the road which leads to a knowledge of them. And it is known to those students that these seven control all the rest in the human organism, whatever they may be. The only divergence, then, on this point, is that science places every nervous plexus that it knows by itself, and is not aware of the fact that they are classified in natural law into seven great divisions. This can be verified, but not by consulting books on anatomy nor by ordinary modern dissections.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE.

LITERARY NOTES.

AUGUST LUCIFER opens with one of those trumpet-toned proclamations of certain assurance of Masters and Their work which so startle week-kneed Theosophists, such as believe nothing they do not see and yet demand to see without first fulfilling the conditions to sight. When will they learn that disclosures from Masters are a reward for faithful service, not a concession to complacent doubt, Masters being interested in Their co-workers, not in Their critics? A Mrs. Macdonald who had publicly uttered an audacious fib is rebuked with a neat incisivness which may teach her more caution if not more conscience. A strong article by H.P.B. upon "Elementals" is begun; Mr. E. T. Sturdy writes on "Gurus and Chelas", though apparently not without mistake as to some points; Dr. Henry Pratt in "Trust the Essence of True Religion" thinks that "the teachings of Spirit are contrary to the teachings of God", and otherwise takes positions which a Theosophist might deplore; Mrs. Besant finishes "Theosophy and Christianity" less powerfully than she opened it; and Edith A. Jones contributes "They that go down into Silence", a strongly-told story of an after-death experience, with some most wholesome lessons implied for unloving fathers—and, indeed, for unloving people of any class. "Notes and Queries" opens a new department.—[A.F.]

THE PACIFIC THEOSOPHIST for September has a deeply valuable "Letter to a Student" by Jasper Niemand, one of those searching analyses of soul life which show what the writer has been through, whereto he has attained, and how he apprehends the needs of brethren in the rear. The paragraphs on page 24, particularly the two middle ones of the first column, are full of teaching. There is a most excellent editorial on "The Masters as Ideals",—another evidence that working Theosophists are not afraid of the doctrine of Masters, nor the fact, nor the danger that some light-weight may call them "dogmatic", but that they find strength and help and stimulus in the certainty that the T.S. and its true friends have such backers.—[A.F.]

ADHYATMA MALA. This journal is published in the vernacular in the Bombay Presidency, India, and we have the seventh number of volume 1. The contents of the number run: "General Survey", "Discourses on Bhagavad Gita", continued: "Sapta Buhmika", a continued story; "Cycles", "The Seven Principles", "Puranic Mythology". A knowledge of the language is so rare in this country that the publishers cannot feel hopeful of readers here.

STUDIES IN THEOSOPHY, No. 1. This is a reprint by the Indian Section of "Theosophical Gleanings or notes on the Secret Doctrine", issued some time ago in Lucifer. The price of four annas is given, but it is sent free to all members of the Indian Section. There are 57 pages in the form of a pamphlet.

DEATH A DELUSION, by the Rev. John Page Hopps, is a tractate in the interests of Spiritualism, and is marked by a singular fairness, judicial-mindedness, and reverent spirit. It is both able and discreet, and one may well accept its facts and honor its quality while still convinced that the richer explanations of Theosophy would bring more light and satisfaction to the author. (Swan Sonnenschein & Co., London.)—[A.F.]

THE ESOTERIC BASIS OF CHRISTIANITY; Part II, Genesis, is by Wm. Kingsland, and hence has all the sweetness and clearness and strength and beauty we knew in The Higher Science. It is not at all an original book, being really drawn from the Secret Doctrine and like works, nor is its treatment of the esotericism in Genesis as full as might be well, but it gives many of the important facts, and its sincere and reverent spirit makes it edifying. There is sometimes a little confusion in the matter of the Logoi and their symbols, but it is not serious. The truest tribute to a writer is the wish that his book were longer. (For sale by the PATH; paper, 10 cents.)—[A. F.]

SEPHER YETZIRAH, by Dr. W. Wynn Westcott F.T.S. (London T. P. S.) This is a little book of 43 pages, bound in blue cloth. It is a revised translation of the Hebrew Book of Formation, following the version of J. S. Rittangelius of 1642. He says that the Yetzirah is the oldest Hebrew philosophical treatise. It purports to give the origin of Universe and Man. It is almost entirely concerned with the Hebrew letters and the recondite meanings under them. This work is excellently done, and is a good contribution to the curiosities of mystical literature. It can be ordered of the PATH; cloth, 75 cents.

THE IRISH THEOSOPHIST for July, published in Dublin, has an article on "Meditation, Concentration, Will", by William Q. Judge, an account of the Third Annual Convention in Europe, a continuation of "Proteus", an article on the "Elemental Language", a legend called "The Priestess of the Woods". The folders have played the dickens with this edition, as they have bound the pages in wrong. This little magazine, carried on under difficulties, is excellent, and we wish it great success. The Dublin address is 71 Lr. Drumcondra Road; 1s, 6d.

JULY LUCIFER has a fine article by W.F.B. upon "Body, Life, Soul", and the beginning of Mrs. Besant's glorious "Theosophy and Christianity", the most grandly and thrillingly eloquent of her many lectures in New York. Its tact and persuasiveness and beauty disarmed the most orthodox and calmed the most captious. The superb paragraph at the middle of page 502 can have no eulogium as glowing as itself. The Countess Wachtmeister announces her departure from England for a protracted work, first in Sweden and then in India.—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, vol. vi, No. 5, contains "Egyptian Belief Theosophically Considered" by P. W. Bullock, a careful and learned treatise, and "What is Prana?" by Herbert Coryn, a singularly fine and thoughtful paper, every line saturated with mental richness. This is specially true of the parts upon sympathy, practical Theosophy, and cellular consciousness.—[A.F.]

THE NINE CIRCLES. This book treats of vivisection by one who is opposed to the practise. It is by G. M. Rhodes. Its sub-title is "The Torture of the Innocents", and with great particularity it treats of the various forms of torture through which animals are put for scientific experiment, such as mangling, injecting virus, suffocation, burning and freezing, starving, flaying, varnishing, and miscellaneous torments. What an awful aura must surround those who go on with these experiments! But until the West learns that there are other than mechanical ways for discovering the seat, cause, and course of disease, its doctors will proceed with this brutality, and, indeed, we do not doubt but that sooner or later, if Materialism is not wholly checked, live human beings will be subjected to vivisection and like scientific experiments. (Swan Sonnenschein & Co., London.)

BORDERLAND, Mr. Stead's new Quarterly, made its appearance in July. It has ninety-six pages of fine print under sixteen heads. After quoting in ten sections the responses given by public men, Borderland treats the Study of Psychical Phenomena, Circles for Experimental Research, the Life of Joan of Arc, Experiences in Automatic Writing, Auto-Telepathic Writing, Phenomena of Spiritualism, Thought Healing, Palmistry, etc. Mrs. Besant contributes a paper on "Theosophy and its Students", and her "Death—and After?" is sympathetically reviewed. Mr. Stead is fearless and energetic and fair, and his magazine will probably have enormous circulation, especially because its investigations are scientific and for the discovery of fact, not for maintenance of theory. His own character and his friendship for Mrs. Besant unite in securing to Theosophy an impartial hearing, and no one can read his Preface, "How we intend to study Borderland", without respect for him and an assurance of good results.—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL MANUALS, No. 3; DEATH—AND AFTER?, by Mrs. Annie Besant, is in book form her serial articles in Lucifer. They were successively noticed by the PATH. No Theosophist should be without these Manuals, for in the unsurpassed diction of the author they expound with singular force and lucidity the great facts we all need to know, and this one analyses the various communications possible between the Earth and other spheres. There is a copious Index. (For sale by PATH; cloth, 35 cents.)—[A.F.]

Mirror of the Movement.

BROOKLYN T.S. had Sunday evening lectures in August: 13th, Reality in Theosophy, Alexander Fullerton; 20th, Concentration, Claude F. Wright; 27th, The History of the Soul, Burcham Harding.

ARRAN T.S. lectures on August Sunday evenings were: 6th, The Kabala, Leon Landsberg; 13th, The History of the Soul, Burcham Harding; 20th, A-B-C's, Henry T. Patterson; 27th, Theosophy and Occultism, Joseph H. Fussell.

THE MASCHMERT FARM, South Corinth, N.Y., the Summer Retreat for Theosophists described in July PATH, is doing a remarkable propaganda work. On Sunday afternoon, July 23d, Dr. Hyatt and Mr. Harding addressed a meeting of 125 persons collecting from the neighborhood. Notice in the County paper and by private circulation brought on the 30th an audience of 225 by actual count. From villages and hamlets and farms people came on foot, on horseback, and in carriages. Addresses were made by B. Harding, C. F. Wright, and A. Fullerton, and the Lotus Circle Song Book was used. The interest was remarkable, scores of hearers waiting to ask information and documents, and seeming unwilling to leave the place. On the following Saturday, thanks to Mr. B. Harding who had seen the hotel proprietors and editors, a public meeting was held in the Club Room of the Grand Union Hotel at Saratoga, and addresses were made by Claude F. Wright and A. Fullerton. On the 6th the meeting at the Farm was impaired by threatening weather, but 150 people arrived and were addressed by Messrs. Wright and Fullerton. At each of these three meetings Mr. H. T. Patterson of Brooklyn presided, and with singular felicity of thought and utterance said just the right thing in the right way. So strong is the local interest that steps have been taken towards the organization of a Branch. Much of this good work is due to that indefatigable Theosophist, Burcham Harding, who never stops and never fails. So many Aryan and Brooklyn members are at the farm that a Thursday evening meeting for discussion has been established, and to this too the neighbors are coming. Miss Chapin has formed a Lotus Circle, a Library is being collected at the farm, and Theosophical documents are permeating the region.

MISS F. M. GRISWOLD CAMP, a highly valued worker in the Pittsburg T.S., has published a pamphlet of 35 pages entitled Answered Queries on Theosophy, Universal Brotherhood, Karma, and Reincarnation. With singular conciseness, felicity, and precision it responds to the questions sure to arise in each intelligent person first encountering Theosophy, and both its mental quality and its sweetness of spirit give it high place among our smaller works. It is most excellent for distribution. The price is not stated, but probably some due arrangement for purchasing will be made.

THEOSOPHICAL CONGRESS. The program of speakers issued from New York was sent to the Indian Hdqrs. for distribution on the 19th August, as it is impossible to distribute from the United States; another lot was sent to the European General Secretary at the same date for the information of European members. Copies were also mailed to the Branches in Australia.

A RECEPTION TO REPRESENTATIVES at the World's Parliament of Religions will be given at Headquarters, Room 48, 26 Van Buren st, on the evening of September 14th. Every F.T.S. in Chicago is cordially invited to attend. Personal invitations will be sent to all whose addresses the Committee have, but all the Brethren are desired and welcomed.

THE BROOKLYN THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY have adopted as a watch-word the word "devotion". In every word there is innate force; in some more than in others. This force may be used either to augment or neutralize other forces. Every religion, every country, every body of people, every person has a predominant characteristic. This characteristic is expressed in a word. The religion, country, body of people, or person that discovers its most marked characteristic and therefore its word, by the use of that word reinforces the natural tendency. It is this which gives force to war cries and campaign cries. Words used in this way act as mantrams or charms, and have the power coming from constant reiteration, just as water dripping continuously on one spot has its power. And so the members of the Brooklyn Branch hope that the other Branches will also adopt watch-words, believing that by thus embodying their highest ideals and aspirations an added stimulus will be given to the best Theosophical activity.

PACIFIC COAST.

LOS ANGELES T.S. is becoming more active and consequently more strong. In July five Sunday evening public lectures were given: 2d, Hypnotism and Mesmerism, Dr. G. F. Mohn; 9th, Reincarnation, F. Neubauer; 16th, The Three Lower Planes of Consciousness, Mrs. L. E. Giese; 23d, Prehistoric Continents, Dr. G. F. Mohn; 30th, Some Analogies in Evolutic and Raeson, F. Neubauer. At the four Branch meetings in July original papers were read by members, and the results of effort are surprising. Books and leaflets are constantly given away, and next month there is hope of issuing a full report of the new Headquarters.

NARADA T.S. on July 14th enjoyed with friends a visit to Seattle upon the steamboat "Skajit Chief" by Captain Barlow's invitation, and were entertained by the Seattle Branch, being met at the dock and escorted to another steamer upon Lake Washington, chartered for the day. Lunch was served in one of the beautiful parks on the shore, thirty miles of the Lake were seen, and a delightfully social time enjoyed.

REV. W. E. COPELAND is passing his vacation in the region of Puget Sound, and is doing Theosophic work among its towns. He addressed the Sunday meeting of Seattle Branch on the 23d, and the Narada Branch of Seattle on the 27th, besides speaking before liberal societies.

NARADA T.S. public meetings are growing in attendance and interest, from fifty to eighty persons being present, and the members preparing original papers. Speakers frequently interchange with the Seattle Branch.

MANY OF THE PACIFIC COAST BRANCHES have evolved out of the private residence stage into full Headquarters, and have rooms centrally situated and devoted exclusively to T.S. work. Others are working for the same end. Some of the most active Branches started in private houses, but soon found the restrictive influence of lack of publicity and strove for a meeting-room. These have steadily grown and prospered. It has been demonstrated that the public will not attend meetings in residences, but will do so in public places, where there is no consciousness of hospitality or of restraint. This abundant experience gives the law for true Branch evolution, and all Branches are wise when recognizing and conforming to it.

IT IS SOME TIME since I have made report of progress of Theosophical work in Portland. We have not been idle, but have with perseverance kept up our Branch meetings every Wednesday evening attended by an average of about fifteen or eighteen persons, always several of them being non-members. We have recently received into our Branch five additional members, four being new members and one being a member-at-large before joining our Branch. Our members are showing a better and more appreciative knowledge of Theosophical teachings, and are taking up the work with more understanding of its real value and necessity. From their inauguration a year ago in June there has been a steady and increasing interest in our Sunday evening meetings. There has been an average attendance throughout the year of about seventy-five, there being occasionally as many as one hundred or more present. As the audience changes more or less each evening we have had about one thousand different listeners throughout the year—this aside from our Pacific Coast Lectures which have had larger attendance. We have maintained our headquarters and reading-room also for nearly a year, which is always accessible to members and others at any time of the day or evening, but is now too small for our increased membership and attendance, and we will soon be compelled to seek larger quarters.—(Communicated.)

THEOSOPHY IN AUSTRALIA. The Victorian League is making vigorous effort in propaganda. It has rooms in 119 Collins St., Melbourne. An altered attitude of the newspapers is noticeable. In July Mrs. Cooper-Oakley was entertained at a conversazione held to welcome her back from New Zealand. Next evening a general meeting of the League was held. At this Mrs. Cooper-Oakley was asked to represent the League at the Congress in Chicago, and later she was asked similarly by other Branches in Australia. The Melbourne Psychological Research Society was offered use of the League rooms. Bro. Hunt lectured on Karma, after which Mrs. Cooper-Oakley replied to questions, and on the 10th July she left for Sydney to go from that place after a four weeks stay to Chicago.—(Communicated.)

THEOSOPHY AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

The arrangements for speakers at the Congress to be held on the 15th and 16th September at Chicago have been completed as far as possible. The time allowed to us being only from ten to twelve hours, we cannot make as much use of speakers as in other cases, and as our foreign delegates have much of interest to say they will occupy most of the time. Mrs. Annie Besant and Miss F. Henrietta Muller come from London. Mrs. Besant is too well known to need any introduction. Miss Muller has been well known in London, where she has conducted a woman's paper for some years. She visited the Indian Section last year; at the July Convention in London she was appointed a delegate from that Section. Bro. Dharmapala, a Buddhist member, who is secretary of the Buddha Gya Society, has been brought over to the Parliament by the officials of the Fair, and while in Chicago will be asked to take part in our Congress although he is not a delegate. His earnestness in his own religion and his known character assure us that he will have much of interest to say.

Great interest centres round Bro. Gyanendra Nath Chakravarti from Allahabad. He is a Brahmin and a man of good education, well versed in his own religion and said to be an excellent speaker. He was asked to come to the Congress so as to represent our Indian Section and thus make the meeting more comprehensive. At first we had difficulty in deciding on this expense, as funds have been low. But Bro. B. Keightley came forward with an advance of the expense of bringing Bro. Chakravarti to London, and the call then issued met with such a response that enough has been raised to repay the loan and leave a surplus probably sufficient to print a full report of the Congress. If our Society had any funds we should of course have seized this occasion to show that we can bring on one platform under the banner of one organization representatives of every religion in the world by having natives of all countries present for us. But that was not possible.

Mrs. Besant and Bro. Chakravarti will deal with important subjects on the program. He will define Theosophy, treat the history and ethics of the subject and also its philosophy and psychology, and dwell on the mission of the movement. Mrs. Besant will take up the definition of Theosophy and also its connection with ethics, treating as well the subject of Theosophy and modern social problems.

Dr. Buck will speak on Greek and Gnostic philosophy, European Mediæval Philosophy, and Esotericism in Religions. Dr. Anderson will consider Reincarnation. Miss Muller speaks on Theosophy as found in the Bible, and Mrs. Thirds has the subject of Links between Religion and Science, and Revelation not the special property of any one Religion. Mrs. Cooper Oakley is expected from Australia, but no definite arrangement has been made for her. If Mr. William Q. Judge's voice will permit he will speak on the Society in General, otherwise that will be taken by Bro. C. F. Wright.

THE SUPPORT OF THE T. S.

I am much pleased to be able to report quite a number of new subscribers to our Fund since last report. I am particularly pleased to note that we seem finally to have succeeded in getting Fellows to thoroughly understand that the amount pledged cuts no figure whatever. The spirit in which contributions are made is everything. As previously stated, I shall be better pleased to have one thousand subscribers at ten cents each per month than to have a like amount contributed by one.

I have been exceedingly pressed for time during the past month, and my personal acknowledgments have been somewhat delayed in consequence. I think, however, that all have now been made. If not, will pledgers kindly advise me, so that I can get the matter straight?

My thanks are specially due this month to the Secretary and five other members of the Salt Lake Branch, whose subscriptions reached me simultaneously. Will all Secretaries kindly remember that I want to know the amounts pledged by each subscriber, and include that information in their reports?

My report for the month is as follows:—

New subscribers in the 10c-per-month Class:—L.H.A., J.A.S., Mr. R., S. P.S., E.F.R., C.L.R., R.L.S., A.V.T., G.A.W., A.J.J., J.S.Y. Total, $1.10. Per year, $13.20.

New subscribers in the 25c-per-mo. Class:—F.A.B., L.M.K., E.P.B., Mrs. W., Mr. H. Total, $1.25. Per year, $15.00

New subscribers in the 50c-per-mo. Class:—A.G., B.L., E.L. Total, $1.50. Per year, $18.00.

New subscriber in the $2-per-mo. Class:—H.W.G. Per year, $24.00.

Total subscribers previously reported, 40. Total new subscribers since, 20. New total, 60. Grand total per year previously reported, $646.00. Total pledged by new subscribers, $70.20. Grand total per year, to date, $716.20.

G. E. HARTER, 247 Green st., Dayton, Ohio, August 19th.

LET the immortal depth of the Soul be predominant; but all the eyes Extend upward.
Stoop not down to the dark World,
Beneath which continually lies a faithless depth and Hades;
Dark all over, squalid, delighting in Images unintelligible,
Precipitous, craggy—a Depth always rolling,
Always espousing an opaque, idle, breathless body,
And the light-hating world and the winding currents
By which many things are swallowed up.

OCCULT ARTS.

PRECIPITATION.

THE word "precipitation" means to throw upon or within. This term is used in chemistry to describe the fact of a substance, held or suspended in fluid, being made to disengage itself from the intimate union with the fluid and to fall upon the bottom of the receptacle in which it is held; in the use of applied electricity it may be used to describe the throwing upon a metal or other plate, of particles of another metal held in suspension in the fluid of the electric bath. These two things are done every day in nearly all the cities of the world, and are so common as to be ordinary. In photography the same effect is described by the word "develop", which is the appearing on the surface of the sensitized gelatine plate of the image caught by the camera. In chemical precipitation the atoms fall together and become visible as a separate substance in the fluid; in photography the image made by an alteration of the atoms composing the whole surface appears in the mass of the sensitized plate.

In both cases we have the coming forth into visibility of that which before was invisible. In the case of precipitation of a substance in the form of a powder at the bottom of the receptacle containing the fluid, there is distinctly, (a) before the operation an invisibility of a mass of powder, (b) upon applying the simple means for precipitation the sudden coming into sight of that which was before unseen.

And precisely as the powder may be precipitated in the fluid, so also from the air there can be drawn and precipitated the various metals and substances suspended therein. This has been so often done by chemists and others that no proofs are needed.

The ancients and all the occultists of past and present have always asserted that all metals, substances, pigments, and materials exist in the air held in suspension, and this has been admitted by modern science. Gold, silver, iron and other metals may be volatilized by heat so as to float unseen in the air, and this is also brought about every day in various mines and factories of the world. It may therefore be regarded as established beyond controversy that as a physical fact precipitation of substances, whether as merely carbon or metal, is possible and is done every day. We can then take another step with the subject.

Is it possible to precipitate by will-power and use of occult laws upon a surface of wood, paper, metal, stone, or glass a mass of substance in lines or letters or other combinations so as to produce an intelligible picture or a legible message? For modern science this is not possible yet; for the Adept it is possible, has been done, and will be still performed. It has also been done unintelligently and as mere passive agents or channels, among mediums in the ranks of European and American spiritualists. But in this latter case it has the value, and no more than that, of the operations of nature upon and with natural objects, to be imitated by conscious and intelligently-acting man when he has learned how, by what means, and when. The medium is only a passive controlled agent or channel who is ignorant of the laws and forces employed, as well as not knowing what is the intelligence at work, nor whether that intelligence is outside or a part of the medium.

The Adept, on the other hand, knows how such a precipitation can be done, what materials may be used, where those materials are obtainable, how they can be drawn out of the air, and what general and special laws must be taken into account. That this operation can be performed I know of my own knowledge; I have seen it done, watching the process as it proceeded, and have seen the effect produced without a failure. One of these instances I will give later on.

Precipitation of words or messages from Adepts has been much spoken of in the Theosophical Society's work, and the generality of persons have come to some wrong conclusions as to what they must be like, as well as how they are done and what materials may be and are used. Most suppose as follows;

1. That the precipitated messages are on rice paper;
2. That they are invariably in one or two colors of some sort of chalk or carbon;
3. That in every case they are incorporated into the fibre of the paper so as to be ineradicable;
4. That in each case when finished they came from Tibet or some other distant place invisibly through the air.
5. That all of them are done by the hand of the Adept and are in his handwriting as commonly used by him or them.

While it is true in fact that each of the above particulars may have been present in some of the cases and that every one of the above is possible, it is not correct that the above are right as settled facts and conclusions. For the way, means, methods, conditions, and results of precipitation are as varied and numerous as any other operation of nature. The following is laid down by some of the masters of this art as proper to be kept in mind.

(a), A precipitated picture or message may be on any sort of paper.

(b), It may be in black or any other pigment.

(c), It may be in carbon, chalk, ink, paint, or other fluid or substance.

(d), It may be on any sort of surface or any kind of material.

(e), It may be incorporated in the fibre of the paper and be thus ineffacable, or lie upon the surface and be easily eradicated.

(f), It may come through the air as a finished message on paper or otherwise, or it may be precipitated at once at the place of reception on any kind of substance and in any sort of place.

(g), It is not necessarily in the handwriting of the Adept, and may be in the hand comprehended by the recipient and a language foreign to the Adept, or it may be in the actual hand of the Adept, or lastly in a cipher known to a few and not decipherable by any one without its key.

(h), As matter of fact the majority of the messages precipitated or sent by the Adepts in the history of the Theosophical Society have been in certain forms of English writing not the usual writing of those Adepts, but adopted for use in the Theosophical movement because of a fore-knowledge that the principal language of that movement would for some time be the English.

Some messages have been written and precipitated in Hindi or Urdu, some in Hindustani, and some in a cipher perfectly unintelligible to all but a few persons. These assertions I make upon personal knowledge founded on observation, on confirmation through an inspection of messages, and on logical deduction made from facts and philosophical propositions. In the first place, the Adepts referred to—and not including silent ones of European birth—are Asiatics whose languages are two different Indian ones: hence their usual handwriting is not English and not Roman in the letters. Secondly, it is a fact long suspected and to many well known both in and out of the Theosophical Society that the Fraternity of Adepts has a cipher which they employ for many of their communications: that, being universal, is not their handwriting. Thirdly, in order to send any one a precipitated message in English it is not necessary for the Adept to know that language; if you know it, that is enough; for, putting the thought in your brain, he sees it there as your language in your brain, and using that model causes the message to appear. But if he is acquainted with the language you use, it is all the easier for the Adept to give you the message exactly as he forms it in his brain at first. The same law applies to all cases of precipitation by an alleged spirit through a medium who does not know at all how it is done; in such a case it is all done by natural and chiefly irresponsible agents who can only imitate what is in the brains concerned in the matter.

These points being considered, the questions remain, How is it all done, what is the process, what are the standards of judgment, of criticism, and of proof to the outer sense, is imposition possible, and, if so, how may it be prevented?

As to the last, the element of faith or confidence can never be omitted until one has gotten to a stage where within oneself the true standard and power of judging are developed. Just as forgery may be done on this physical plane, so also may it be done on the other and unseen planes and its results shown on this. Ill-disposed souls may work spiritual wickedness, and ignorant living persons may furnish idle, insincere, and lying models for not only ill-disposed souls that are out of the body, but also for mere sprites that are forces in nature of considerable power but devoid of conscience and mind. Mind is not needed in them, for they use the mind of man, and merely with this aid work the hidden laws of matter. But this furnishes some protection illustrated in the history of spiritualism, where so many messages are received that on their face are nonsense and evidently but the work of elementals who simply copy what the medium or the sitter is vainly holding in mind. In those cases some good things have come, but they are never beyond the best thought of the persons who, living, thus attempt to speak with the dead.

Any form of writing once written on earth is imprinted in the astral light and remains there as model. And if it has been used much, it is all the more deeply imprinted. Hence the fact that H. P. Blavatsky, who once was the means for messages coming from the living Adepts, is dead and gone is not a reason why the same writing should not be used again. It was used so much in letters to Mr. Sinnett from which Esoteric Buddhism was written and in many other letters from the same source that its model or matrix is deeply cut in the astral light. For it would be folly and waste of time for the Adepts to make new models every time any one died. They would naturally use the old model. There is no special sanctity in the particular model used by them, and any good clairvoyant can find that matrix in the astral light. Hence from this, if true, two things follow: (a), that new communications need not be in a new style of writing, and (b), there is a danger that persons who seek either clairvoyants or mesmerized lucides may be imposed on and made to think they have messages from the Adepts, when in fact they have only imitations. The safeguard therein is that, if these new messages are not in concordance with old ones known to be from their first appointed channel, they are not genuine in their source, however phenomenally made. Of course for the person who has the power inside to see for himself, the safeguard is different and more certain. This position accords with occult philosophy, it has been stated by the Adepts themselves, it is supported by the facts of psychic investigation inside the ranks of Spiritualism, of Theosophy, of human life.

It is well known that mediums have precipitated messages on slates, on paper, and on even the human skin, which in form and manner exactly copied the hand of one dead and gone, and also of the living. The model for the writing was in the aura of the enquirer, as most mediums are not trained enough to be able independently to seek out and copy astral models not connected with some one present. I exclude all cases where the physical or astral hand of the medium wrote the message, for the first is fraud and the second a psychological trick. In the last case, the medium gazing into the astral light sees the copy or model there and merely makes a facsimile of what is thus seen, but which is invisible to the sitter. There is no exemption from law in favor of the Adepts, and the images they make or cause to be made in astral ether remain as the property of the race; indeed in their case, as they have a sharp and vivid power of engraving, so to say, in the astral light, all the images made there by them are deeper and more lasting than those cut by the ordinary and weak thoughts and acts of our undeveloped humanity.

The best rule for those who happen to think they are in communication with Adepts through written messages is to avoid those that contradict what the Adepts have said before; that give the lie to their system of philosophy; that, as has happened, pretend that H. P. B. was mistaken in her life for what she said and is now sorry. All such, whether done with intention or without it, are merely bombinans in vacuo, sound that has no significance, a confusion between words and knowledge delusive and vain altogether. And as we know that the Adepts have written that they have no concern with the progress of selfish science, it must be true that messages which go on merely to the end of establishing some scientific proposition or that are not for the furtherance especially of Brotherhood cannot be from them, but are the product of other minds, a mere extension through occult natural law of theories of weak men. This leads to the proposition that:

Precipitation of a message is not per se evidence that it is from one of our White Adepts of the Great Lodge.

TO A THEOSOPHIST.

We do not know that we have lived before;
 We can but hope that we shall live again,
 Unless the grief that stings though it be o'er
 Subdue submission's fain but faint amen.
 So dark the chance of life, the chance of death
 To darker issue still may lead the way,
 Like some black angel with a torch whose breath
 Crimsons a night more dread than drest day.
 But yet, if it be well we should have been,
 It will be well should we not cease to be Until, through deathful life, we enter in Where life and death are tuned to ecstasy.
 Ah, friend, in that long birthday may we meet,
 To bless the bitterness that ended sweet.

CONVICTION AND DOGMATISM.

NEVER was there an age more prone to confusion of thought than our own. In the rush and hurry of our "progressive civilization" men seem to have no time to think clearly, and they heap together incongruous thoughts and label them hastily, and then work on as though the labelling had been done after conscientious analysis. This superficial and mischievous habit has shown itself very clearly among the members of the Theosophical Society, some of whom are unable to distinguish between the holding of convictions and the desire to dogmatise as to the convictions that should be held by others. And by a quaint but not uncommon turn of fate, the very people who proclaim most loudly their detestation and fear of dogma are those who most dogmatically seek to impose their own vagueness of thought upon others as a thing necessary to salvation. "Whosoever will be saved, it is above all things necessary that he hold no belief with conviction and that he speak no belief with definiteness". So runs the modern version of the Athanasian Creed, and alack! I am among those doomed to perish everlastingly, for I not only have convictions and do not scruple to declare them, but I also hold the yet more damnable heresy of thinking that a life which is to be a force for good must believe firmly and speak clearly.

A "conviction" is a proposition held clearly and definitely in the mind, anything of the truth of which we feel sure. On such certainties we build our conduct, we mould our lives. By such certainties men's characters are formed. It is such certainties, and not all the drifting mass of thoughts that pass through our minds, that make us what we are. They are the anchors of the soul. Persons who have no certainties are swayed by every gust of feeling, changed in conduct by every passing phase of thought, swept hither and thither by every streamlet of opinion. Hence the enormous importance of right beliefs, for error in belief will inevitably bear fruit in error of conduct, and the usefulness of our lives be marred by intellectual mistake and spiritual blindness.

So also we see that all real science is built on certainties. Only when a fact is definitely established and its reality becomes a conviction, can it be of value to the world. A man of science, expounding scientific truths to the people, does not say, "It may be so, think as you like": he says, "It is so; disregard it at your peril". All that still awaits verification in the realm of may-be can serve as hypothesis, as speculation, as perhaps interesting and stimulating material for thought, but it offers no sure basis for the guidance of men's lives.

What is a dogma? In one sense of the word it is nothing more than a formulated statement, a clean-cut, definite presentment of a fact. It is a teaching put forward by knowledge, not a hypothesis but a certainty. In this sense every science consists of a set of dogmas fringed round by hypotheses, and the advanced or elementary stage reached by the science depends on the proportion which its dogmas bear to its hypotheses.

But the word "dogma" has come to bear an evil connotation, and has come to mean in the popular mind an assertion which is forced on others, instead of the clear presentation of a truth. And in this sense dogma is bad, a barrier to true knowledge and a hindrance to progress. If truth is to fructify in the mind, the mind must welcome it, assimilate it, become one with it. A truth, however true, which is authoritatively forced upon the mind unprepared for it, and which remains alien amid its surroundings, such a truth is not only useless but is a positive source of danger. It cramps and fetters mental action, it produces bewilderment and confusion; instead of educating it dwarfs, and it beats back mental capacity instead of drawing it forth. Such a dogma cannot be a conviction, it can only be an assertion, and its reiteration only increases its benumbing force. No man has a right to enforce his conviction on another, to demand assent to his statements, submission to his certainties. True to his own convictions he may be, hold to them, live by them, die for them: but force them on others—No. Not though they be the truest of truths, the most certain of certainties.

And here, as it seems to me, comes in the rule of right conduct. When a man has found a truth, or thinks he has found one, which is calculated to be of service to mankind, he should speak it out. Without such speech no intellectual progress is possible, and, historically, all pioneers of thought have taken this course, and by clear and unhesitating affirmation of what they know to be true they have helped mankind to make a forward step. Men are struck by the clear assertion; it may awaken in them some response; they feel stimulated; they enquire, they investigate, they become convinced. But while the pioneer should thus speak out, he should not endeavour to coerce others into acceptance of his truth. Let him speak it out clearly; whether others accept it or not should matter not to him. He is, for the nonce, the mouth through which Truth speaks, and his mission is fulfilled in the speaking. Let him tell forth the truth, let him show its bearing on life, the consequences of its acceptance or rejection. Having thus done, his duty is discharged, and the word should be left to go on its way, to be freely accepted or freely rejected by each who comes in contact with it.

But, it is sometimes argued, if a truth be not capable of general demonstration, it should not be publicly stated. Why not? No truths, save the most elementary, can be demonstrated to every one. Each science has its abstruser verities that can only be demonstrated to those proficient in it, but none the less may it state these verities, assert them on the authority of the masters in science, state that the demonstration is beyond the reach of all save advanced students, and leave them to be accepted by the unlearned as reasonable hypotheses, congruous with accepted truths, or—if the unlearned so prefer—to be cast aside as unverifiable. The discovery and the assertion of discovered truth are not to be held back to suit the meagre efforts and capacities of the indifferent and the slothful; they have their right of rejection; let that suffice them.

The application of all this as regards members of the Theosophical Society is clear. We have no right to lay down dogmas to which we demand assent, be it explicit or implicit; we have no right to treat as less worthy members than ourselves any of our brothers who disagree from our views and who reject our statements. But we have the right to clearly and definitely utter our convictions, whether or not they are capable of demonstration to every one on whose ears they may fall. The demonstration is attainable by all who choose to devote energy, time, endeavour, to gather the necessary capacities and knowledge: those who do not so choose—and surely such are within their right—have no claim to make their lack of capacity and knowledge the measure of our assertion.

And let it be clearly understood that there are truths the demonstration of which must be directed to the spirit and not to the intellect, and that the evolution of spiritual faculties is as rigorously necessary for their comprehension as the evolution of intellectual faculties is necessary to the comprehension of intellectual truths. Every one admits that the demonstration of a difficult philosophical proposition cannot be appreciated by an untrained mind, and that intellectual capacity must be educated ere such a demonstration can be understood. It is equally true that the demonstration of a spiritual truth cannot be effectively made to anyone in whom the spiritual faculties have not been educated and trained. That there is hesitation in accepting this fact, that there is a general claim of ability to appreciate evidences addressed to the spiritual faculties whereas all men admit that training is necessary for the intellectual, is part of that scepticism as to the reality of the spiritual life which is characteristic of our generation. If the spiritual life be a reality, then there must be conditions for its evolution, and until those conditions are fulfilled, the life will not manifest. To take but one illustration: the existence of the Masters can be proven to the spiritual faculties, and their existence as Masters cannot be proven on the physical and intellectual planes. On the physical plane the existence of certain men with certain powers could be shown; on the intellectual plane, their possession of certain knowledge: but the Master is a spiritual life, the spirit triumphant, and only to the eyes of the spirit can He, as such, be shown. Let those who have been happy enough to catch but one glimpse of Him keep that memory ever, and be willing at fit times to bear reverent witness to Him. But what can avail words on this high theme? The eyes of devotion alone can pierce the darkness, but verily the dawn shall come and we shall see.

ANNIE BESANT.

A WORD ON THE "SECRET DOCTRINE."

AN OLD LETTER REPUBLISHED.

THERE is so much discussion going on just now in the Theosophical movement as to the value of the Secret Doctrine, as to the amount of aid given to H. P. Blavatsky in the compilation of it, and as to her position as a Teacher in Occult matters, that it appears to us that the republication of an old letter—published in 1888—which bears on these questions, is peculiarly timely, and may be of service to many who did not have the opportunity of reading it on its first issue. The letter is, of course, of no authority for those members of the T.S. who do not share our sentiments of reverence for the Masters, but for those who do, the interest of it will be great. It was received in mid-ocean by Col. Olcott, P.T.S., and was originally published with his consent in a small pamphlet entitled "An Explanation important to all Theosophists", issued by H.P.B.

ANNIE BESANT,
WILLIAM Q. JUDGE.

---

Misunderstandings have grown up between Fellows both in London and Paris which imperil the interests of the movement. You will be told that the chief originator of most if not of all these disturbances is H.P.B. This is not so; though her presence in England has, of course, a share in them. But the largest share rests with others, whose serene unconsciousness of their own defects is very marked and much to be blamed. One of the most valuable effects of Upasika's mission is that it drives men to self-study and destroys in them blind servility for persons. Observe your own case, for example. But your revolt, good friend, against her "infallibility"—as you once thought it—has gone too far, and you have been unjust to her. . . .

. . . Try to remove such misconceptions as you will find, by kind persuasion and an appeal to the feelings of loyalty to the cause of truth, if not to us. Make all these men feel that we have no favorites, nor affections for persons, but only for their good acts and humanity as a whole. But we employ agents—the best available. Of these, for the last thirty years, the chief has been the personality known as H.P.B. to the world (but otherwise to us). Imperfect and very "troublesome" no doubt she proves to some; nevertheless there is no likelihood of our finding a better one for years to come, and your Theosophists should be made to understand it. . . .

. . . Since 1885 I have not written nor caused to be written save through her agency direct or remote a letter or a line to anybody in Europe or America, nor communicated orally with or through any third party. Theosophists should learn it. You will understand later the significance of this declaration, so keep it in mind. . . . Her fidelity to our work being constant and her sufferings having come upon her through it, neither I nor either of my Brother Associates will desert or supplant her. As I once before remarked, ingratitude is not among our vices. . . . To help you in your present perplexity, H.P.B. has next to no concern with administrative details and should be kept clear of them so far as her strong nature can be controlled. But this you must tell to all; with occult matters she has everything to do. . . . We have not "abandoned her". She is not "given over to chelas". She is our direct agent. I warn you against permitting your suspicions and resentment against her "many follies" to bias your intuitive loyalty to her. In the adjustment of this European business you will have two things to consider,—the external and administrative, and the internal and psychical. Keep the former under your control and that of your most prudent associates jointly; leave the latter to her. You are left to devise the practical details.

I have also noted your thoughts about the Secret Doctrine. Be assured that what she has not annotated from scientific and other works we have given or suggested to her. Every mistake or erroneous notion corrected and explained by her from the works of other Theosophists was corrected by me or under my instruction. It is a more valuable work than its predecessor,—an epitome of occult truths that will make it a source of information and instruction for the earnest student for long years to come.

. . . (This letter) . . . is merely given you as a warning and a guide; to others as a warning only; for you may use it discreetly if needs be . . . Prepare, however, to have the authenticity of the present denied in certain quarters.

(Signed) K. H.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

GYANENDRA NATH CHAKRAVARTI'S picture is given this month a little out of order because of his visit to the Parliament of Religions as delegate to the Theosophical Society's Congress, and of course more for the benefit of Western readers than our Indian ones. He is a member of the Branch at Allahabad, India, was brought to an interest in the movement by his uncle, and joined the Society in March, 1883, at Cawnpore, in the Chohan T.S.

Almost all the places of pilgrimage in Northern India have been visited by Bro. Chakravarti, but not on pilgrimage. He has been to Hardwar and Hrishekesha and Tapavana, the latter where Dhruva is said to have performed his tapa.

He was born in Benares (Kasi) on the 6th of July, 1863, and is a Brahman of the Sandilya Gotra. His birthday is the same as that of Vamana (dwarf) Avatar. This means that his Brahmanical descent is from the sage Sandilya. His education began in a mission school at Benares. Later he passed the entrance examination of Calcutta University in 1877 high in the list, then joined the Muir Central College at Allahabad, which is the best college in the Northwestern Provinces. He took the degree of Master of Arts with first-class honors in physical science, and received a medal and a prize of 100 rupees. At present he holds the chair of Mathematics in the Muir Central College, Allahabad. For seven years he was Professor of Physical Science in the college at Bareilly. In January, 1893, he took the degree of L. L. B., standing first and getting the highest degree taken by anyone since the University was established, and joined the bar at Allahabad in April, 1893.

When the project of having a Congress of the T.S. at the Parliament of Religions in Chicago assumed definite shape at the April Convention of the American Section, the question arose as to how we could secure a Brahmin to represent India and Theosophy there at the same time. Bro. Bertram Keightley was then in New York and suggested our asking Professor Chakravarti. This was done and at first it seemed that he could not come; indeed that discouraging reply was received. But in June he consented at the risk of losing his caste, and started for London. There he met Brother Dharmapala, Annie Besant, and Miss F.H. Müller, all coming to the Congress, and travelled with them to New York, arriving on the 2d of September. Not only is he a delegate from India to the Congress, but also was requested by the Managers of the whole Parliament to attend its formal opening on the 11th of September. It adds to the strength of the Theosophical Congress as a part of the Congress, for, as we are informed, he is the only Brahmin asked to speak in the general opening exercises of the Parliament.

Hence very fortunate and appropriate indeed is the fact that, before leaving India, three orthodox Brahmanical Societies constituted our Brother Chakravarti as their special delegate to represent Brahmanism at the Parliament. These appointments were made with our Theosophical Congress directly in view, knowing him to be a Theosophist, and it is, we believe, the first time that Brahmanical religious bodies have done such a thing. It is well known that Brahmanism is exclusive and does not indulge in missionizing. The names of the Societies which made the appointment are; Hari Bhakti Prodayini Sabha of Cawnpore; the Varnashrama Dharma Sabha of Delhi; the Sanatan Dharma Rakhshanee Sabha of Meerut.

As many Western members will wish to know what else may be said of Prof. Chakravarti personally, we will say that he is light in color for an inhabitant of the tropics. In figure he is above medium height and is by no means thin but quite rotund. His manners are gentle, though strongly supported by reserved force and quiet dignity. A black observing eye marks the man who sees all that passes, and when in private he speaks with you on metaphysics his impressive words are carried forward by a firm voice, which, however, is not strong, although with considerable carrying power. The language which he uses is the very best classical English, devoid of flaws, pronounced with but a slight accent, and in public addresses it rises to eloquence. A slight rhythm marks his delivery, and his evident sincerity gives power to all his public Theosophical speeches. We may with truth say that among the members he has met here many love him, and hardly any are there who do not accord him admiration.

THAT EVERLASTING PERSONAL EQUATION.

THE personal equation begins with the descent of the monad into matter. It lies brooding in the rocks: it glares or beams in the beauty of plant and flower: it snarls and devours in the animal: and it struts in pride, envy, and conceit, while criticising and condemning others in man. It vanishes only at the supreme moment of renunciation, when man loses self and relinquishes all for humanity. The Individual having then completely absorbed the Personal, Higher Manas becomes a center of Power in which the lower self has no share.

Now we may not all have reached that point; certainly the present writer has not; but may not one of fair intelligence grasp at least the philosophy, see the truth of it, and work toward it?

In the ordinary affairs of life this personal bias works in two ways, viz; in self-seeking directly, as in lust and greed, and in detraction and spoliation of others. The latter form is often the more objectionable and dangerous because subtle and concealed. People often indulge in harsh or unkind criticism of others, unconscious that their motive is simply to bring their own unchallenged virtues into greater prominence, when, in fact, they are themselves open to criticism on the same points. Hence it follows that we have no end of talk about charity, brotherhood, etc., etc., but when it comes to the daily test amid the petty trials and annoyances of every-day life, where real charity and consideration for the weaknesses and ignorance of others are the test of character, we are found wanting. This was a trait specially marked in H.P.B. If we are really wise we shall not expect of others that which we know, or ought to know, they are incapable of performing. What folly is all our talk and writing regarding occultism compared with that of the Secret Doctrine, and yet how careful was its author to encourage and help each and all in their attempts to understand and to explain, correcting only when glaringly false to principles or misapprehending truths.

But perhaps the most insidious and seductive form of the personal equation is that which distorts intelligent appreciation and open loyalty to teachers and earnest workers into hero-worship, and which seeks under the cry of "No Popery" to belittle and detract. Consciously or unconsciously the effort is thus made to shame to silence all appreciation and loyalty to the real workers for the world's progress. "Oh you are a hero-worshiper, and blinded by zeal or personal regard." Independence! Liberty! Equality! these are the real virtues! Have not these dwelt on the lips of red-handed murder also? Such a position is the very apotheosis of Egotism. It seeks to hide a knock-kneed allegiance and a flabby zeal under the bluster of personal liberty, and would reduce the world to a mediocrity of indifference. He who most highly appreciates loyalty and self-sacrifice is he who best knows what they cost in self-denial and eternal vigilance, and instead of being blind to the weaknesses and foibles that may co-exist with these virtues, he is the very one who sees them most clearly, because he is also conscious of them in himself. If he really desires to see the truth triumph, he will welcome every service and honor all who serve it, and not count to the last poor scruple every little weakness till the service of truth and the truth served are buried out of sight.

It hence occurs that the very worst form of the personal equation is this everlasting harping on personalities; and the surest road to Popery is the cry of No Popery! This is one of those "paradoxes of the highest science", as Eliphaz Levy would put it. Those who are really independent and able to stand alone, are not everlastingly prating about liberty. They just do as they please, and please to do right and say nothing about it, but it never occurs to any one that such a person can be enslaved. There is a silent conviction that that would be a useless if not a hazardous experiment. How, then, is confidence to be inspired in others? I answer, by deserving it, and not by prating about it. When it has been thus earned by conflict, neither an army of detractors nor the "hosts of hell" can destroy it; least of all, those weak-kneed, timid souls who are afraid of their personal freedom. We might as well remember that while Brotherhood is universal there is a kinship of souls and cycles and circles in all human associations and relations. Each is drawn to his own circle by Karmic law; the tyrant and the sycophant each obey the law. Those who are earnest and at heart loyal will not bother about trifles, but go ahead with the work in hand. They are not blind even to trifles, but they assign them their true value instead of dwelling on them and magnifying. We have had all these issues in the past, and they will come again and again. They do not affect the Cause or the workers materially, though they may seem to do so for a time. Look at the efforts to kill the T. S. movement. Some through design, some through hatred and revenge, some inspired by blind conceit or hairbrained folly. What did they accomplish? They harmed only their originators and sympathisers, simply because there were always some at the head who took the Masters as facts and ideals, and had devoted themselves to them and their work without any reservation whatever. Did they insist that others should agree with them or come to their conclusions? Never! They just worked, and WORKED, and WORKED! ready to help any and all, patient and pains-taking with all; and individually they would stand to the work if every one else deserted it.

How many such does it take to constitute an invincible guard with Truth and Masters back of them? Very few, for they are few, and yet without these few the poor old T. S. would long ago have gained the limbo of other centuries.

The question no longer regards failure, at least here in America. The question is, how many are ready to work without detraction of other workers? How many will stick to ideals, aims, facts, and—WORK? Those who cannot or will not are not to be anathematized, neither will they guide the work or measure it. They will simply become camp-followers first and deserters later on. Left in the rear they can wrestle with their own Karma. I hold the Masters to be facts, determined by the sequence of all evolution, by history, by direct testimony of H.P.B. and many other witnesses. He who calls this belief or candid statement dogmatic or blindly credulous, simply convicts himself of ignorance of principles, and even of the meaning of words. He can accept or reject my conclusions as he pleases, and I have no war with him till he misconceives or misrepresents my position as being other than it is. Dogmatism builds idols, but it never conceives Ideals. Ideals are the moving fiery chariots of the Gods: the Crown Jewels of the Hierarchies: the themes of the heavenly symphonies: the ultima thule of human evolution: something to strive for, work for, die for if need be, and every royal servant of Truth embodies and gives life to an Ideal such as are the MASTERS.

BEFORE AMERICAN SPIRITUALISM.

SO many persons have come to suppose that Spiritualism took its rise through the rappings at Rochester under the mediumship of the Fox sisters, it may be profitable to reprint a few descriptions of spiritualistic séances which had place a hundred years ago in France, Germany, and other European countries. At that time there were very many inquiring minds looking for the truth. They lived at a time when the Church had complete power, except perhaps in France, as in the latter country the Revolution was in the air. Much of the inquiry was tinctured with prevailing religious thought, and at the same time séances were held very privately. But enough leaked out and was recorded in various ways to indicate that much more of the same kind must have gone on. These extracts are taken from the Theosophical Correspondence between Count Saint Martin and Baron Liebstorf, beginning in 1792.

Nevertheless, as I believe I speak to a man of moderation, calm and discreet, I will not withhold from you that in the school through which I passed, more than twenty-five years ago, communications of all kinds were numerous and frequent, in which I had my share, like many others; and that, in this share, every sign indicative of the Repairer was present. Now you know the Repairer, and active Cause, are one. Nevertheless, as I was introduced by an initiation, and the danger of all initiations is lest we should be delivered over to the violent spirits of the world, as happened to Adam when he initiated himself in his imagination (Incarnation, 3d part, vi. 1), and his desire was not all of God, I cannot answer that the forms which showed themselves to me may not have been assumed forms, for the door is open to all initiations, and this is what makes these ways so faulty and suspicious. I know that Germany is full of these initiations; I know that the Cabinet of Berlin is guided, and leads its King by their means—and, hitherto, without much profit to boast of; I know, in short, that the whole earth is full of these prodigies; but, I repeat, unless things come from the centre itself I do not give them my confidence. I can assure you I have received by the inward way truths and joys a thousand times higher than those I have received from without.

A remarkable instance of this kind, which I heard of about two years ago, is what occurred at the consecration of the Egyptian Masonic Lodge at Lyons, 27th July, 5556, according to their reckoning—which I believe to be incorrect. The labors lasted three days, and the prayers fifty-four hours; there were twenty-seven in the meeting. While the members were praying to the Eternal to manifest His approbation by a visible sign, and the Master was in the middle of his ceremonies, the Repairer appeared and blessed the members assembled. He came down on a blue cloud, which served for vehicle to this apparition; gradually he ascended again on this cloud, which, from the moment of his descent from heaven to earth, acquired a splendor so dazzling that a young girl, C., who was present could not bear its light. The two great prophets and the lawgiver of Isreal also gave signs of their benevolence and approval. Who could reasonably doubt the fervor and piety of those twenty-seven members? . . . I repeat my question: do you believe in physical communications, emanating from or produced in the centre? I call centre, in the poverty of my nomenclature, the interior of our souls; but I know not whether perception of any sort can penetrate to it; yes or no?

I found some old acquaintances at Bale, who, to my surprise, were very advanced in the theory and practice of communications. They told me of an event which had just occurred to a celebrated ecclesiastic of Zurich whom I formerly knew; his name is Lavater. He has received an invitation to go to see some persons of the highest rank in a northern court; not the one you mentioned in one of your letters, whose Cabinet would not move a step without physical consultations [Berlin—Tr.]; the one in question is farther north [Copenhagen—Tr.] Lavater arrived there last summer; he met with men of education engaged in public business and living in the world, occupying high positions—men of acknowledged probity, who, in inviting him, could have no motive but one of goodness, for they even defrayed the expense of his journey. These men assure him that they have immediate communications with the active intelligent Cause; they assure him that one of his friends, dead some time ago, will, through his medium, enter their society. These men promise to enlighten him on subjects upon which he had prayed for light for a long while—on the doctrine of the heavenly food, the great mystery. . . . They tell him also, what is very remarkable, that whenever they are together they have a most intimate experience of the truth of the promise “When two or three are met together in my name, there am I in the midst of them”: since then a cloud, white as snow, descends, and for about half an hour rests upon them. They were convinced that these manifestations were signs and emanations of the active and intelligent Cause:

(1) Because these communications were always had after prayer had been offered to that Cause, and the answers came immediately after the petitions.

(2) Because these manifestations enjoined their love for that Cause.

(3) Because the manifestation which they called Lord, Spirit of the Lord, Image, and Symbol of the Lord, received their adoration, which no good virtue would have dared to do.

(4) Because the answers were given at the same time, in many places, to different persons, and in the same manner.

(5) Because it judged them with severity, and on their sincere repentance it immediately blessed them, and that visibly.

(6) Because whenever they asked it “Art thou the active intelligent Cause?” they were answered “Yes”, which no power, good or bad, would have dared to say.

(7) Because they were quite able to distinguish him from the good and evil intermediate beings which surrounded him.

I thank you for elucidating the new branch of intercourse going on in the North. The great difficulty remains as to the conclusions of our Zurichers: “Art thou the active intelligent Cause?” They answered “‘Yes’, which no intermediate power, good or bad, would have dared to say”. Is this conclusion right or not?—that’s the question.

The father, notwithstanding his attachment to these subaltern initiations, has been gradually led round to my way of thinking by his daughters. What completely gained me the confidence of these young ladies, who may yet open all their soul to the truth, was reading the twelfth and thirteenth chapters of I Corinthians, which the eldest of them opened accidentally. But with the other men, members of this society, and who are men of a certain age, nothing of consequence can be done. They are infected with the idea of the prerogative of having this direct intercourse with the powers.

I have received a quire-full of details of the experiences at Copenhagen. They still glorify themselves in the belief that the light, which, after their questions, gives out the sign "yes" or "no", is a whitish phosphoric color, and not red, because red, or the color of fire, would be a bad species. . . . Just as if it was not as easy to ape a whitish color as a fiery color.

Sometimes they see a star by the side of the light which is their oracle: they know this star represents a virtue. Then they ask: "Dare it remain there?" According to the answer "Yes" or "No", the scholars order, the star obeys.

They sometimes put questions on points of doctrine; for instance they ask: "Is there a passage in Scripture which indisputably proves the metempsychosis?"

"Yes and no."

Some understand this to mean that such passages may be found in the Old Testament, and they again ask:

"Is there any in the New Testament?"

"Yes."

"In the four Evangelists?"

"Yes."

"In St. Matthew?"

"Yes."

"In the first chapter?"

"No."

"In the second?"

"No."

"In the fourth?"

"No."

"In the eleventh?"

"Yes."

"In the four first verses?"

"No."

"In the four next?"

"No."

"In the fourteenth?"

* * *

In this record we find support for certain conclusions. First, that the modus operandi was the same then as it now is in American spiritualism. Second, the alleged spirits showed at that time the same ignorance and want of progress which they have given evidence of ever since. There the communicating spirits of 1792, including the "Great First Cause", spoke in line with the philosophic and religious views of the believers, going no further and knowing no more about God, Nature, or Man than the questioners. This is exactly what is proved by the record of forty years of American Spiritualism. If to this we add the fact, so well known, that the old Greek spiritualists obtained from their mediums at the Temples of the Oracles precise answers to their questions, confirming their own views, we must admit that spiritualism of no matter what kind, in every time, and among all nations, will gain from the unseen powers giving reports and communications no more in respect to philosophy, religion, and the laws of nature and man's constitution than corresponds with the most advanced thought of living believers. In other words, man's true teacher and initiator is himself in the body, and not any intelligence devoid of a body.

AN ALLEGORY.

WALKING within the garden of his heart, the pupil suddenly came upon the Master, and was glad, for he had but just finished a task in His service which he hastened to lay at His feet.

"See, Master," said he, "this is done: now give me other teaching to do."

The Master looked upon him sadly yet indulgently, as one might upon a child which can not understand.

"There are already many to teach intellectual conceptions of the Truth", he replied. "Thinkest thou to serve best by adding thyself to their number?"

The pupil was perplexed.

"Ought we not to proclaim the Truth from the very housetops, until the whole world shall have heard?" he asked.

"And then—"

"Then the whole world will surely accept it."

"Nay", replied the Master, "the Truth is not of the intellect, but of the heart. See!"

The pupil looked, and saw the Truth as though it were a White Light, flooding the whole earth; yet none reaching the green and living plants which so sorely needed its rays, because of dense layers of clouds intervening.

"The clouds are the human intellect", said the Master. "Look again."

Intently gazing, the pupil saw here and there faint rifts in the clouds, through which the Light struggled in broken, feeble beams. Each rift was caused by a little vortex of vibrations, and looking down through the openings thus made the pupil perceived that each vortex had its origin in a human heart.

“Only by adding to and enlarging the rifts will the Light ever reach the earth”, said the Master. “Is it best, then, to pour out more Light upon the clouds, or to establish a vortex of heart force? The latter thou must accomplish unseen and unnoticed, and even unthanked. The former will bring thee praise and notice among men. Both are necessary: both are Our work; but—the rifts are so few! Art strong enough to forego the praise and make of thyself a heart center of pure impersonal force?”

The pupil sighed, for it was a sore question.

HIERONYMUM.

PROOF AS TO MASTERS.

ALWAYS since the first proclamation by Madame Blavatsky and Mr. Sinnett of the existence and work of Masters, there has continued a controversy as to the nature and sufficiency of the evidence. Most persons outside the Theosophical Society reject the doctrine and despise the evidence; many within it regard both as having some plausibility, though to be treated rather as a “pious opinion” than an actual fact; a few are convinced that Masters are an evolutionary necessity as well as a certified reality; and a still smaller number have had their belief fortified by a personal experience which is conclusive. To the first, Masters are a chimera; to the second, a probability; to the third, a truth; to the fourth, a certainty. Is there any reason to suppose that the assurance of the last can be made to extend to the others, and, if so, by what means and upon what lines? This raises the question of the evidence available in the specific case of Masters.

The asserted fact is that there exists a body of exalted men, with faculties, powers, and knowledge enormously transcending those we cognize, who, though usually unseen, are ceaselessly interested in the well-being of humanity and ceaselessly working to promote it. It is an assertion of much the same kind as that there are Angels, though somewhat more unfamiliar, and a not unnatural tendency to distrust novelty prompts to exaction of explicit evidence. Such evidence in such a case may be (a) direct sight, or (b) the execution of marvels impossible to ordinary human beings, or (c) the disclosure of truths unknown to humanity on our level, or (d) an interior influence or impression upon the soul referable to no other source. And yet it is clear that direct sight would not of itself identify a Master, since His physical body is like that of other men, and also that an interior influence or impression would prove nothing to one not already convinced. Hence the evidence demanded is a visible appearance of a Master, coupled with a conclusive display of Occult power or knowledge.

But even this evidence, in the form of testimony, is pronounced inadequate. Various witnesses have deposed to a sight of Masters—Col. Olcott having had repeated interviews with Them, Occult powers have been exhibited, and no small part of the early Theosophical literature is of letters written by Them upon matters beyond the ken of any scientist or historian. The triple fact has received evidence copious in amount, more so, indeed, than have geographical explorations which the civilized world accepts as final. It is rejected, however, by very many readers because merely the assertion of others and therefore not demonstrative. "I must see for myself: if I am to believe that Masters exist, it must be because one has Himself appeared to me or otherwise evidenced certainly His power. Testimony is not proof: only experience can be that." And so a frequent attitude is of entire incredulity until and because a Master gives direct and visible demonstration to each separate critic.

At this point two questions arise: first, to what class of persons have Masters, in fact, vouchsafed proof of their existence?; second, with what object? Inspection of the cases shows that they were of individuals avowedly interested in the cause of humanity and actively at work on its behalf; not curiosity-seekers, not scientists examining a theory under test conditions, not indifferent members of the T. S. And the class discloses the object of their selection; viz. that they should be equipped with fact needful for their efficient work, be assured that the work was actually fostered by the real Founders, be strengthened and impelled by the consciousness of near relation. To reward for zeal and to endow with certainty was the motive of the demonstration.

If this has been the purport of such evidential disclosures of Masters as have been recorded in Theosophical literature, it is fair to infer that it rules in later cases and will persist unchanged. The primary object is not to furnish tested examples whereby an incredulous world may be coerced into acceptance, or even to satisfy lukewarm Theosophists that there is more in the doctrine than they are yet ready to concede. Whether a scoffer or an indifferentist believes in the existence of Masters can hardly be a matter of moment to Masters Themselves, for the absence of interest makes needless an attempt at conviction. Why should a Master concern Himself with demonstrating a fact for which the recipient is unprepared, for which he cares nothing, and of which he would make no use? Why should any power expend itself on a soil suspicious of it, unwilling to receive it, unfitted to utilize it? And if it be urged that irrefragable proof is the first requirement from agents soliciting an intellectual conviction, the answer is that Masters solicit nothing; if that there can be no blame to doubt unremoved by evidence, the answer is that no blame has been imputed, no criminality incurred. The evidence has been to a specific class, for a specific purpose: no one outside of it has material for grievance.

Since the departure of H. P. B. the exhibitions of Masters' activity in the Society, and even of Their interest in individual members, seem to have increasingly multiplied. In the published writings of those nearer to our Unseen Protectors than are we ordinary members, there are very striking indications of a loosening of reserve, a freer disclosure, a more explicit statement, than has ever yet been even supposed possible. Eyes not specially quick to discern have perceived marks of a changing policy, and are prepared for still fuller revelations in a future very near. Nay, on lower levels, in quarters where no favors had been anticipated or even coveted, this enlargement of Adept manifestation has had place. That in certain remarkable instances America should lately have been the scene need surprise no one who remembers H. P. B.'s prophecies of its future. If no proclamation of facts has startled the Section, if no details have crept through the ranks, this means only that the purpose of such manifestation is now, as it was formerly, a reward to faithful workers and an aid to their better work.

Certainly it is conceivable that there are epochs in organized labor and in individual career when extraordinary measures of help are fitting. Crises in work, crises in character, crises in time arise, wherefrom may come a permanent issue for good if all can be guided rightly. It may be that the turning-point means a sudden evolution of energy invaluable in the mission of the Society; or that a wounded spirit, weakened by suffering, needs succor from the Masters of Compassion; or that a group of united workers have reached the stage of fuller union and richer labor. To the Wise Ones all forms of want in Their servants appeal, and in the vast treasury of Adept resource is found every means to meet them. Counsel, sympathy, strengthening, help, revelation of the past and of the future, every necessary aid is at Their disposal; and whether it is transmitted in messages or letters or audible sounds, what matters it if the source is certain and the end secured?

In the more recent, as in the earlier, manifestations of Masters' interest, the recipients and the motive remain the same. It is to Their zealous, faithful servants and friends that the demonstration comes, and it comes as a reward for work, an encouragement, a stimulus to more work. Even if in no one mind had ever moved a doubt as to the assertion "We always help those who help us", there might have been in many a need for help,—and then the help came. But it came on the lines of the assertion.

This very simple truth is filled with a lesson for all Theosophists. There is heard at times a question as to the reality of Masters, or of the sufficiency of its proof, or of Their actual manifestation in the Society. Men say that they will not believe unless they see with their own eyes and test with their own organs. Very well; let it be so. But then they must furnish the condition to the manifestation. It is not intellectual interest or critical acumen or even open-mindedness to proof: it is that sincere and unselfish devotion to the Theosophic Cause, that continuous and whole-souled labor on its behalf, which identifies them in spirit with Masters and makes relations fitting. When they have demonstrated that identification, and when need arises for distinct disclosure, it will be given. Anyone solicitous for proof of Masters should first test his claim to it, and it is easy to query in himself whether he and They are so far alike in aim and effort that it is proper they should meet. If the life is indolent, indifferent, self-seeking, what have the two in common? Why should be conceded to curiosity what is avowedly reserved for service? But if the searching question shows identity of purpose and of zeal, the community of character is assured, and then manifestation in the hour of need becomes a promise. It may not be to the eyes, and it may not be in phenomena or marvel, but it will be abounding and conclusive, and the enriched soul, filled with peace and abiding trust, will rest as upon a rock, doubts and misgivings and forebodings powerless forevermore. "Though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry." "We ALWAYS help those who help us."

ALEXANDER FULLERTON, F.T.S

THE NAME "AMERICA" INDIGENOUS.

THERE were two articles in the August PATH about Sanscrit derivations of the name "America", containing arguments that are far from being convincing. Passing over the geographical error that the Orinoco river, flowing through Venezuela, South America, is in Central America, we find one of the contributors making deductions as to the prehistoric condition of the New World from the fact that it will in the far future become the home of the sixth sub-race of the Fifth Root-Race: which is hardly admissible.

Of course the New World was known to the Initiates of India—as well as of every other country—in ancient times, some of whom may have paid visits to the Mahatmas here, as a Mahatma of Central America (Votan) did to those of the Old World long before the appearance of the conquering Spaniards.<sup>1</sup> But to say that the word "America" was derived from the Sanscrit "Ramayana", or even from "Amra", seems to add what has not sufficient support.

According to profane historians the origin of all ancient races of America is involved in darkness, while even agreeably with esoteric information, India cannot be their cradle.<sup>2</sup> The roots were in Atlantis, for they were the descendants of survivors of the great cataclysms.

We must therefore look to the languages of the New World for a solution of the problem, since the derivation of "America" from the name of its supposed first discoverer, Amerigo Vespucci, has no historical ground upon which to stand.<sup>3</sup> It has only a similarity in sound. It has frequently been pointed out that if the New World were to be named after him, the surname Vespucci would have been used.

In Isis Unveiled<sup>4</sup> H. P. B. said:

Americ, Amerrique, or Amerique is the name in Nicaragua for the high land or mountain range that lies between Juigalpa and Libertad, in the province of Chontales, and which reaches on the one side into the country of the Carcas Indians, and on the other side into the country of the Ramas Indians.

<sup>1</sup>In an ancient Tzendal manuscript, called "Proof that I am a Serpent", which Votan is said to have produced, he speaks of having "passed happily" to the Old World "by an open path, seeking for his brothers, the serpents", and to have witnessed the building of a magnificent temple, presumably at Rome. (Vide Ranking's Historical Researches on the Conquest of Peru.)

This is doubtless an extract from the article "Origin of the Name America",<sup>1</sup> by Jules Marcou, who also explained:

The names of places in the Indian dialects of Central America often terminate in "ique" or "ic", which seems to mean "great", "elevated", "prominent", and is always applied to mountain ranges.

These unconquered Indians, as said by Marcou, "have remained the same as they were when Colombo first visited them in 1502". This theory of the derivation of the word has been a much-debated subject.<sup>2</sup> For example, at the Eighth International Congress of Americanists, held in Paris in 1890, it was vigorously discussed. As said in the American Naturalist:<sup>3</sup>

The first question . . . was that presented in 1875 and discussed at nearly every Congress since: whether the name "America" given to the Western continent was not taken from the chain of mountains of a similar name which form cordilleras between Lake Nicaragua and the Mosquito Coast, rather than from the discoverer, Americus Vespuccius?

Strange to say, the presiding officer decided in favor of the latter; but even though the theory rejected at this Congress has not much historical support, we may confidently look to the Incas for a better one. "America" was spelled variously in the first maps and documents, as: "Amaraca",<sup>4</sup> "Amerioco" and "Amerioca",<sup>5</sup> "Maraca",<sup>6</sup> "Moraca",<sup>7</sup> as well as "America". From Humboldt<sup>8</sup> we learn that the first settlement of Spaniards on the mainland was at Amaraca-pana. The native word "pana" was, according to Sir Walter Raleigh, the equivalent of "country". (See also Del Canto's Arte y Vocabulario, 1614 A.D.) He spoke of the "bewtiful valley of Americo-pana". Ojeda, with Amerigo Vespucci as a passenger, explored this section, writing an account of it. Herrera<sup>9</sup> says that "finally he arrived at a port where they saw a village on the shore—called Maraca-ibo by the natives", who gazed "in a state of stupefaction" at the Spaniards, and upon their landing treated them "as if they were angels". But the unsophisticated natives had abundant occasion later to alter their estimate of their conquerors. Raleigh frequently mentioned the name as though it were derived from the natives, as for example:

I was informed of one of the Cassiques [Chiefs] of the valley of Amariocapana, which had buried with him, a little before our arrival, a chaire of golde most curiously wrought.

Some of the names of the Incarial cities were Pult-Amarca, And-Amarca, Cax-Amaraca, Cassa-Amarca, Cundin-Amarca, and Cant-Amarca; while some of the provinces were called Amarca, Cax-Amarca, And-Amarca, Cat-Amarca, and (French) Tamraqua, according the maps of the fifteenth century.<sup>1</sup> As another proof that these names came from the Incas may be quoted the work of Don Luis Fernandez Piedrahita, Canon of the Metropolitan Church of Bogotá, etc., New Grenada, published in 1688,<sup>2</sup> that "Cundin-Amaraca—as the heathens call it—was the most important kingdom after Peru and Mexico". He also informs us that "when any one died from the bite of a snake, the sign of the cross was placed on the tomb".<sup>3</sup> This cross was, according to Roëny,<sup>4</sup> the ancient Incarial sign for the word "amaru", and which, with the addition of the word "ca" ("land"), represents the sacred national name, America.

Much more such evidence is to be found in the Discovery of the Origin of the Name of America, by Thos. de St. Bris, who is entitled to great credit for showing the falsity of attributing the derivation of the word from the supposed discoverer of the New World, Amerigo Vespucci. Among other things he said:

The chief kingdom in the western hemisphere, when Columbus landed, was Amaraca, or America, whose Inca kings claimed descent from the Aymara race of Aymaraca, the earliest known of the existing population, from whom these monarchs—who resembled them—got some of their arts and religious ceremonies. The national history of America names "Saint Amaraca or America, the Capital", as the first city of their empire. . . . The Amaru or holy cross of these people was conspicuous there, as in all the chief cities of [ancient] America. It was the central object of adoration in the immense sacred ruins at Palenca—from which the continent was probably first called "Land of the Holy Cross". . . . Cassa-Amaraca was the sacred royal necropolis, and near it is Pult-Amarca, where the sulphur springs are still called "the Kings' Baths". Yan-Amaraca was their Hercules, from "yan" ("behold"), the present indicative of the verb "yanhal" ("to be"). "Behold America" was an appropriate name for the American Hercules. There was Vin-Amarca, in the gulf where Manco Capac, the prince of American legislators and first Inca king, received his divine vocation. Then there were the cities of Ang-Amarca, Chenpi-Amerca, Uria-Amaraca, Cat-Amarca, Call-Amarca, and Pa-tinamit-Amarca, or "America the Capital", the only one which appears in their ancient documents and sacred history, as the foundation of their kingdom. (pp. 90-84.)

The most illustrious national name of America was therefore sacred to her people, written in their pictorial writing by a snake crossing a straight line, and called Amaru, the great Sun. (p. 123.)

Careful research—for which I have not the time—would doubtless reveal further proof, but I trust that enough has been given to convince our East Indian brethren that from the ancient West Indians came the present name of the New World. It is pleasing to note that “America” had a sacred significance,<sup>1</sup> and may it be a good omen for the time when the people of the New World shall have evolved into a “grander and far more glorious race than any we know of at present.”<sup>2</sup>

JOHN M. PRYSE.

THIS interesting article throws a good deal of light on the origin of the name “America” with us, but does not give its ultimate origin, as in the citations there is no evidence as to wherefrom came to the Incas and others the name. It is assumption to say they did not get it from India: all that can be said is that the natives had the name before the Conquest. If it is proven that India is not the cradle of nations, we might then be safe in thinking we had the ultimate source of our name, but as the weight of opinion is to-day—until changed—in favor of India being the origin of people and nations, the presumption raised from the philological argument out of the Sanscrit must stand for the present.—EDITOR.

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Editor of the PATH:

DEAR SIR:

In the August PATH you refer to Mrs. Besant as my “friend and teacher”. Friend, I am glad to say, yes: Teacher, no, except in the sense that all people learn from each other. For a generation now I have had a settled habit of thinking and working things out for myself. I was a materialist years before I heard of Mrs. Besant, a socialist long before she was, and I joined the Theosophical Society before she did.

Truly yours,

HERBERT BURROWS.

LITERARY NOTES.

AUGUST THEOSOPHIST. Incredible as it may seem, “Old Diary Leaves XVII” is not contributed by Mr. Richard Hodgson, Dr. Coues, or “M.C.”, but by H.P.B.’s colleague and friend, the co-Founder of the T.S. A very rational defense of polygamy is given in "Olla Podrida"; Mr. S. E. Gopalacharlu, whose death is elsewhere announced, has a long and able review of Prof. Max Müller's Psychological Religion; Mr. Old's "Predictive Art in India" tells of his failure with Govinda Chetty but great success with a young Brahmin in Kumbakonum; and F. W. Thurstan concludes his paper on "Divination and Augury in a Modern Light", the first paragraph seeming rather speculative, not to say imaginary, than sure. The Book Reviews are unusually full and able. [A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI. No. 9, contains three articles extracted from the Theosophist, of which the first, "Occult Physiology", is very learned and minute, and may be less fanciful than might at first appear. The supply of original matter seems to be running short in the repertory of Siftings. Why not take down stenographically and print some of the addresses of Mrs. Besant, Mr. Mead, Bertram Keightley, and others before the Blavatsky Lodge? [A.F.]

PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.

ARRIVAL OF THE FOREIGN DELEGATES.

MRS. BESANT, Prof. Chakravarti, Mr. Dharmapala, and Miss Müller reached New York in the City of Paris on September 2d, the two former then accepting the hospitality of Mr. E. A. Neresheimer, the two latter that of Mr. H. T. Patterson of Brooklyn. The next evening, Sunday, Mrs. Besant lectured in Harlem before the "H. P. B." Branch to a densely crowded hall, numbers being turned away, Mr. Dharmapala and Prof. Chakravarti before the Aryan Branch, a like state of things existing. Mr. Dharmapala was unfortunately obliged to leave for Chicago on Monday, but on Tuesday evening the three other delegates addressed the Aryan Branch, the hall being again crowded. Miss Müller spoke on "International Brotherhood", the Professor on "Spiritual Progress", Mrs. Besant on "The Aim of Life". The meeting adjourned shortly after one hour in order that members of the Brooklyn, Harlem, and New York Branches might be presented to each of the delegates. On Wednesday the Professor and Mrs. Besant met a number of Theosophists in the Aryan Hall, and replied most interestingly to questions. On Friday, accompanied by the General Secretary, they left for a lecture in Cincinnati, to go thence to Chicago. Miss Müller is slight in figure, of easy speech and kindly manner, and greatly pleased all who met her. Leaving so soon for the Maschmedt Farm, her stay was short. Mr. Dharmapala is tall, dark, and very spare, ready in English, and with a peculiarly cordial and friendly manner, winning hearts everywhere. He intoned various Tamil slokas and the sentences used in the taking of pansil, exciting much interest. Prof. Chakravarti is tall and stout, his complexion light and very clear, face young and with only a small moustache, voice not strong but capable of much expression rising at times to almost eloquence, this greatly assisted by his remarkable fluency in English. His bearing is dignified, yet so gentle, courteous, and friendly that every one felt for him a warm personal regard. Singularly spiritual, and copiously endowed with Theosophic knowledge and the results of Eastern training, the emotion he all-unconsciously produces is of reverence and docility. As he gently expounded the practical lessons of duty or intoned the Sanscrit sacred prayers, he seemed the very type of an advanced mystic. To have heard him is a privilege; to have met him, a benediction. Of Mrs. Besant no description to any one in this age is necessary. Like that illustrious lady, her colleagues beam with "gentle worthiness", the spirit of the truest, kindest, most fraternal interest, which instantly touches the heart and soon warms admiration into enthusiasm. Cordial and unassuming and sympathetic, the gracious trio illustrate the "Doctrine of the Heart". If the Parliament of Religions did nothing else, it brought them to our shores.

On their way from Chicago Mrs. Besant and Prof. Chakravarti diverged for lectures at Toledo and Toronto, and on Sunday, Sep. 24th, she lectured in Brooklyn and he in Washington, D. C. At the same date Mrs. I. C. Oakley, coming on from Chicago, lectured in Boston. On Tuesday evening, 26th, they all, together with Miss Müller, attended the Aryan regular meeting, and again a crowded house listened with delight. Upon its close they boarded the City of Paris, and early on the 27th were carried away from the land they had blessed and the friends who blessed them.

THEOSOPHICAL CONGRESS.

THE SESSIONS of the Parliament of Religions of which the Theosophical Congress was a part were held in a large grey stone building erected in a small park on the Lake front in Chicago, near Van Buren street and within a few feet of the tracks of the Illinois Central R.R. The building is called the Art Palace, and is intended for permanent use as a picture gallery. Hardly a more noisy place for any purpose could have been selected, as every moment trains were rushing by, engines puffing, and bells ringing. Sometimes the voice of the speaker would be utterly unable to cope with the heavy snorting of freight and shunting engines at work outside the window. Thus the material civilization of the day, in the most rushing city of the West, put the Parliament of Religions at a disadvantage. Two large halls called respectively "Columbus" and "Washington" were devoted to the daily Parliament, the other smaller halls being used for Congresses. The large ones took up the entire back of the building, being, in fact, made by the use of a temporary partition in the middle of the space. Temporary but strong galleries were also constructed, and each of these two large halls seated three thousand people.

The delegates to the Theosophical Parliament began to arrive at Chicago by the 11th. Prof. Chakravarti was invited by the manager of the Parliament to attend the opening on the 11th, when the foreign delegates were received. They met in the Art Building on the Lake Front, down town near Van Buren street. A great crowd was present. Bros. W. Q. Judge and G. N. Chakravarti were given seats on the platform, and thus on the first day the Theosophical Society was fully recognized. This may be taken as significant, especially when added to the fact that the Chairman of the Parliament informed our body that the violent abuse heaped on Theosophy and H. P. B. by the Psychical Congress of a few days before was unwarrantable, wholly outside the spirit of the Auxiliary, and contrary to the wishes of the president.

A great deal of time was wasted by various speakers who really ran away with the meeting, all of them being Protestants or Catholics. But at the afternoon session our turn came, and Prof. Chakravarti boldly said he represented the Theosophical Society, was brought by it, and was a Brahmin. He made an excellent speech of fifteen minutes in length, and created great enthusiasm in the vast audience. While going out, hundreds rushed forward to shake his hand. This ended our part in the general opening proceedings. Newspaper reports of the meeting favorably and prominently mentioned Theosophy, so that we may be assured that by no means have our efforts failed, but that greater success has shown itself in the very beginning than we might have hoped for. A reception was given to the foreign delegates on the evening of the 14th. The business of arranging program and getting visitors settled took up the remaining time.

As our Congress was not to sit until the fifteenth, a reception and general meeting was held at the Chicago headquarters in Van Buren street, when the following were present as delegates to the Congress: Prof. G. N. Chakravarti. William Q. Judge, Annie Besant, George E. Wright, Claude F. Wright, Dr J. D. Buck, Mrs. M. M. Thirds, Dr. J. A. Anderson, Mrs. I. Cooper-Oakley, and Miss F. Henrietta Müller. Besides these, there were great numbers of members from the city and all parts of the U.S., so that all sections of the Society were represented.

CONGRESS. FIRST SESSION.

Delegates and speakers met at the Hall early September 15th, and Room 8 was assigned. This was packed in a moment, and, five minutes before the hour for opening, the managers of the Parliament gave us Room 7, able to hold 1500 people. That was completely filled very quickly, and the first session began there. But such crowds came and so many were turned away that the managers gave us two more halls for two overflow meetings. The Chairman of the Local Committee, Bro. George E. Wright, opened the proceedings, saying that the occasion was an event of wide importance and great significance. He then turned the Congress over to William Q. Judge, as Vice-President Theosophical Society, who took the chair. A cable message was received from Col. H. S. Olcott, which the chair requested Annie Besant to read:

COL. H. S. OLCOTT, President T.S., to WM. Q. JUDGE, Vice-President T.S., at T.S. Congress Religious Parliament, Chicago:

Across seas and continents your Asiatic brethren salute you, mingling their congratulations with yours for this auspicious opportunity to tell the representatives of many nations and of the world's great faiths the fraternal message of Theosophy. From ancient temples and rock-cut fanes the voices of the ancient Teachers once more utter the words of wisdom that showed our ancestors the true Path to happiness, liberation, and spiritual peace. May the blessing of the Sages be with you all, and may the truth prevail.

H. S. OLCOTT, P. T. S.

September 14, 1893.

Prof. Chakravarti then addressed the audience, delivering a very good address which was listened to with the deepest attention, especially his recitation of several Sanscrit verses. At several points he evoked applause. Meanwhile people were crowding every available space, and filled up the doors, while hundreds were turned away. Annie Besant followed him in a magnificent oration which was applauded continually. She dwelt on the perfectibility of man, and the fact that great Masters continually preserved the Truth and promulgated it as needed. Bro. Dharmapala was suffering from cold and made but a few remarks. He had been so over-worked as not to be able to prepare for the occasion. Miss Müller followed upon the Hebrew books, but was unable to finish her paper in the time allotted.

SECOND SESSION.

The second session was opened by Dr. Buck's paper on "Theosophy in Greek, Gnostic, and Mediæval Philosophy", in which he showed its presence in all the times covered by those historical periods. He was followed by Mrs. Thirds; but her voice was hardly able to overcome the constant racket outside on the railway, and she did not complete her paper. Mrs. Isabel Cooper-Oakley followed upon the "Constitution of Man and the Cosmos", showing how the Septenary Law prevailed throughout nature and was taught in Theosophy to apply to Man's constitution. She used the idea of his being a mirror very effectively, and was much applauded. The session was closed by Prof. Chakravarti, who explained the various states of consciousness as taught in Brahmanism, and pointed out that the evolution of the Soul proceeds along these lines. Deep interest was manifested in this.

This session was as full as the first. Crowds were constantly coming and not being able to get in, and the managers of the Parliament were beginning to think that our Congress was attracting more attention than the whole Parliament.

THIRD SESSION.

Friday evening the third session opened in the same hall, crowded as before, and that long before the meeting. The daily press had given much space to our meetings, and great interest was aroused. Dr. Anderson read a paper on "Reincarnation as applied to the sexes", and Bro. Judge and Annie Besant dealt with "Karma and Brotherhood". Annie Besant insisted that man required justice and not favoritism, with which the packed audience seemed to agree, as they applauded to the echo after she said "It is not worth while to be saved unless all else are saved with us". Mrs. Cooper-Oakley took up a part of the subject assigned to Bro. Judge, leaving him "Brotherhood". She showed that death had really no terrors, as it was only a name for a change of consciousness.

FOURTH SESSION.

Sessions of the sixteenth began promptly in Hall 7, which as before was crammed long before the gavel fell. Bro. Judge referred to remarks as to why our Congress had no prayers and no doxology. He said the reason was in the words of Jesus, who commanded men not to pray in public. This was much cheered. Claude F. Wright then managed to make a statistical paper very interesting, and he read also the matter sent by Col. Olcott, showing numerous schools in Ceylon and India under the auspices of the T.S. He was followed by Prof. Chakravarti, who held that the mission of the T.S. is to unite East and West, to bring the heart from the East, and join it to the head from the West. On the subject of the absolute unsectarianism of the T.S., Bro. Judge showed that such was the law and fact, although each member was free to state his own opinion. He said that the day when the T.S. should formulate any doctrine but Universal Brotherhood would be the day for it to die; it had, as a Society, nothing to do with civic affairs, though its influence must be great in making its members obey the law; but laws were now in existence unexecuted and evaded, enough to cure our civic troubles, but laws were useless so long as men did not wish to follow truth. The oration of this session was by Annie Besant on "Social Problems". Practically she showed her women hearers how they evaded the law and helped oppression when they purchased cheap goods that could not be made without oppressing the poor who made them. She asked that the system of competition prevailing in business and schools should be abolished. Earnestly she asked all to serve their fellows and thus without new laws to execute all and kill out hatred. A sombre vein runs through her speeches that now and then makes people feel that Theosophy offers only martyrdom. But such is not the case, as renunciation is the messenger of joy. In time she will present less of martyrdom and more of joy.

FIFTH SESSION.

The fifth session went according to program and was as crowded as the others, almost as many as attended being turned away. It is quite certain that if the entire building had been one vast room, our Congress would have filled it.

LAST SESSION.

The last session of the Congress held in the great hall of Washington at 8 p. m. was crowded. The hall seats three thousand. On the platform were Dr. Buck, Annie Besant, Miss Müller, Mrs. Cooper-Oakley, Mrs. Thirds, Prof. Chakravarti, William Q. Judge, George E. Wright, Claude F. Wright, Mrs. Mayer, Mrs. and Miss Leonard, and a great many other members. Dr. Buck presided. Bro. Judge began with an address on "Karma, Reincarnation, and Brotherhood"; Dr. Buck spoke on the "Objects of the T.S."; Prof. Chakravarti dwelt on the "Theory of Cosmogony" in a highly metaphysical address; and Annie Besant closed in a magnificent address on the "Brotherhood of Man". She illustrated the existence of Divinity in Man by a thrilling story of a mining disaster in England when the roughest of men fought for place to give help to others.

SUNDAY EVENING SESSION.

So much interest had been shown in our meetings, evidenced by the crowds that attended them, the crowds turned away, and the gradual rise of the newspaper barometer until the head-lines for reports of Parliament were all Theosophical, other bodies getting only sub-heads, that the managers of the Parliament gave us the free use of Hall of Washington for Sunday night to say what we pleased on our subject. At the same time the Presbyterians were holding their sessions in the Hall of Columbus, it also having space for 3,000. Our hall was jammed with an audience which waited from 8 to 10.30 p.m. Dr. Buck was in the chair. Bro. Judge opened with an address on "Cyclic Law," holding that Reincarnation was an expression of Cyclic Law, and showing how cycles prevailed in day, month, year, thought, civilization, race, through life and death. In the middle of his speech the great joke of the Parliament came on. Dr. Barrows, chairman of all and a leading minister in the city, came on the platform and broke in upon the speaker in the middle of a word. He said that the Presbyterians were to have met in that hall, but were changed to the other one behind, that many ministers had come many miles to read papers, and that doubtless the Presbyterian audience was in the wrong hall; he asked for them to have a chance to follow him to the next hall. Bro. Judge asked all who wished to go to do so, but not a person moved. Dr. Barrows went out alone, and twenty-five more people came in. We heard that less than one hundred persons were in the other hall. This is a fair illustration of the great success of our congress. The audience could not help but laugh at Dr. Barrows' predicament, for which the speaker was sorry, but certainly it was an assumption that led him to think Presbyterians would desert a Theosophical meeting as soon as they should hear where a Presbyterian one was going on.

Dr. Anderson spoke on the wrong way materialistic civilization makes men live; Miss Müller, speaking on "Woman and Theosophy", gave St. Paul some hard slaps that made the audience laugh. Mrs. Cooper Oakley dwelt upon "Devotion", giving extracts from the Voice of the Silence which were evidently of deep interest to the audience; Dharmapala spoke for Buddhism. He assured the people that he loved America. Prof. Chakravarti spoke on the "Higher and the Lower Self", giving some beautiful Hindu allegories with explanations. His speech was a good test of the interest, for it was quite long and very mystical, yet not a person moved and applause closed his speech. He referred to Max Müller's assertion that there was no esotericism in the Hindu books, and said that Prof. Müller did not understand the subject at all and was not a complete master of Sanscrit; the Sanscrit works are full of esotericism and every educated Brahmin knew it very well. Mrs. Besant then wound up the evening in a practical address. She spoke of evil lives led by men and women, and how that reacted on society, insisting on plain living and high thinking, thus rendering full return for every service received, thus performing every duty in life as Theosophy insists. Immense applause followed, and it took the 3500 people present some time to disperse. Of course many wanted to keep up the pernicious habit of shaking hands with speakers, and especially with one quite exhausted. One woman actually stood about on the platform to "get our vibrations", as she said. It is to be hoped she may read these lines and know that she is classed by us as a human vampire, an ugly word, but that and sponge are just the same.

Members of the Chicago T. S. Branches worked hard at the Congress in distributing programmes and tracts and selling books, keeping doors closed and directing people. Many of them sacrificed themselves, as they could not hear the proceedings at all. Bros. Ury, Smith, Leonard, and others, and Sisters Thirds, Kelly, and others all worked thus. We name none others simply for want of space. All worked hard; Bros. Jno. Pryse and Harding of the Aryan T.S. were also at work there. Great credit is due, then, to the Chicago members of all parts of the city. And to Bro. Geo. E. Wright must be given the palm, for he was not merely a formal chairman of the Local Committee; he was a real worker who, knowing well all officials, was able doubtless to procure for us the great courtesy and kindness the Managers accorded.

A marked feature that made everything smooth and pleasant was the boundless hospitality extended to the visitors. The delegates were entertained by various members who gave themselves and their houses up to the work; everything was fraternal, and no needless formalities interfered with effort; how different it would have been had foolish formality or petty jealousies been indulged in! The beginning of the nucleus of Brotherhood may be regarded as realized.

In fine, to sum up, the unprejudiced observer must say that the real Parliament of Religions was in fact the Theosophical Congress.

Bro. A. S. Brolley of Albany, assisted by Bro. Theo. S. Solomons of San Francisco, volunteered as stenographer and took reports of the proceedings.

A complete verbatim report of the proceedings will be made up by the General Secretary, and when ready, notice will be given. It is likely the Executive Committee will order one free copy to go to each Branch in the world, but quite likely a small charge will be made for others, as the size of the report threatens to be greater than gratis distribution will permit. Whatever the decision on this, members ought to see that the report shall have a world-wide distribution.

AMERICA.

"H. P. B." T. S. Sunday evening lectures in September were: 3d, The Masters, Mrs. Annie Besant; 10th, Reality in Theosophy, Alex. Fullerton; 17th, Theosophy and Occultism, Jos. H. Fussell; 24th, The Consolations of Theosophy, Alex. Fullerton.

MRS. I. C. OAKLEY of London lectured before the Bandhu Branch of Santa Cruz, Calif., on Sept. 4th. Her subject was "The Life and Works of H. P. Blavatsky", that ever-thrilling topic to Theosophists. For an hour afterwards she was occupied in responding to questions.

DR. JEROME A. ANDERSON of San Francisco visited the Aryan Branch, New York, on September 12th, and delivered an address on "The Philosophy of Vibration" which was one of the ablest and most interesting ever heard in its career. Dr. Anderson's words, like Mrs. Besant's, should never be lost, but should be stenographically taken down and preserved in print for enduring edification.

BROOKLYN T. S. Sunday evening lectures in September were: 10th, Reincarnation, Dr. J. A. Anderson; 17th, Work-a-day Theosophy, H. A. Freeman.

ARYAN T.S. Sunday evening lectures in September were: 10th, Essentials of Theosophic Progress, Claude F. Wright; 17th, Reality in Theosophy, A. Fullerton; 24th, The Pilgrimage of the Soul, J. H. Fussell.

BLAVATSKY T.S., was visited by Mr. Burcham Harding on his lecturing tour, and on August 27th listened to his address on "The Human Soul", 150 persons filling the rooms. The presence of so sterling and energetic a Theosophist infused a new and healthy glow into the Branch work. Prof. Chakravarti lectured in the Opera House on Sunday evening, September 24th.

MARRIAGE. On September 1st, Mr. C. H. Maschmedt, through whose generosity the "Maschmedt Farm" at South Corinth, N.Y., was opened this summer as a Theosophical Rest House, and Miss Mamie A. Bellows of Brooklyn, who helped so greatly to make it successful, were joined together in Holy Matrimony at the latter's home. The good wishes of many who found rest in the Home and pleasure in their society will help to make a happy union even happier. The event assures permanent residence and the continuance of the Home throughout the year, the establishment of a Branch, and the prosecution of the remarkable Theosophic work heretofore reported. May the richest Karma ever follow these excellent F.T.S.!

OBITUARY. Mr. J. Guilford White, President of the Blavatsky T.S., Washington, D.C., left this incarnation on the second of September. Bro. White had long been bed-ridden from consumption, and during his distressing illness his constant thought and care were for the well-being of the T.S. The end was peaceful and beautiful, his last words being of cheering and kindly advice to his family and of loving messages to friends: of himself he said but little. His loss, following so closely upon that of the devoted secretary, Capt. Boush, is hard to bear, but the Branch is resolved to double its efforts and to make his gain its.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

SAN FRANCISCO T.S. has a rapidly growing attendance at its meetings, from sixty to seventy coming every Tuesday evening.

MRS. COOPER-OAKLEY, who has been in Australia, arrived at San Francisco on August 31st, and was met by the Theosophists of that district with enthusiasm. She at once began work there. On the third of September, she lectured at Odd Fellows' Hall on "Theosophy and Schools of Occultism". Later another lecture was given by her at Oakland, September 6th, in Hamilton Hall, on "Mme. Blavatsky, her Life and Work". Mrs. Cooper-Oakley makes a very pleasant impression on all the members, and beyond doubt will have great effect in the way of further solidifying the ranks. Her devotion is certain, and intimacy in the past with H.P.B. has done the good that always came to those who knew how to value that great woman. On the fourteenth of September, Mrs. Oakley attended the meeting at Chicago as one of those who are to be at our Congress.

WILLAMETTE T.S., Portland, Oregon, had public Sunday evening lectures in September: 3d, Solving the Problems of Life, Mrs. M. E. Martin; 10th, Dual Man, Martin Quinn; 17th, Three Bodies,—Astral, Kama Rupa, and Mayavic, A. R. Read; 24th, Ancient Religions and Modern Creeds, W. H. Galvani.

LOS ANGELES T.S. has, through no small struggle by the devoted ones, secured large airy rooms, centrally located, and making a lecture-room seating seventy or eighty people. It is delightful to hear that it has been named "Blavatsky Hall", the very term to choose for a region where so much life and work have been paralyzed by small suspicions of H.P.B. and unintelligent carping on her personal peculiarities. There will be no such paralysis if the now-active Los Angeles Branch keeps her name and image well to the fore, imitating her devotion instead of pecking at her character, and leaving the disaffected alone to revel in their grumbling. All things look promising. There is a Free Circulating Library; also a Friday evening class of study, and a Wednesday evening Branch meeting. Sunday evening public lectures in September were: 3d, The Hammer of Thor, G. W. Aylesworth; 10th, Death—Whence?, Mrs. L. E. Giese; 17th, One Life or Many, Dr. G. F. Mohn; 24th, The Common Sense of Theosophy, Mrs. Emily Penning.

DR. GRIFFITHS, Pacific Coast Lecturer, has visited McMinnville, Independence, Salem (two lectures), Corvallis, Albany (two lectures), Oregon. At Albany some twelve or fifteen ministers from the Methodist Conference attended, the Bishop having devoted his sermon to a denunciation of Theosophy, and the Hall, ante-rooms, and even door-steps, were packed. One minister attempted interruptions, but was put down by the audience. The whole city seems agog with interest, and literature is eagerly demanded. On August 29, Dr. Griffiths lectured in Eugene City to a good audience, and on September 1st, in Roseburg, where a Presbyterian minister tried ridicule and only received it. On September 6th, the Lecturer spoke in Medford, and both there and at Jacksonville a Quiz meeting was subsequently held. Dr. E. Kirchgessner, formerly President of Varuna Branch, Bridgeport, Conn., now resides in Medford, and it was his T.S. work there which opened the way to Dr. Griffith's visit. There is hope of a Branch. On the 9th, the lecture was at Ashland, where an Orientalist attempted to combat it by relating Eastern allegories to show the absurdity of Eastern and Theosophical philosophy. The lecturer explained them and showed their identity with those in the Bible, and the audience coincided.

INDIAN NOTES.

EXTRACTED FROM THEOSOPHIST.

NOTICE BY THE PRESIDENT T.S. Colonel Olcott begs that all official business should be sent him as well as all remittances for Headquarters, and states that hereafter he will keep all T.S. funds in his own custody.

A T.S. HINDU SCHOOL FOR BOYS has been established at Pakur, the salary of the teacher being contributed by the Branch and its President.

AT MADANAPALLE, members daily meet to read such books as Letters that have helped me, Vedic Lectures, and Bhagavad-Gita. There is also a school-boys' class here.

MUTTRA T.S. has translated Theosophical pamphlets into the vernacular.

STUDENTS' H.P.B. CLUB was started in May at Ludhiana where Bro. Rai B. K. Laheri lives. They desire to improve young men and direct their thoughts to Universal Brotherhood. Theosophical leaflets are distributed. Combarore was visited by W. R. Old, who stayed there three days lecturing on Theosophy, on Hypnotism, Thought Impression, and Yoga.

THE INDIAN SECTION reports a balance on hand July 21 of rupees 2,268; 10; 8.

CEYLON.

THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY'S SCHOOLS, it is reported, are to get government aid, although missionaries tried to prevent it. The Government School agent in his report compliments the Society for its school work. Seventeen Schools are reported as existing.

THE LATE S. E. GOPALA CHARLU.

GOPALA CHARLU was the Recording Secretary and Treasurer of the Theosophical Society at Adyar Headquarters until his death as alleged from epilepsy on the 26th of July; the President reports that he in fact committed suicide and was a heavy defaulter, not only to the Theosophical Society but also to others his friends, relatives, and acquaintances. The funds of the Theosophical Society were constantly going through his hands, and at each Convention he made a report to that body and arranged matters so that his accounts were passed as correct, no fraud appearing on the papers submitted. But the funds were abstracted by means of various devices, and now that he has passed beyond our control nothing remains but to see how the losses can be made good. Of course the deficit must come from Theosophists, and therefore when the news was received in England those whose names appear on the following documents took the steps indicated. The total sum reported by the President as abstracted amounts to Rupees 8,649 and some fractions. About twenty dollars only of the Permanent Fund was taken. From the Subba Row medal fund there was taken rupees 600; from the H.P.B. Memorial fund rupees 3,763 odd; from Col. Olcott's pension fund rupees 2,6r2 odd and a private gift recently sent to him. This memorandum is not exact, but is meant to show the substantial facts and how so much of the money was rather permanent in the character of fund than current income.

LONDON, August 24th, 1893.

To the President-Founder:

MY DEAR COLONEL OLCOTT,

All here are deeply grieved at the sad news of our Brother Gopala Charlu's crimes against the Society and himself. Him we cannot aid; but as we have learned from our Teacher, H. P. Blavatsky, that our duty is to shield and serve the Society at all sacrifices personal to ourselves, we take on ourselves the defalcations of our Brother, and send you a guarantee of repayment, sending also at once two hundred pounds towards the discharge of the liability thus incurred.

Yours fraternally,

for the guarantors,

(Signed) ANNIE BESANT.

MEMORANDUM OF GUARANTEE.

WE, THE UNDERSIGNED, hereby guarantee to make good to the Theosophical Society the sum or sums belonging to the said Society which have been misappropriated by the late Pandit S. E. Gopala Charlu, its Treasurer, and we hereby make ourselves personally responsible for the repayment to the said Society of all such monies on or before the first day of August, eighteen hundred and ninety-five, and we have already remitted the sum of two hundred pounds (£200) in part payment of the same.

DATED at London, England, on the twenty-fourth day of August, eighteen hundred and ninety-three.

[Per pro. A.B.] (Signed)

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE, *Vice-Pres. T.S.*BERTRAM KEIGHTLEY, *Gen. Sec'y Indian Section.*G. R. S. MEAD, Gen. Sec'y European Section.

ANNIE BESANT.

ARCHIBALD KEIGHTLEY.

JULIA W. L. KEIGHTLEY.

We determined to take this step in order to reintegrate the funds of the T.S. which were, of course, in the charge of the President acting through agents who have proven unfaithful; we feel that such a heavy burden should not be on his mind, however legally free he may be from blame. And any member in the American Section who feels as we do and is able to spare any donation toward helping on this end can send whatever is donated to me, specially notifying me for what it is intended. The two hundred pounds already sent as per the above papers amount to about rupees three thousand, thus leaving about five thousand rupees more.

THE SECRET DOCTRINE, NEW EDITION.

THE NEW and revised edition of the Secret Doctrine, consisting of two large octavo volumes with an Index bound as a supplementary volume, will be issued to the public in America at $12.50 carriage paid. The first volume will shortly be ready for delivery, and any one who now sends a subscription of $10.50 will receive the first volume as soon as completed, and the second and the index in due course of publication. The second volume will probably be issued soon after Christmas.

The Index with a key showing the relation of the new paging to that of the old edition, will also be sold separately, but the price is not yet fixed.

The PATH will receive subscriptions for the new edition, at the subscription price of $10.50 until December 31st, 1893, only.

Think of and seek out the tiny, brilliant ray that emanates from the soul connecting it with the body and the mind; it is power and glory.—Palm Leaves.

OCCULT ARTS.

No. I.

(CONCLUDED.)

PRECIPITATION.

THE outer senses cannot give a safe final judgment upon a precipitated message, they can only settle such physical questions as how it came, through whom, the credibility of the person, and whether any deception on the objective plane has been practiced. The inner senses, including the great combining faculty or power of intuition, are the final judges. The outer have to do solely with the phenomenal part, the inner deal with the causes and the real actors and powers.

As precipitations have been phenomenally made through "controlled" mediums who are themselves ignorant of the laws and forces at work, these are but strange phenomena proving the existence of a power in Nature either related to human mind or wholly unrelated to it. These are not the exercise of Occult Arts, but simply the operation of natural law, however recondite and obscure. They are like the burning of a flame, the falling of water, or the rush of the lightning, whereas when the Adept causes a flame to appear where there is no wick, or a sound to come where there is no vibrating visible surface, occult art is using the same laws and forces which with the medium are automatically and unconsciously operated by subtle parts of the medium's nature and "nature spirits", as well as what we know as kama-lokic human entities, in combination. And here the outer senses deal solely with the outer phenomena, being unable to touch in the least on the unseen workings behind. So they can only decide whether a physical fraud has been practiced; they can note the day, the hour, the surrounding circumstances, but no more.

But if one hitherto supposed to be in communication with the White Adepts comes to us and says "Here is a message from one of Those", then if we have not independent power in ourselves of deciding the question on inner knowledge, the next step is either to believe the report or disbelieve it. In the case of H. P. B., in whose presence and through whom messages were said to come from the White Adepts, it was all the time, at the final analysis, a matter of faith in those who confessedly had and have no independent personal power to know by the use of their own inner senses. But there intuition, one of the inner powers, decided for the genuineness of the report and the authentication of the messages. She herself put it tersely in this way: "If you think no Mahatma wrote the theories I have given of man and nature and if you do not believe my report, then you have to conclude that I did it all". The latter conclusion would lead to the position that her acts, phenomena, and writings put her in the position usually accorded by us to a Mahatma. As to the letters or messages of a personal nature, each one had and has to decide for himself whether or not to follow the advice given.

Another class of cases is where a message is found in a closed letter, on the margin or elsewhere on the sheet. The outer senses decide whether the writer of the letter inserted the supposed message or had some one else do it, and that must be decided on what is known of the character of the person. If you decide that the correspondent did not write it nor have anyone else do so, but that it was injected phenomenally, then the inner senses must be used. If they are untrained, certainly the matter becomes one of faith entirely, unless intuition is strong enough to decide correctly that a wise as well as powerful person caused the writing to appear there. Many such messages have been received in the history of the T. S. Some came in one way, some in another; one might be in a letter from a member of the Society, another in a letter from a outsider wholly ignorant of these matters. In every case, unless the recipient had independent powers developed within, no judgment on mere outer phenomena would be safe.

It is very difficult to find cases such as the above, because first, they are extremely rare, and second, the persons involved do not wish to relate them, since the matter transmitted had a purely personal bearing. A fancy may exist that in America or England or London such messages, generally considered bogus by enemies and outsiders, are being constantly sent and received, and that persons in various quarters are influenced to this or that course of action by them, but this is pure fancy, without basis in fact so far as the knowledge and experience of the writer extend. While precipitations phenomenally by the use of occult power and in a way unknown to science are possible and have occurred, that is not the means employed by the White Adepts in communicating with those thus favored. They have disciples with whom communication is already established and carried on, most generally through the inner ear and eye, but sometimes through the prosaic mail. In these cases no one else is involved and no one else has the right to put questions. The disciple reserves his communications for the guidance of his own action, unless he or she is directed to tell another. To spread broad-cast a mass of written communications among those who are willing to accept them without knowing how to judge would be the sheerest folly, only productive of superstition and blind credulity. This is not the aim of the Adepts nor the method they pursue. And this digression will be excused, it being necessary because the subject of precipitation as a fact has been brought up very prominently. I may further digress to say that no amount of precipitations, however clear of doubt and fraud as to time, place, and outward method, would have the slightest effect on my mind or action unless my own intuition and inner senses confirmed them and showed them to be from a source which should call for my attention and concurrence.

How, then, is this precipitation done, and what is the process? This question brings up the whole of the philosophy offered in the Secret Doctrine. For if the postulate of the metaphysical character of the Cosmos is denied, if the supreme power of the disciplined mind is not admitted, if the actual existence of an inner and real world is negatived, if the necessity and power of the image-making faculty are disallowed, then such precipitation is an impossibility, always was, and always will be. Power over mind, matter, space, and time depends on several things and positions. Needed for this are: Imagination raised to its highest limit, desire combined with will that wavers not, and a knowledge of the occult chemistry of Nature. All must be present or there will be no result.

Imagination is the power to make in the ether an image. This faculty is limited by any want of the training of mind and increased by good mental development. In ordinary persons imagination is only a vain and fleeting fancy which makes but a small impression comparatively in the ether. This power, when well-trained, makes a matrix in ether wherein each line, word, letter, sentence, color, or other mark is firmly and definitely made. Will, well-trained, must then be used to draw from the ether the matter to be deposited, and then, according to the laws of such an operation, the depositing matter collects in masses within the limits of the matrix and becomes from its accumulation visible on the surface selected. The will, still at work, has then to cut off the mass of matter from its attraction to that from whence it came. This is the whole operation, and who then is the wiser? Those learned in the schools laugh, and well they may, for there is not in science anything to correspond, and many of the positions laid down are contrary to several received opinions. But in Nature there are vast numbers of natural effects produced by ways wholly unknown to science, and Nature does not mind the laughter, nor should any disciple.

But how is it possible to inject such a precipitation into a closed letter? The ether is all-pervading, and the envelope or any other material bar is no bar to it. In it is carried the matter to be deposited, and as the whole operation is done on the other side of visible nature up to the actual appearance of the deposit, physical obstructions do not make the slightest difference.

It is necessary to return for a moment to the case of precipitations through mediums. Here the matrix needs no trained imagination to make it nor trained will to hold it. In the astral light the impressions are cut and remain immovable; these are used by the elementals and other forces at work, and no disturbing will of sitter being able to interfere—simply from blind ignorance—there is no disturbance of the automatic unconscious work. In the sitter's aura are thousands of impressions which remain unmoved because all attention has been long ago withdrawn. And the older or simpler they are the more firmly do they exist. These constitute also a matrix through which the nature spirits work.

I can properly finish this with the incident mentioned at the beginning. It was with H. P. B. I was sitting in her room beside her, the distance between us being some four feet. In my hand I held a book she never had had in her possession and that I had just taken from the mail. It was clear of all marks, its title page was fresh and clean, no one had touched it since it left the bookseller. I examined its pages and began to read. In about five minutes a very powerful current of what felt like electricity ran up and down my side on the skin, and I looked up at her. She was looking at me and said "What do you read?" I had forgotten the title, as it was one I had never seen before, and so I turned back to the title page. There at the top on the margin where it had not been before was a sentence of two lines of writing in ink, and the ink was wet, and the writing was that of H. P. B. who sat before me. She had not touched the book, but by her knowledge of occult law, occult chemistry, and occult will, she had projected out of the ink-bottle before her the ink to make the sentence, and of course it was in her own handwriting, as that was the easiest way to do it. Hence my own physical system was used to do the work, and the instant of its doing was when I felt the shock on the skin. This is to be explained in the way I have outlined, or it is to be all brushed aside as a lie or as a delusion of mine. But those last I can not accept, for I know to the contrary, and further I know that the advice, for such it was, in that sentence was good. I followed it, and the result was good. Several other times also have I seen her precipitate on different surfaces, and she always said it was no proof of anything whatever save the power to do the thing, admitting that black and white magicians could do the same thing, and saying that the only safety for any one in the range of such forces was to be pure in motive, in thought, and in act.

HABITATIONS OF H.P.B.

NO. III.<sup>1</sup>

H. P. B. before moving to the place from which she started for India in 1878, lived for a while in 34th street near Ninth avenue, New York, in a modest flat. While living there, the funeral of Baron de Palm, described fully by Col. Olcott in his Diary Leaves, took place, attracting great attention and endless newspaper comment. A flat was taken afterwards on the corner of 47th street and Eighth avenue, in the house which is shown in the picture.

<sup>1</sup> Number 2 of these appeared in PATH of June, 1892. The sketch for this paper was drawn by Bro. Knapp of Cincinnati from a photograph.

THE HOUSE IN WHICH "ISIS UNVEILED" WAS WRITTEN.

The illustration shows the narrow front of the house facing Eighth avenue, which is a business street running all the way from lower New York to 155th street. The building is what is known as a double flat, with a shop on the street level. The entrance to the apartments is down on 47th street under the rear suites of rooms. H. P. B. had the flat which begins in the middle of the building, running to the front on Eighth avenue and being immediately over the shop. The building is at this date in the same condition and under the same arrangement as when H. P. B. lived there.

Her writing-room was in front, taking in the corner window and the next two over the shop. The third window in front is of a small room which was used for various purposes, sometimes for breakfast, at others for sleeping. On that side, within, the inner hall ran down to the entrance door of the apartment with rooms in the following order: adjoining the writing and sitting room was her bed-room, having doors as well as a door into the hall, and cut off from the dining-room, next on that side, by a solid wall. Beyond the living-room is the kitchen, which looks out on 47th street. On the other side of the hall is first the bath-room fronting the kitchen, and next, proceeding again forward, is a small dark room in which Col. Olcott slept. Up stairs, Mrs. I. C. Mitchell, sister of Col. Olcott, lived for some time. The writing-room and the small room first spoken of cut the hall off in front.

It was in this flat, in the larger front room, that Isis Unveiled was written and finished. There so many extraordinary phenomena had place that volumes would be required to describe them. Here the "astral music and bells" were so often heard, which self-styled wise critics have assumed were produced by a maid walking up and down the hall with an instrument : an absurdity for those who, like myself, were there and heard all such things. Here, in the corner of the room over Eighth avenue, the stuffed owl stood and sometimes blinked. It is now in the possession of a lady living not far from the New York Headquarters. And here when Isis was finished H. P. B. sat among her few belongings and saw the auctioneer sell them off to the highest bidder; from here she at last, in December, 1878, went off to the steamer which took her to London, from whence she sailed to India never to return to the land where she was ever such a perplexity and an amusement to the people of the metropolis. It is a modest place in a modest, busy part of a great city; yet how much was done there and what mighty forces played within those four walls while the immense personality known as Helena P. Blavatsky dwelt therein!

INCIDENTS OF THE THEOSOPHICAL CONGRESS.

AS Chairman of the Committee on Organization it was my privilege to take an active part in the preliminary arrangements of the recent great Theosophical Congress in Chicago. Naturally there came under my observation many incidents connected with the details of organization which are not generally known, but which may be of interest to members of the Society everywhere, and will thus bear repeating in the columns of the PATH.

The idea of obtaining representation in the World's Congress was first suggested by Mr. Judge in a letter addressed to me in September, 1892. It was a mere hint, comprised in a single sentence, as it were, carelessly thrown into a lengthy business communication, and was in the form of a question, as follows: "Why can't we be represented in the World's Fair?" Acting upon this suggestion I immediately sought an audience with Mr. Charles C. Bonney, President of the World's Congress Auxiliary. That gentleman received me courteously, but was evidently in extreme darkness regarding the Theosophical Society, its objects and its general standing. He confessed that he had been overwhelmed with applications from almost every known sect and cult throughout the world, and on the whole his aspect was not very encouraging. I called upon him two or three times at intervals of several weeks after that, armed each time with letters from prominent people who happened to be friends of mine, as I recognized that the mechanism of the World's Fair was largely political, and knowing that in politics there is nothing like "influence". All this only seemed to dispose the President of the Auxiliary more favorably towards me personally, but bore little fruit so far as the really important part of the business was concerned; namely,—the procuring of a definite assignment for the Theosophical Society. Meanwhile Mr. Judge had forwarded a statement of the Society's condition and aims, which I enclosed to Mr. Bonney, together with a formal application signed by myself as President of the Chicago Branch. Imagine my chagrin when a little later I received a letter from Mr. Bonney stating that our application had been received and referred to the Psychic Committee, of which Dr. Elliott Coues was Chairman. My first impulse was to throw up the whole business and withdraw the application, as Dr. Coues was an expelled member of the T. S. But after sober second thought I resolved to see Mr. Bonney personally and lay the whole story before him. It was fortunate that I did so, as he immediately agreed with me that our reference to the Psychic Committee was inappropriate, and directed his Secretary to recall the application which had already been forwarded to Dr. Coues in Washington. Needless to say, the original application was never returned, and doubtless reposes at this moment in Coues' writing desk.

But this difficulty having been overcome, a greater lay in our path. It was the question of where we could be placed, and upon this perplexing problem no little time and energy were expended. Finally Mr. Bonney concluded that we belonged to the Committee on Moral and Social Reform, and so assigned us. There was also a thorn in this particular rose, as the Chairman of this Committee was Mrs. J. M. Flower, who by an "inscrutable interposition of Divine Providence"—as the strictly orthodox word it—happened to be Coues' sister. However, I determined to go on with it just the same, and postponed further action until the arrival of Annie Besant who was then on a lecturing tour in this country. She arrived in Chicago Dec. 10th, and on the 11th we together called upon Mr. Bonney at his office. I well remember that meeting. A solemn conclave of ladies was assembled there to meet Mrs. Besant. Mrs. Flower, as Chairman of the Committee on Moral and Social Reform, was present, along with a sanctimonious college professor who enjoyed the felicity of being also a member of the same elevating Committee. These two professed the greatest kindness, but felt compelled to gently admonish Mrs. Besant that really their Committee was not the appropriate one for our Society. Subsequent events showed that they were right. It would have been a huge mistake to have gone into their Committee. Still I do not think that either of them wasted very much of the milk of human kindness, at least upon this occasion. At the close of our session we were no nearer securing representation than we had been three months before.

But the worst was yet to happen. To this meeting came the Rev. Augusta Chapin, Chairman of the Woman's Branch of the Religions Committee. She seemed captivated with Mrs. Besant, and made an appointment to come to my house on the following day (Sunday), when we could talk the matter over and settle the details. She came at the appointed time, and readily agreed to bring our matter before the Religions Committee. Her words were so confident, and she occupied such an important position, that I felt our fortunes were made, so to speak. Mrs. Besant went away feeling very much encouraged. I waited a fortnight, and, not hearing anything, dropped a line to the Rev. Miss Chapin. She replied that she had not yet had time to take up the matter, but would soon do so. A couple a weeks later I wrote her again. This seemed to provoke her a little, and her answer was tartly brief to the effect that the Committee could not decide where to locate us in the Congress. I then began to have disagreeable doubts about Miss Chapin's championship of Theosophy. Some more correspondence, equally fruitless, ensued, and the winter dragged itself gradually along without anything being accomplished. I went South in March, returning early in April, and immediately wrote to Miss Chapin. That lady replied in a very pettish note, stating that it was not her place to act as advocate of the T. S. before the Committee, and that if we wanted anything done we must make a formal application in writing. Upon reading that communication, I felt a cord break somewhere in my organism, and I confess that I was mad. I replied that a formal application could hardly be necessary, as such application had been filed six months previously, and that it was at her own suggestion that I had left the matter in her hands.

I immediately went back to President Bonney and resumed negotiations where they had been broken off some months previously by my arrangement with the Rev. Miss Chapin. He seemed anxious to help us, but could not find an appropriate place for us in any of the Congresses so far contemplated. He thought very strongly of putting us into a Congress along with the Ethical Society, but that scheme was finally abandoned, as well as a similar plan to lump us in with the American Philosophical Society. Just about this time I parted company forever from the Rev. Miss Chapin, who wrote that, as I had taken the liberty of consulting some one besides herself in reference to a representation of the Theosophical Society, she would decline to do anything further in our behalf.

Thus after six months of toil absolutely nothing was the result. We were now in the middle of April. The annual Convention of the American Section T.S. was soon to be held in New York. If that Convention should pass before anything could be accomplished, it would be a hopeless task to undertake any general organized movement for a representation of the Society in the World's Fair. The strangest of events thereupon happened. Just four days before the Convention met I received a message from President Bonney asking me to call. I went and found everything had changed "as in the twinkling of an eye". He took my breath away by informing me that the Religions Committee had unanimously agreed to grant the T.S. a separate Congress of its own, to take place during the great Parliament of Religions, and that I had been appointed Chairman of the Committee of Organization.

This was much more than we had expected or even hoped for. All previous negotiations had been upon the basis that we were to join in with some other societies in a general congress; and now we were all at once assigned to a Congress of our own with facilities and opportunities equal to those enjoyed by any of the great religious denominations. And I have never yet been able to find out by what secret or powerful influence it was brought about. Only I will say that it was a remarkable coincidence that this sudden and favorable change in our affairs occurred exactly at the right moment. On the following day I was provided with letters from Pres. Bonney and Dr. Barrows, chairman of the Religions Committee, armed with which I at once went to New York and laid the matter before the Convention just in time to awaken general interest among Theosophists and to secure their necessary coöperation. Brother Judge carried the news to the European Convention a little later, and went actively to work upon the programme. To his untiring zeal at and from this stage of the proceedings was due much of the enormous success which attended the sessions of the Congress.

Upon my return to Chicago in the latter part of August, after my summer trip, I called upon Mr. Bonney in order to consult him in regard to some details of the approaching Congress. Upon seeing me he at once exclaimed:

“Don't say a word, Mr. Wright. I know what you have come to say. We are all very sorry for the circumstance, and I have taken the speakers to task for their discourtesy towards your Society.”

I had no idea to what incident he was alluding, and was compelled to ask for an explanation. It seems that the Psychic Researchers had just been holding a Congress, and two of the speakers had assailed the Theosophical Society. The matter was so utterly insignificant that I had not even heard of it until Mr. Bonney thus called my attention to it. I assured him that the principal stock in trade of the Psychical Research Society consisted of abuse of the T. S. and that it would be cruel to deprive them of their principal topic on such an occasion, especially as all such attacks failed to injure us. But I quote the incident in this place to illustrate the very friendly attitude of the managers of the World's Congress Auxiliary towards our Society. From the day when our assignment to a Congress was made, they never failed to show us the utmost kindness and consideration.

Early in the season I had applied to these gentlemen for the use of one of the large halls in the Art Palace, in order that Annie Besant might give a public address on Theosophy outside of the regular Congress. As there were only two of these halls, namely, the Hall of Washington and the Hall of Columbus, and as the program of the Religions Committee was already well filled, it became a matter of some difficulty to secure either hall for a special meeting. Finally Dr. Barrows succeeded in assigning us the Hall of Washington for the evening of September 20. As our Congress was to be held on the 15th and 16th, and as Mrs. Besant was billed to lecture in Toronto on the 20th, this arrangement was by no means satisfactory. I called upon Mr. Bonney a few days before the Congress to remonstrate against this assignment. He was sorry, but evidently could do nothing to help us, and suggested that Mrs. Besant postpone her engagement in Toronto. While we were discussing the matter a letter was brought in which Mr. Bonney opened and read. Immediately his countenance lightened, and, turning to me, he exclaimed :

“By a miracle, by a most remarkable coincidence, your desire can be fulfilled. I hold in my hand a message from the Archbishop of Zante, Greece, who begs to relinquish his assignment for Saturday evening, September 16th. This is the very date of your Congress. Go at once to Mr. Young, the Secretary, and engage the Hall of Washington for a general presentation of Theosophy to the Parliament of Religions on that evening.”

Needless to say, I went. Thus everything shaped itself for us as if by magic, although we none of us dreamed even then of the enormous success that was to crown our efforts. The Theosophical Congress had been assigned to Hall VIII on the main floor of the Art Palace,—one of the smaller rooms, capable of holding about five hundred people. Mr. Bonney and his confreres were a little dubious about our ability to fill it, although for my part I assured him there would be no difficulty in that direction. On the morning of Friday, Sept. 15th, our Committee members and their volunteer assistants were on hand early. Soon the people began coming in. An hour before the time for opening the hall was well filled. Hundreds of additional chairs were brought in. As ten o'clock approached the crowd became a dense mass, and the situation became alarming. Fortunately in the adjoining Hall VII the Lutheran Congress was just in session. This hall had a capacity of 1500, and, upon learning our dilemma, the Lutheran brethren, who were not very numerous themselves, kindly offered to withdraw in our favor to a smaller room. When the announcement was made, there was a scramble for seats, and in five minutes Hall VII was packed. Our audiences grew greater each subsequent session. On Saturday afternoon, in addition to our regular session—so crowded that hundreds were standing—we organized and carried on overflow meetings in two adjacent halls. The orthodox ministers in attendance at the Parliament were astounded. Saturday afternoon the managers of the Parliament, in recognition of the splendid success of our Congress, tendered us the use of the Hall of Washington for an additional public meeting to be held Sunday evening. Now the Hall of Washington holds 4000 people, yet that Saturday night we saw our original three hundred swell to three thousand—a magnificent audience. The Sunday night extra meeting was not well advertised, and we expected to witness a falling off in attendance. What was our amazement when on that memorable evening we saw every seat in that vast audience room occupied, and hundreds of people standing in the aisles and along the walls!

A most remarkable incident then happened. It seems that in giving us the Hall of Washington the managers of the Parliament had actually turned out the great Presbyterian Church, whose Congress was advertised to take place there at that time. Our meeting had already commenced, and Brother Judge was in the midst of a powerful address, when there came upon the platform the Rev. Dr. Barrows, Chairman of the Religious Department, and he himself a Presbyterian minister. Approaching me, he said in an undertone that it was necessary for him to make an announcement to the audience immediately. I forthwith interrupted Brother Judge in the middle of a sentence—he says, in the middle of a word—and requested that Dr. Barrows be allowed to speak. The latter stepped to the front of the platform and said that some confusion had arisen, owing to the changing of halls, and that although the Presbyterian Congress had convened in Hall VII there was no audience, and it was surmised that the Presbyterians had by mistake come to the Theosophical meeting. In justice to the speakers, who had come many hundreds of miles to address the Congress, he requested all the Presbyterians in the audience to rise and pass out into Hall VII.

Brother Judge courteously waited for the audience to disperse. Sitting as I did on the platform, I had an excellent view of the door. Not a single person in that vast audience made a move to depart. On the other hand, taking advantage of the brief interim, about fifty more people who had been waiting at the door filed in and squeezed their way through the crowds that lined the rear of the hall. Could any incident be more impressive? No commentary was necessary. The audience recognized the situation at once, and a smile passed over the sea of upturned faces. But the threatened storm of applause was promptly arrested by Brother Judge, who calmly resumed his discourse at the place where he had been interrupted.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

CONSTANCE, THE COUNTESS WACHTMEISTER, is a name so well-known to members of the Society throughout the world that her picture will certainly have a great interest. Her full name is Constance Georgine Louise de Bourbel de Montjunçon. Her parents were the Marquis de Bourbel, formerly in the French diplomatic service, and Constance Bulkley, to whom she was born on the twenty-eighth of March, 1838, at Florence at Italy. The de Bourbel family is one of the most ancient in France. Originating from the southeast of France, they settled in Normandy about the year 936 A.D., and have thus a long line of ancestors, among which several were distinguished in French history, especially one Raoul de Bourbel who lived in the reign of Louis XIV.

Having lost her parents at an early age, Constance de Bourbel was sent to England to her aunt, Mrs. Bulkley, of Linden Hill, Berkshire, where she was educated and lived until her marriage in 1863 with her cousin, Count Wachtmeister, then Swedish and Norwegian Minister at the Court of St. James. There she resided for three years, when her husband was called to Copenhagen as minister to the Danish Court, and then after two years, the Count being nominated as Minister of Foreign Affairs, they took up their abode at the official residence in Stockholm. The Countess was then created a "state lady of the land" by the King, and was the last to receive this distinction, as the title then became extinct. Count Wachtmeister died in 1871, and she remained in Sweden for several years, spending the winters in warmer climates on account of health. She has one son, the Count Axel Wachtmeister, who was born in 1865. He also is a member of the T.S., and is already well-known to members in California and other places.

In 1879 the Countess began investigations into Spiritualism, but after two years of arduous research found it both unsatisfactory and dangerous. In 1881 she joined the Theosophical Society, and ever since has been a worker for it both in and out of season, through good and evil report. H.P.B. gave her once the office of Corresponding Secretary, but that was declared null by the Council at Adyar—yet it was an honor. She was also Secretary and Treasurer of the Blavatsky Lodge, but gave those offices up to others. For a long time personally she carried on the work of the T.P.S., and revived it until it became able to run itself financially. As a close friend of H.P.B. and one who stood by that noble woman in time of great distress and anxiety both physical and social, the Countess can never be forgotten. She was privileged to see in the presence of H. P. B. and also when not near her many strange manifestations of the occult power and knowledge H.P.B. possessed, such as few have been granted. At every meeting of the Blavatsky Lodge the Countess could be seen as a familiar figure; at Conventions her presence always connected us with the days of our teacher; in private she could and often did relate what she knew of H. P. B. that was of the highest interest and value; and now she is going with Annie Besant to India, where beyond doubt her presence will prove of benefit to all who may meet her. All her work for the T. S., and it is very large and continuous, is done without having any official position, as she prefers to work for it in the ranks as an individual. She has contributed some papers and essays to Lodge work, but the book by which she will be best known is one now in hand giving an account of how H. P. B. wrote the Secret Doctrine.

Countess Wachtmeister is now and has been a vegetarian for fourteen years. In person she is of about the medium height, with blonde hair and blue eyes, a voice of pleasant sound, and her face has a singularly sweet expression. As a worker constantly acting she has no equal unless it be Annie Besant, as a friend of the T.S. there is no greater, as a devoted pupil of H.P.B. who is not ashamed of her teacher nor afraid of the convictions that teacher instilled — in all these she will ever be an example for every member of the Society.

THE THEOSOPHICAL CONGRESS

AND THE PARLIAMENT OF RELIGIONS.

THE Congress of the Theosophical Society in September as a part of the Great Parliament of Religions was a significant as well as successful event. In another article the Chicago Chairman shows how we had but little hope at first of having any place whatever in either the merely intellectual or the religious side of the World's Fair; how we found the old yet senseless opposition to Theosophy obstructing the path for so long as to cause us to cease efforts; and how suddenly the scene changed and the managers of the Parliament of Religions became our friends and helpers. This change will never be explained by those who do not know the forces working behind the acts and thoughts of men. It not only took us into the Parliament, but gave us the best date of all sittings and made our Congress the real Parliament itself.

Not at any time but now during eighteen centuries could such a meeting have been possible, and it was distinctly a Theosophical step because, being an effort to get on one platform representatives of all religions, it was just what our Society has been accomplishing steadily during the past eighteen years, and what our objects and constitution have always expressed.

It marked a cycle in the development of religious thought. For centuries until the American Republic was founded men's minds in western civilizations were chained to bigotry and dogma. Then, as expressed on the seal of the United States, "a new order of ages" began. Steadily creeds and churches, religious ideas and religious interpretations altered, the freedom of America making it a possibility that men should here think more boldly and act upon their thoughts, should not be afraid of their opinions but be more willing to proclaim them unchecked by state interference, until at last among the hosts of the dissenters from Roman Catholicism the idea of a Religious Parliament was born. And that the presiding officer of the Parliament should be a Presbyterian was still more significant, as that cult is surely the fatalistic iron-bound one of all the different stripes of Christianity. The cycle being almost complete, its ending and the beginning of another were fitly marked by the calling of the gathering at Chicago. In ending his opening speech, Dr. Barrows, the president, said the whole world is bound by chains of gold about the feet of God.

Our part in the Parliament was not merely to prove that the Society had grown strong enough and sufficiently respectable to compel a place therein, but chiefly to show, as an integral portion of the whole body, that the true attitude for all religious bodies to take is to seek for and disclose the truths in each, and not confine themselves merely to their own pet theories. And as we exemplified this in truth, the other bodies confining themselves to explications of particular creeds or views of salvation—and one, the Roman Catholic, declaring that only in that sort of Christianity were truth, ethics, and salvation—it follows that the Theosophical Congress was in actuality, though not in form, the Parliament of Religions.

The occasion enabled us to present a great object-lesson illustrating what we had been saying for years, that the Oriental is no heathen, that he should not be treated as such, and that an examination of his religions will show them to be the real source of those professed by the Occident. And when all those Greeks, Chinamen, Japanese, Buddhists, Shintos, Hindus, and Confucians appeared on the platform, beyond doubt the Brahmin we brought towered above them all by virtue of the ancient system he represented as prime source of all religions. Our Buddhist Dharmapala, with Annie Besant an old agnostic, combined with all others, proved that the Theosophical movement, though small by comparison with the world's great set systems of religion, voices the great underlying note of the mental, moral, and religious evolution of the human race. This note is changed, distorted, and colored by any and every form of religion, but in Theosophy it sounds forth without fault. No one religion gives it clearly, no single system will present it to the perception; only by the combination and from the examination of all can it be discovered for the delight and benefit of humanity.

And that the minds of Western people are beginning to hear the first faint vibrations of this great sound was evident at our Congress. All our meetings were crowded to overflowing, every shade of opinion was on our platform as well as in our audiences, and, recognizing the effect produced by such an epoch-making Congress as ours, the newspapers of the city, which only attend to that which forces itself to the surface, gave us in their reports the greatest prominence, saying one day, "The Theosophical Congress is a competitor of the whole Parliament".

But remembering the words of our old Teacher, the Master's Messenger—H. P. B., that it may be dangerous for the T. S. to grow too fast, out of proportion to its strength, let us one and all try to make ourselves centres for Theosophical influence, so as to constitute a body of power from the power of each element duly fostered and educated. This we shall do only by personal effort, by attention and by service to others; and thus, and in no other way, we may reap for the Theosophical Society all the benefits that such a congress and such success should justly lead us to expect.

CAN WE COMMUNICATE WITH THE DEAD?'

SOME REASONS AGAINST IT.

IN THE COURSE of last Tuesday night's discussion upon this subject, there was one point that might possibly bear further amplification, and that was the question of the means of such communication. The first question that would be asked about any distinguished Brahmin proposing to visit us would be, "Does he speak our language?" Otherwise he is to us a sealed book.

To carry this analogy a little further, I would ask you to consider the case of a man who should go to see the great actor Salvini in his drama called Civil Death. The playgoer comes home enraptured with the performance, wrought to enthusiasm by the unselfish character of the hero of the tragedy, a loving father who breaks his heart rather than interfere with the welfare of his child. The spectator, thrilled with the splendor of the man's sacrifice, feels that of all men he is the noblest, and he demands of the manager an introduction to the being who has so uplifted him. "But, my dear sir," replies the manager, "that hero you so much admire is the creature of a night; he is not a reality, but an illusion. The real man is Salvini, who plays this and many other parts, and I would present you to him with pleasure, only you do not speak his language, nor he yours, nor have we an interpreter capable of giving you any satisfaction." "But it is not Salvini, it is the man I saw on the stage last night that I want to talk with," says our friend. "And I tell you again," says the manager, "that that man was an illusion, and ceased to be when the actor who created him laid aside his costume and left the theatre."

Such a desire and such an attempt as this would seem to us very childish and very futile, but, after all, is it not precisely analogous to the behavior of those who try to communicate with the dead?

"All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players.
They have their exits and their entrances,
And one man in his time plays many parts."

But that "one man" is not the being we know, whose heroism attracts us or whose cowardice repels, but is the immortal entity we call the individual consciousness, the real Ego who, indeed, "in his time plays many parts." The man who has left us, and whom we so long to meet again, is but one of those "many parts" played by the Ego, who, when it leaves the body that we love, lays aside its costume and quits the theatre of life. That personality exists no longer; the Ego, the Mind that created and informed it, "home has gone, and ta'en its wages," to quote our greatest poet once more. It has thrown off the body, its more ethereal counterpart, the astral double, and the still more ethereal framework of its desires, its idiosyncracies, its passions; it is a pure Intelligence, it belongs to another state of consciousness than ours. Can we expect to communicate with it when we do not know a syllable of its celestial language? Even if we could be shown its astral double, that filmy counterpart of the outer body, and could that form be made to utter a few of the unmeaning platitudes that such forms have been heard to speak, could that give any satisfaction to the friend who knows that the mind is not there? Is there any consolation in looking at a dummy made up of our friend's old clothes?

If we accept and learn by heart the theosophic doctrine of the seven-fold nature of man, of what earthly use is that knowledge unless we make it part of our life, a lamp unto our feet? When Captain Cuttle consulted his oracle, Jack Bunsby, that astute old mariner always wound up his Orphic utterances with the remark, "The bearin's o' this obseruation lies in the application of it." Unless we apply what we have learned, what good is it to us? If we know that the personality is an illusion, like all the things of this world, that it is made up of the body, the astral double, the body of desire, and the principle of vitality, and that all these are necessarily impermanent and must pass away at death, what is there left to communicate with in this four-fold division which we are accustomed to call the lower quaternary? And if we know likewise that the Higher Triad, or the individuality, persists, we know that this eternal being consists of the three immortal parts called Spirit, Soul, and Mind, in ordinary parlance, and that all three form that Ego whose condition is so far above this plane of illusions that there can be between us no medium of communication, no common language in which we may converse. So Tennyson says:

" My old affection of the tomb,
 A past of stillness yearns to speak:
 Arise, and get thee forth and seek
 A friendship for the years to come.
 I watch thee from the quiet shore ;
 Thy spirit up to mine can reach ;
 But in dear words of human speech
 We two communicate no more."

And here the poet, with a poet's intuition, has struck the same law that we have been told governs the "Kingdom of the Gods," or Devachan. That is, that under certain conditions a pure and lofty nature may pass into Devachan during life, and be drawn into communion with the disembodied spirit that can never descend to it. "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me," said David of his child, and it is true of all.

But here we must beware of allowing ourselves to think of disembodied existence in our terms of space and time. To the freed spirit there is no place, but only condition, and there is no reason why our loved ones who have passed from our sight should not be still near us, still loving us, and through the power of that love influencing our lives for good. "We are with those whom we have lost in material form," says the Key, "and far, far nearer to them now than when they were alive. . . . For pure divine love is not merely the blossom of a human heart, but has its roots in eternity. . . . And love beyond the grave has a magic and divine potency which reacts on the living."

The lesson of the theosophic teaching as to communication with the dead is, then, briefly this. That with their fleeting and illusionary personality it were a futile thing to seek such intercourse; but that to bring about the highest form of communion with those pure Intelligences who dwell now on another plane than ours, we must so elevate and purify our own lives and our own souls that while yet upon this earth we may be caught up into heaven and hear unspeakable words. It is Tennyson again who has expressed this so beautifully that you can bear to hear it once more, for none but a poet can say it half so well.

"How pure at heart and sound in head,
With what divine affections bold,
Should be the man whose thought would hold
An hour's communion with the dead.

In vain shalt thou, or any, call
The spirits from their golden day,
Except, like them, thou too canst say
My spirit is at peace with all.

They haunt the silence of the breast,
Imaginations calm and fair,
The memory like a cloudless air,
The conscience as a sea at rest:

But when the heart is full of din,
And doubt beside the portal waits,
They can but listen at the gates,
And hear the household jar within."

KATHARINE HILLARD.

IMPOLITIC REFERENCE—"H. P. B."

THEOSOPHY is rapidly pushing its way through journalistic and other channels, and is cropping out in regions and hamlets the most unexpected. Its expansion during the last few years has astonished even those who best know its merits, and every day brings new indications that it is soon to be in the forefront of the questions of the age and the interest of the religious world. For, in truth, it supplies the very desiderata for which earnest men have vainly sought, and finds welcome in exact proportion as those meeting it are intelligent, open-minded, and devout. A system which insists on including every fact which research can grasp, which harmonizes each fact and each department of its vast philosophy, which solves the piteous puzzles in every human life and lot, which nerves to the most patient endurance and the most hopeful endeavor, is one which cannot be indifferent to those who think and feel and aspire.

Theosophy is not only exhaustive in its inclusions, it is most ingenuous in its methods. It waives aside all cajolery or special pleading, and asks no one to give his assent to its statements unless his reason is thoroughly convinced. Any other adhesion would be half-hearted, insincere, superficial: none such is congenial to a system which cares only for truth, and for perception of truth, and for honest avowal of the perception. Unless a man finds its teachings upheld by his judgment and his moral sense, it frankly tells him that he cannot rightfully accept them.

But in order for the judgment to act, Theosophy furnishes copiously the material. The philosophy may be divided into two parts,—the facts and laws wholly beyond the reach of us ordinary mortals, the facts and laws measurably within our reach but needing elucidation by the former class. These it expounds with fulness, fortifying itself with the discoveries of science and the best exercise of reason. Those it presents as upon the evidence of extraordinary mortals, men whose larger acquisitions of faculty enable them to transcend our limits and explore vast realms beyond. Then it connects the two and exhibits a consistent scheme explanatory of all life seen and unseen, and by the beautiful harmony and relation of all parts depicts a whole which is worthy of its Divine Author.

As knowledge of matters outside our ken can only be communicated to us through one of ourselves, Theosophy avows that certain individuals have from time to time been used as channels of these higher truths, the sources being above them, known to be such, avowed to be such. Sometimes in sacred writings recognized as "Scriptures", sometimes in scientific expositions of advanced grade, sometimes in moral or spiritual disquisitions, sometimes in the translation of inaccessible or non-understood works, truth appertaining to loftier planes is made to percolate down for the benefit and refreshment of dwellers upon the plains. In such cases the channel was valued for its accuracy and its service; it did not authenticate the truth, it transmitted it; it was not the authority but the witness. The truth, even, did not rest upon the medium; its certitude was in the responsiveness of the auditor, and its sanction in the validity of its source.

Thus it is that Theosophy approaches all hearers of this or any other age,—large-minded, open-handed, frank, inviting every critical research, discountenancing all sham or partiality, pointing to proofs, citing evidence when accessible and furnishing testimony when not, appealing only to reason and insight and perception. Its most conspicuous Apostles most exhibit this spirit, and beg their pupils to look not to them but through them for the Truth which is to make free. They disclaim names as finalities, and will not consent that texts are to be fetters to the soul or any book weigh down a struggling mind. A disciple may reverence his teacher, but not truly so by repetition of phrases or by any other course than that which has convinced and qualified the teacher himself.

These facts have important bearing in the era to which Theosophy has now arrived. It has passed beyond the stage of mere novelty, and its philosophy has larger coherence as well as wider popular attention. Advance is being made into broader regions of thought, principles are receiving fuller application, legitimate criticism is testing the soundness of doctrine. The Theosophical Society finds a hearing in many quarters formerly barred to it, and its expounders have audiences neither unfriendly nor unfair. To be distinct they have to be explicit, and to be explicit they have to be precise. But this often seems to be dogmatic, to be laying down fact as if incontestable, to be proclamatory of truth as assured. It is by no means necessarily so, for the genuine expounder disclaims more than commendation to reason and will not allow any coercive intention. It is his to suggest, to vindicate, to impress; never to insist, demand, or extort. If there is appearance of dogmatism, it is contrary to his purpose and spirit, utterly contrary to the Society he represents.

Even though there may be no real dogmatic character in The-osophy, the Society, or its expounders, there may yet be an impolicy of reference which impairs the course of the message. The revival in the West of the ancient Wisdom Religion came about through Madame H. P. Blavatsky, herself an Initiate and a direct messenger from the Masters behind. The services she gave to the Cause, the self-sacrificing devotion to her mission which marked every day of her career, the contributions she made to Theosophical literature and learning, no pen can fully compute. Theosophists feel for her a gratitude and veneration which they may well feel for one who was the means of throwing open to them a new and boundless spiritual life, and in her works they find an exhaustless treasure of scientific, moral, and spiritual truth. Not unnaturally but still mistakenly, many of them extend this attitude from their private studies to their public discussions, and forget that a reverence which is personal cannot validate a proposition which is impersonal. To non-Theosophic hearers a doctrine stands or falls by its conformity to reason and the moral sense, not by the repetition of a name or a quotation from a book. Take Karma, for instance. If it is to become influential as a motive in life, its existence and operations have to be shown by argument, analogy, and illustration. All quarters can be drawn upon, and the larger the basis the surer the construction. Demonstrated thus, it makes its way to the judgment and the heart. But treat it as a dictum of Isis Unveiled, The Key to Theosophy, and The Secret Doctrine, consider it as proved because H. P. B. said so, dispose airily of questions as worthless because they have no sanction in H. P. B.'s works or words, and it becomes merely a shibboleth of adherence to a side, not at all an ethical law to be verified by conviction.

And certainly the most devoted Theosophists—who are usually also the most devoted disciples of the Teacher—are often willing to admit that this mistake has been made in public exposition. It is a mistake in judgment, for the public are to be won through the merits of a doctrine and not through appeals to an authority. It is a mistake in perception, for they who perpetrate it forget that their own conversion to Theosophy was by conviction of reason, reverence being a later experience. And it is a mistake in policy, for the free mind resents an attempt to coerce it by a name instead of an attempt to influence it by a fact. So irritation is aroused, and a truth which might be winsome is transformed into a dogma which must be repellent, the spirit waxing impatient at the supposition that it can be over-awed by a quotation or silenced by a term. Undoubtedly many a warming interest has been chilled by supposition that Theosophy is expressed and bounded by H.P.B.'s published works, that it has no other support than can be found from her, that all propositions are to be tested by their conformity to the Secret Doctrine, that Theosophists think only as she allowed and believe only as they are sure she would approve. And if an inquirer conceives that the choice is between a free range of thought which shall carry him, unfettered, through every sphere and bring him before every truth, and a circumscribed round which shall tether him to a name and a book, he cannot be blamed if he thinks harsh things, says harsh words, and abjures Theosophy, H. P. B., and the Society.

Now free-thought and insistence on reason as the vindication of doctrine are no disloyalty to our great Leader. Rather are they homage to her, since she so battled for them. No one who knew her or who is familiar with her works found her exacting of subservience to her views. On the contrary, she held and taught and enjoined that submission without conviction was not only worthless but unmanly, and her appeal was ever to argument and proof. We shall not improve upon her by reversing her policy, and we shall not further the Cause she loved by methods she disapproved. Loving reverence may express itself in loving imitation, the truest homage in an extension of her own spirit. In commending Theosophy and its priceless benefits to men, the genuine disciple of H. P. B. can refrain from phrases which she abjured and references which she discountenanced, and can uphold the philosophy and its contents and its conclusions with the richest of arguments and illustrations and verifications. As they affect the public mind and swell the number of the enlightened and the aspiring, he will become ever more conscious of the broad spirit of his mission, and, while not pushing the name and words of H. P. B. to the forefront of his discourse, will know that behind it they are a source of strength and inspiration and motive, flowing through his every thought and impulse, even though rarely voiced in the hearing of the multitude.

ALEXANDER FULLERTON, F. T. S.

NOTE. The above article has my unqualified approval. It is easy to prove that the Theosophical Society is not dogmatic and has no creed and no personal authority in matters of doctrine or belief; but the wise Theosophist should see to it that undue attention is not given to a line of proof that may arouse a needless opposition.

LITERARY NOTES.

SEPTEMBER THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XVIII" is mainly a narration of how Col. Olcott generously raised money to return to their homes a party of shipwrecked Arabs, but has in it the singular incident that their Chief one day took up a pen and wrote in French a note to him from one of the Mahatmas, signing correctly the name. This, as the man did not understand French, was, as Col. Olcott explains, a clear case of control of one living person by another. "Astrology: A Talk on the Roof" is a revival of those delightful articles which enlivened the Theosophist several years ago. This one culminates in a scheme whereby each subscriber to Vol. XV will receive a printed blank for record of date of birth, etc., which he is to fill up and return to Headquarters, appending three questions which he desires answered. Two astrologers, one Eastern and the other Western, will cast his horoscope and answer his questions, the outcomes will be compared, and the subscriber will be expected to report upon the replies sent him. Tabulation of results will go to show the reality or otherwise of Astrology. Any one preferring information on either his past or future can receive it in lieu of replies to questions.—[A. F.]

SEPTEMBER LUCIFER. Mr. John M. Pryse's "The Mummy" proffers as an explanation of mummification the preservation of the astral body together with the physical, as also the mental photographs pertaining to the former, so that a person discovering his own mummy from a former incarnation and becoming psychically en rapport with it might read that incarnation. H. P. B.'s "Elementals" is continued. A very good paper is upon "The Law of Analogy," by Sarah Corbett. "Notes from a Diary of Visions" unwittingly illustrates the little value in literature of dreams and the like. Two correspondents explain the singular assertion in August Theosophist that Reincarnation was unknown to the author of Isis, and a third makes excellent comment on the article in August Lucifer called "Gurus and Chelas." It seemed tolerably sure at the time that some one would discern the peculiar view taken of a disciple's supervisory function over his teacher, and the matter is pretty well settled by a quotation from the Mahatma K. H. A long and graphic account is given of the missionary "Van" in its travels through the English provinces. Lucifer received the article on "Incidents of the Congress" by G. E. Wright from the PATH for simultaneous publication; but as no credit is given—which even our magazines should not neglect—the notice and reminder are necessary.

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI, No. 10, reprints Mr. Mead's Lucifer papers on "Nirvana," papers affluent with learning and research, even if they leave Nirvana somewhat unintelligible. We again commend to Siftings the publication of Mrs. Besant's speeches before the Blavatsky Lodge, priceless utterances which should not pass away. Subscribers to the Theosophist and Lucifer do not care to have their contents served over again in Siftings, and may object to the change of the T. P. S. into the Theosophical re-Publishing Society.—[A. F.]

VASUDEVAMANANA,<sup>1</sup> or "The Meditations of Vasudeva," is a translation by K. Narayanaswami and R. Sundareswara Sastri which appeared in Lucifer and is now published in book form with paper covers by Kumbakonam T. S. It is very well printed; 124 pages, price fifty cents. The Adwaita philosophy of the Universe is the subject treated of. There are twelve chapters treating of various divisions of the subject, ending with a dialogue between Guru and Disciple on the final mysteries. Those who have studied the Upanishads will like the work. It is certainly a valuable contribution not only to our literature but also to translations of Indian books. In the introduction the translators doubt if the author was ignorant of Turya state, concluding he designedly refrains from mentioning it as too high for comprehension. But we incline to think he did not know it, for he dwells on subjects such as whether Atma has the characteristics of the three bodies of Sthula, Karana, and Shukshma, and on other things quite as recondite as Turya state, unless Turya is different from Atma, which it is not.—[J.]

THOUGHTS ON BHAGAVAD GITA,<sup>1</sup> a series of twelve lectures before the Kumbakonam T. S., India, by a Brahmin F. T. S. is now out in book form in paper published by the Branch. It has 162 large pages. It is dedicated to H. P. B. as "the exponent to the modern world of the old doctrine, and the faithful servant of humanity to lead them unto the Land of Light." A remarkable sentence in the Introduction deserves reproduction. It is: "The only thing that can be claimed in the following lectures are the outpourings of a grateful heart—the heart of an earnest Brahmin F. T. S. born in a great pandit family of Southern India—only because H. P. B. came in time to his aid and destroyed all thoughts of flying into the arms of the Padres." The last word means "missionaries." The lectures are valuable to all loving students of the glorious old and mighty book, the Bhagavad Gita.—[J.]

"THOUGHTS REGARDING THE CLASSIFICATION of Information contained in the Religious Books of the World, for a Philosophical Treatment of the Subject" is a pamphlet intended as "An Essay on Religions, for the Parliament of Religions, Chicago." It is by Ishar Parshad and printed at Lahore, India. With remarkable and painstaking analysis into heads and subdivisions, it discusses the Philosophy, Nature, History of Religion, its enormous influence and importance, its various postulates as to the soul, destiny, duty, sin, salvation, ritual, the character of God, etc., and insists that all need the most dispassionate and scientific examination, free from prepossessions and sectarianism, the one purpose being the securest truth from the broadest investigation. The pamphlet is able and worthy, an honorable contribution to the Parliament, and especially interesting because from that land which is the Mother of Religions.—[A.F.]

EVOLUTION ACCORDING TO THEOSOPHY is an important pamphlet by Miss Katharine Hillard, F. T. S., who from time to time enriches Theosophical literature with the same delicate perceptiveness and finished diction which make so memorable her Lectures on the Poets. Having first mastered and then systematized the philosophy of The Secret Doctrine, she has taken the factor of Evolution and expounded its operation under two heads, I, The Evolution of the Earth, II, The Evolution of the Races. In so far as either is upon the authority of the Secret Doctrine, the passage referred to is epitome mized or quoted, volume and page being given, and with vast patience and care the teachings scattered through the two volumes are digested, methodized, and put in consecutive order for connected view. But the results of large personal acquaintance with scientific works are no less used to complete the scheme, and in thirty-nine pages is furnished an intelligent, systematic, lucid exposition of the topic, so arranged and expressed that every Theosophist can gain clear apprehension and an orderly understanding. Miss Hillard has thus provided for present and future readers of the Secret Doctrine a compact digest of its evolutionary philosophy, saving them the maddening confusion from what she generously terms its "wealth of illustrative digression"—one of the neatest of euphemistic phrases, by the way—and making possible a wider circulation of its contents. Yet pages 25 and 26 are almost as badly muddled as anything in the Secret Doctrine. The pamphlet can be read as an instructive outline of evolution even by those indifferent to its Theosophical bearings, but of course its real, and avowed, purport is Theosophical. (PATH office, 10 cents.)—[A. F.]

OCEAN OF THEOSOPHY. The first edition having been exhausted, a new one has been issued. Col. Olcott points out very truly—though not as a Sanskrit scholar—that the word devachan is not Sanskrit as stated in the book. This is quite true, as that word, though including deva and chan, two Sanskrit words, is not, as a whole, found in Sanskrit dictionaries. There can hardly be any doubt of its derivation from that language, though used by the Buddhists. There is a word very like it in Sanskrit, devacchana; and another, devayana, "the way of the Gods," occurs in the Mundaka Upanishad. Another error kindly pointed out is a misprint of Brahmarandhra for Brahmanda on p. 125, which readers will please correct: it is a misprint only, and I did not mistake one for the other. The saying is common in which "this Brahmanda" means the period of universal evolution or even a particular one.—[W. Q. J.]

REMINISCENCES OF H. P. BLAVATSKY and the Secret Doctrine by Countess C. Wachtmeister is now out. We have an advance copy, 162 pp. in paper. English price, 1s. 6d, probably fifty cents. It has several chapters by the Countess, followed by Appendix I. containing accounts by B. Keightley, William Q. Judge, and others; and Appendix II, some newspaper extracts. It is intensely interesting, a valuable contribution to our knowledge of H. P. Blavatsky, and will be read by the critics as well as the friends of the remarkable woman whose name fills the pages. (The PATH and Theosophical Publishing Society.)

REPORT OF THEOSOPHICAL CONGRESS AT WORLD'S FAIR, CHICAGO.

Contributions towards the expenses of the Congress have been so generous that a surplus exists, and there has been decision to use this in printing a verbatim report of the proceedings and addresses as a permanent record of so important an event. The speeches were taken down by stenographers and are being rapidly set up in type. It is expected that the Report, which will make a book of 175 pages, will be issued soon after the appearance of November PATH. Each subscriber to the fund will receive one by mail, and copies will be on sale at 30 cents each, paper; 75 each, cloth, postpaid in either case. Orders can be sent now to the PATH and will be filled in due course.

AMERICA.

CHICAGO T. S. had on September 24th a meeting which filled its Headquarters, overflowed into and filled the Law School room next door, and turned away two hundred unable to enter. Mr. Geo. E. Wright, the President, introduced Bro. Dharmapala of Ceylon, who delivered an address on "Buddhism." Meantime Mr. B. Harding of the Aryan T. S., New York, spoke in the other hall, and afterwards the two speakers exchanged places. Thus everyone had an opportunity to hear each. At the Sunday evening meetings Mr. Wright, Miss Leonard, Mr. Wade and others will give papers or addresses of twenty or thirty minutes, followed by an address from Mrs. Thirds or another. These addresses will be used at each of the three centers in rotation. Mr. Harding has a Study Class at Headquarters on Saturday evening, half an hour being given to the Bhagavad Gita and an hour to the Ocean of Theosophy. The first gathering numbered seventeen. It is only for members and associates, and six associates have already joined in consequence.

At Englewood, during Mr. Chidester's absence, Mr. Harding has taken charge of the weekly meetings and on October 8th began a course of public lectures in a hall. Of the two new members, one is a Ceylonese Buddhist. On the North Side Mr. Wade, and others have taken a house having a room convenient for public meetings, where a weekly meeting and a Sunday evening lecture will be held. This makes three working public centers in Chicago. At Downer's Grove, a place of four thousand inhabitants and twenty miles from Chicago, Mr. Puffer is arranging for lectures, and Mr. Harding has spoken on "Reincarnation and Karma."

PITTSBURG T. S. is slowly but steadily gaining ground, thanks to the various visitors from New York. The Branch is now established in its new Rooms at 79 Fourth ave., and has them open on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, besides a meeting on Wednesday evening and a lecture Sunday evening. Press interest is reviving, and much encouragement is felt.

KALAYAMA T. S., New Britain, Conn., has now thirty books as beginning of a Library, and has distributed with good effect between 700 and 800 tracts through the town. In the largest and most centrally located building in town two rooms have been taken and suitably furnished, seating a hundred or more. Entrance is from two streets through three doors, and the rooms have every convenience. It is purposed to keep the rooms open most of Sunday for giving information and for reading. Public lectures would do incalculable good if lecturers could be had from outside.

SYRACUSE T. S., Syracuse, N. Y., was chartered on October 7th with thirty-five members, all but one being new. The earnest work of Dr. Wm. H. Dower, formerly of New York, has brought this about. Because of recent consolidation of Branches, the Syracuse Branch is 77th upon the American roll.

MR. JAMES H. CONNELLY'S LECTURE upon "Vibrations," delivered at the Maschmedt Farm on September 10th, was printed in full in the Corinthian, Corinth, N. Y., in its issue of October 6th. The Corinthian has been most generous in its aid to Theosophical work at the Farm, and this able and learned lecture will circulate all through that region. Copies may be procured from the Corinthian office for three cents in stamps.

DR. J. D. BUCK, in the Cincinnati Tribune of September 28th, exposes a Rev. Mr. Lockwood who had attacked Theosophy in a published sermon as "The New Religion," and shows that Mr. L. himself knew nothing of Theosophy and little of either religion or fact. Slanderers, unless very reckless indeed, had better keep clear of Cincinnati.

ON THE EVENING OF SEPTEMBER 19TH Toledo T. S. opened its new Headquarters, "Lotus Hall." The table was decked with flowers, and upon an easel stood a covered picture of H. P. B. presented by a member. Mr. J. M. W. Wheeler, the President, made a few opening remarks, and then Mrs. Annie Besant spoke enthusiastically of the Teacher whose printed works are the great possessions of the Theosophical Society. Closing with an appeal to best honor H. P. B. by rejecting all sectarian spirit, she drew the cover from the portrait. Prof. Chakravarti then spoke on the power of religion, and Mrs. Besant made a further address, an informal reception closing the evening.

ARYAN T. S. Sunday evening lectures in October were: 1st., The Theosophy of Small Things, H. Alfred Freeman; 8th., The Coming Doom, James H. Connelly; 15th., The Consolations of Theosophy, Alex. Fullerton; 22d., Similarity of the Doctrines taught by Christ and Buddha, Dr. T. P. Hyatt; 29th., The Goddess Maya, Miss K. Hillard.

BROOKLYN T. S. Sunday evening lectures in October were: 1st., Theosophy in Practice, Alex. Fullerton; 8th., Theosophy and Christianity, Rev. James Taylor; 15th., Scandinavian Myths and their Theosophic Teaching, Wm. Main; 22d., The Goddess Maya, Miss K. Hillard; 29th., Similarity of the Doctrines taught by Christ and Buddha, Dr. T. P. Hyatt.

TORONTO T. S. has taken a room on the most central street in the city for two years, and all meetings will in future be held there. On Wednesday evening is held the Branch meeting, on Friday a public meeting for discussion, on Sunday morning a study-class for one hour, and on Sunday evening an expository meeting.

CLAUDE F. WRIGHT left New York City for Chicago on September 12th to attend the Theosophical Congress at the World's Fair, which he addressed on the sixteenth of September. He then left for Kansas City, Mo., arriving there on Thursday, September 21st. That night he addressed the Kansas City Branch on "Altruism and Egotism," and the two following attended meetings of members in the Society's rooms to discuss Theosophy and Branch work. The next day, Sunday, he gave a public lecture entitled "An Outline of Theosophy" in the Masonic Rooms, 1015 Walnut street. Monday evening he attended another members' meeting in the Society's rooms. Tuesday evening, September 26th, he gave a public lecture on "Reincarnation" in the Masonic Hall. Thursday he lectured before the Branch on "Concentration." Friday he gave a public address entitled "Incidents in the Life of Madame Blavatsky" in the Masonic Hall. The next day, Saturday, he left for St. Louis, arriving there on Sunday morning, October 31st. The afternoon of that day he lectured publicly at the Society's rooms on "Theosophy and Reincarnation," and in the evening gave an address on "Dreams." The evening of the following day, Monday, he addressed the Society on "Death." Tuesday evening he left for Clinton, Iowa. On Wednesday, October 4th, he held a meeting of the members of the Clinton Branch at Mrs. Gale's parlors. Thursday and Friday he gave two public lectures in Clinton on "Theosophy" and "Reincarnation" respectively, leaving for Minneapolis immediately after the latter. He arrived in Minneapolis on Saturday morning. That evening he attended a meeting of the members of the Society at the residence of Mrs. Buffington-Davis. Sunday evening he gave a public lecture entitled "Does Theosophy teach Fatalism?" in the rooms of the Branch in the New York Life Insurance Building. On Monday he addressed a meeting at the residence of Mrs. Ida Harris. On Tuesday he attended the annual business meeting of the Minneapolis Branch and gave suggestions for carrying on the work during the succeeding year. The following evening, Wednesday, October 11th, he lectured before the St. Paul Theosophical Society on "Reincarnation." October 12th, he attended a meeting of members in Minneapolis. The Sunday following, he gave a public lecture in the afternoon on "The Principles of Theosophy" in the Fifth Universalist Church at Minneapolis, and in the evening a public lecture in the new rooms of the Society on "The Mission of the Theosophical Society."

Monday, the sixteenth of October, he attended a meeting of the St. Paul T. S. and answered questions on the general subject of Theosophy put by the members. Tuesday evening he lectured in the rooms of the Minneapolis Society on "Obsession." Many other private meetings have also been attended by Mr. Wright, and he has called personally on numbers of the members in the different cities he has visited. After a visit to St. Paul and Lake City he passes to Fort Wayne and to Columbus, Ohio, and will then probably go South.

OBITUARY. Mr. John M. W. Wheeler, President of the Toledo Branch, passed from this incarnation on October 6th. Bro. Wheeler joined the T. S. in January, 1887, when members were few and work small. Always deeply interested, he was unable for years to see much result to his efforts, but at last, in December, 1892, his desire to see a Branch in his own city was realized. He was the first to fill the chair of President, and the first to be called from the Branch by death. His illness, though not long, was very distressing, but his thought throughout was for the Cause and its triumph. Dr. Buck of Cincinnati well described his character and labors at the funeral services, and the remains were removed to Detroit for cremation. Warm regrets at his loss were expressed by the Toledo press, and his own Branch passed resolutions of sorrow.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

MR. E. B. RAMBO, though ever busy, prepares excellent papers for the public meetings. "The Children's Hour," conducted by W. J. Walters, continues its excellent work in San Francisco.

PORT TOWNSEND T. S., Port Townsend, Wash., was chartered September 30th with five members. This is one fruit of Dr. Griffiths's labors.

THE NEW BLAVATSKY HALL, 431 I-2 S. Spring st., Los Angeles, seating 100 people, has been well filled at each public lecture. The Branch meetings are held there, and are gaining in strength and interest. A Friday evening "Discussion Class" has been established, and this too is well attended. The Los Angeles Branch is another which has found parlor gatherings a failure and a regular Hall indispensable to success. Everything is now prosperous and everybody sanguine. The lecture on October 1st was upon Theosophy, Occultism, and Science by Frank Neubauer, and that on the 8th upon Justice, Intelligence, and Intuition by Mrs. L. E. Giese.

BRO. H. DHARMAPALA, returning to India by the Japan route, lectured in San Francisco on October 8th. upon "Theosophy: its Relations to Eastern Religions," and in Oakland on October 9th upon "Man: his Mission on Earth." He expected to sail for Japan on October 10th.

DR. GRIFFITHS lectured in San Francisco on September 17th and in Oakland on the 24th upon the "Sun," treating the subject from a Theosophical view-point and bringing out many novel and interesting matters. The lecturer is now upon a second trip to Northern California.

REDDING T. S., Redding, Calif., was chartered on October 19th with five members. It is one of the fruits of the Pacific Coast Lectures, and is the 78th Branch on the American roll.

THE BANDHU T. S., Santa Cruz, Calif., has changed its name to the Santa Cruz T. S., and a new charter was accordingly issued on October 16th. On October 6th Bro. H. Dharmapala lectured to a crowded house, many being turned away. After the lecture the people gathered around him and plied him with questions for an hour. Long reports were given by the local press.

THEOSOPHICAL CORRESPONDENCE CLASS.

PRELIMINARY PROSPECTUS AND NOTICE.

The increase of the purely routine work of the General Secretary's Office has made it impossible to fully reply to all the numerous questions put in letters, and enquirers have to be referred to books after the first usual correspondence has passed. But this does not do away with the needs of sincere enquirers, nor with the necessity for study and the obligation to help members to grasp the teachings of Theosophy so that they may be able to help others in their turn by presenting Theosophy and the aims of the T. S. in a reasonably clear manner to questioners. Many members also require help because of the hurry of our present life and from previous lack of training in metaphysical investigation. The different needs cannot be fully met by the issuance of Branch Papers and the Forum, as these are necessarily limited in area of influence.

Having been offered assistance by some competent members, I have decided to start a CORRESPONDENCE CLASS a part of the work of the American Section T.S., to enable those members desiring to avail themselves of it to pursue their studies in Theosophy more systematically so that they may thereby gain a better understanding of the philosophy of Theosophy and its application to daily life, thus making it more certain that the growth of the Society shall not merely be in numbers but also in the Theosophical education of the units composing the whole body—at least in so far as concerns the American Section.

METHOD OF WORK.

1. All members in good standing of the American Section T.S. can join the Correspondence Class by applying in writing to the address given below.
  2. Every three months, or oftener if warranted, a subject will be selected for study and a list given of books and articles which are to be read. Discretion is reserved to include at any one time more than one subject.
  3. Questions bringing out the most important points of the subject will be sent to members of the class. The number of questions will be decided on after some trial.
  4. Replies to these questions are to be sent to the office of the General Secretary, addressed as requested below, where they will be examined and returned to the senders with comments and suggestions in all particulars wherein they seem to require it or as enquiries made shall indicate.
  5. Members will be permitted to send ONE question with each set of replies. Such questions will be made use of in the general questions. Discretion is reserved as to dealing or not dealing with irrelevant questions.
  6. From time to time general notes and comments upon the replies, or a complete paper upon the subject, will be sent out to all, either with the next set of questions issued or independently.
  7. Students will probably be divided into classes if such a method shall appear desirable, but this head may be altered as experience may indicate.
  8. Hints as to methods of study will be sent with the first set of questions.
  9. Members are not to reply to the questions until after the expiration of one month from receipt of the same, in order that they may have ample time to study and think over the subject, and also that the office may not be unduly burdened with work.
- These regulations and methods are subject to alteration at the discretion of the office.

It is hoped that no member of the Society will take up membership in this Correspondence Class unless with the determination to keep up the work. Some of the questions may appear to be very simple, but in that case the student should endeavor to make more complete answers and to throw fresh light upon the subject.

As there will necessarily be expenses of postages, paper, and some printing, members of the class are requested to help in this matter by sending stamps for the return of their papers, and also, if they can, by sending an extra two or five cent stamp. The class ought to be self-supporting, though as yet that is not demanded.

PRELIMINARY QUESTIONS.

All members joining the class are requested to answer the following questions for the information of the Office:

1. How long have you been a member of the T.S.?
2. What books have you studied and what merely read?
3. Have you written any papers for any Branch Meetings or Magazine, or have you delivered any addresses or lectures?
4. What topic, doctrine, or phase of Theosophy has struck you most forcibly or engaged your attention?
5. What books do you possess, and have you access to a Theosophical Library?

All communications relating to the Correspondence Class are to be addressed to: Secretary T. S. Correspondence Class, 144 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Correspondents are asked not to mix the business of this class in letters relating to any other matter: if this request is not complied with, all such letters will remain unanswered so far as concerns the Correspondence Class, as the various departments of work in the General Secretary's Office are distinct from each other.

NON-RESPONSIBILITY OF THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.

The Theosophical Society is not responsible as an organization for any view or opinion to be expressed or intimated in any of the papers, documents, questions, or answers in this class: nor is the Society in any way bound thereby: nor are any such views or opinions authoritative or to be deemed as the views or opinions of the T.S.: they are only individual views and opinions of those who express them.

OCCULT ARTS.

No. III.

DISINTEGRATION — REINTEGRATION.

JUST as we have seen that precipitation is known to material science in electroplating and other arts, so also is it true that in most departments of applied science disintegration is understood, and that here and there reintegration of such substances as diamonds has been successfully accomplished. But these are all by mechanical or chemical processes. The question here is, whether—as in respect to precipitation—the occult powers of man and nature can bring about the results. Has any one ever reduced a solid object to impalpable powder and then at a distant place restored the object to its former state? And, if so, how is it done? As to the first, I can only say that I have seen this done, and that many testimonies have been offered by others at various times for the same thing. In the records of Spiritualism there are a great many witnesses to this effect, and accepting all cases in that field which are free from fraud the same remarks as were made about precipitation apply. With mediums it is unconsciously done; the laws governing the entire thing are unexplained by the medium or the alleged spirits; the whole matter is involved in obscurity so far as that cult is concerned, and certainly the returning spooks will give no answer until they find it in the brain of some living person. But the fact remains that among powerful physical mediums the operation has been performed by some unknown force acting under hidden guidance, itself as obscure.

This feat is not the same as apportation, the carrying or projecting of an object through space, whether it be a human form or any other thing. Buddhist and Hindu stories alike teem with such apportations; it is alleged of Apollonius the Greek, of Tyana; Christian saints are said to have been levitated and carried. In the Buddhist stories many of the immediate disciples of Buddha, both during his life and after his death, are said to have flown through the air from place to place; and in the history of Rama, some ascetics and Hanuman the monkey god are credited with having so levitated themselves.

So many metals and minerals may be volatilized that we may take it as a general rule that all—until an exception is met with—are volatile under the proper conditions. Gold is slow in this respect, some observers having kept it heated for two months with no loss of weight, and others found a small loss after exposing it to violent heat; a charge of electricity will dissipate it. Silver volatilizes at red heat, and iron can also be similarly affected. But when we come to wood or softer vegetable matter, the separation of its atoms from each other is more easily accomplished. The process of disintegrating by the use of occult forces and powers is akin to what we can do on the material plane. The result is the same, however the means employed may vary; that is, the molecules are pressed apart from each other and kept so. If by mechanical, chemical, and electrical processes man can bring about this result, there is no reason, save in an asserted unproved denial, why it may not be done by the use of the mind and will. Rarity or unusualness proves nothing; when the telegraph was new its rarity proved nothing against its actuality; and it is every day becoming more the fashion to admit than it is to deny the possibility of anything in the realm opened up by our knowledge of electricity, while the probability is left merely to suspended judgment.

Passing from material science to the medical researches into hypnotism, we find there the stepping-stone between the purely mechanical physical processes and the higher subtler realm of the mind, the will, and the imagination. Here we see that the powerful forces wielded by the mind are able to bring about effects on bone, flesh, blood, and skin equal in measure to many processes of disintegration or volatilization. But in every-day life we have similar suggestive facts. In the blush and the cold chill which come instantaneously over the whole frame, spreading in a second from the mental source, are effects upon matter made directly from mind. Even a recollection of an event can easily bring on this physical effect. In hypnotic experiments the skin, blood, and serum may be altered so as to bring out all the marks and changes of a burn or abrasion. In these cases the mind influenced by another mind makes an image through which the forces act to cause the changes. It is possible because, as so often asserted by the ancient sages, the Universe is really Will and Idea, or, as is so well put in a letter from one of the Adepts, "the machinery of the cosmos is not only occult, it is ideal: and the higher metaphysics must be understood if one is to escape from the illusions under which men labor and which will continually lead them into the adoption of false systems respecting life and nature in consequence of the great 'collective hallucination' in which modern scientific persons glory so much, but which they do not call by that name."

So much, then, being briefly premised, it is said by the schools of occultism, known not only since the rise of the Theosophical movement but followed for ages in the East and continued down to the present day in India—that the trained man by the use of his will, mind, and imagination can disintegrate an object, send it along currents definitely existing in space, transport the mass of atoms to a distant place, passing them through certain obstacles, and re-integrate the object at the given distant spot exactly with the same visibility, limits, and appearance as it had when first taken up for transport. But this has its limitations. It cannot ordinarily be done with a human living body. That would require such an expenditure of force and so interfere with the rights of life that it may be excluded altogether. Size and resistance of obstacle have also to do with success or failure. Omnipotence of a sort that may transcend law is not admitted in Occultism; that the Adepts pointed out when they wrote that if they could at one stroke turn the world into an arcadia for lofty souls they would do so, but the world can only be conquered step by step and under the rule of law. It is the same in all operations that copy nature either chemically or mechanically. Hence it is said in these schools that "there are failures in occult art as well as among men". Such failures come from an inability to cope with limiting conditions.

We can analyse the phenomenon of disintegration and transport of mass of matter and reintegration in this way: There is the operator who must know how to use his will, mind, and imagination. Next is the object to be dealt with. Then there is the resisting obstacle through which it may have to pass; and the air, ether, and astral light through which it travels. Lastly is the question whether or not there is the force called cohesion, by means of which masses of matter are held together within limits of form.

If it be said that the force known as gravity holds masses of matter together, we are reduced to accepting a more mysterious explanation for a common thing than the three persons in one God. But cohesion without any other postulate amounts merely to saying that masses of matter cohere because they cohere. Occultism, in common with the Vedantic philosophy, says that there is a force of cohesion which has its roots and power in the spirit and in the ideal form; and attraction and repulsion operate from the same base also. Further, that school holds gravitation to be but an exhibition of the action of these two—attraction and repulsion. Living masses such as vegetables, animals, and men deal with matter in another state from that which is in minerals, and exhibit the quicker action of disintegrating forces; while minerals go to pieces very slowly. Both kinds are compelled in time to fall apart as masses in consequence of the action of evolutionary law when they are left altogether to themselves; that is, the whole quantity of matter of and belonging to the globe is continually subject to the hidden forces which are moulding it for higher uses and turning it, however slowly, into a higher class of matter. The normal rate is what we see, but this normal rate may be altered, and that it can be altered by intelligent mind and will is the fact. This alteration of rate is seen in the forcing processes used for plants by which they are made to grow much faster than is usual under common conditions. In the same way in masses of matter which will surely go to pieces in the course of time, long or short, the molecules may be pushed apart before their time and held so by the trained will. That is, the force of repulsion can be opposed to natural attraction so as to drive the molecules apart and hold them thus away from each other. When the repulsion is slackened, the molecules rush together again to assume their former appearance. In this case the shape is not altered, but the largely diffused body of molecules retains its shape though invisible to the eye, and upon appearing to sight again it simply condenses itself into the smaller original limits, thus becoming dense enough to be once more seen and touched.

When a small object is thus disintegrated by occult means it can be passed through other objects. Or if it is to be transported without disintegration, then any dense intervening obstacle is disintegrated for a sufficient space to allow it to pass. That the latter is one of the feats of fakirs, yogis, and certain mediums can be hardly a matter of doubt except for those who deny the occult character of the cosmos. Alleged spirits in respect to this have said, "We make the intervening obstacle fluid or diffused, or do the same thing for the object transported", and for once they seem to be right. A gentleman of high character and ability in the northwest told me that one day a man unknown in his village came to the door, and exhibiting some rings of metal made one pass through the other, one of the rings seeming to melt away at the point of contact. H. P. Blavatsky has narrated to me many such cases, and I have seen her do the same thing. As, for instance, she has taken in my sight a small object such as a ring, and laying it on the table caused it to appear without her touching it inside of a closed drawer near by. Now in that instance either she disintegrated it and caused it to pass into the drawer, or disintegrated the drawer for a sufficient space, or she hypnotized me with all my senses on the alert, putting the object into the drawer while I was asleep and without my perceiving any sort of change whatever in my consciousness. The latter I cannot accept, but if it be held as true, then it was more wonderful than the other feat. The circumstances and motive were such as to exclude the hypnotizing theory; it was done to show me that such a phenomenon was possible and to give me a clue to the operation, and also to explain to me how the strange things of spiritualism might be done and, indeed, must be done under the laws of man's mind and nature.

Next we have the intelligent part of the matter to look at. Here the inner senses have to act under the guidance of a mind free from the illusions of matter, able to see into the occult cosmos behind the veil of objectivity. The will acts with immense force, exerting the powers both of attraction and repulsion as desired; knowledge of occult chemistry comes into use; the currents in the astral light or ether have to be known, as also how to make new currents. Those who have seen into the astral light and looked at the currents moving to and fro will understand this, others will either doubt, deny, or suspend judgment. The imagination as in the case of precipitation, is of prime importance; for in these things imagination is the sight and the hand of the mind and the will, without which the latter can accomplish nothing, just as the will and brain of a man whose arms are cut off can do nothing unless others aid him. But mind, will, and imagination do not re-construct the disintegrated object, for as soon as the dispersing force is slackened from its hold on the mass of molecules, the imagination having held the image of the object, the atoms obediently and automatically rearrange themselves as before.

All this may seem fanciful, but there are those who know of their own knowledge that it is all according to fact. And it is doubtless true that in no long time modern science will begin, as it is even now slowly starting, to admit all these things by admitting in full the ideal nature of the cosmos, thus removing at once the materialistic notions of man and nature which mostly prevail at the present day.

MARS AND THE EARTH.*

THE apparent contradiction between the teaching of the Masters as put forward by their direct messenger, H. P. Blavatsky, and as understood by Mr. Sinnett is capable of very easy explanation. The solution turns on the words "solar system". If that term be held to denote the solar system known to Western Science, the sentence given by Mr. Sinnett is meaningless; but reference to the series of letters from which the isolated passage respecting Mars is quoted at once shows the meaning attached to the "solar system" in the correspondence. I naturally turned to the letters themselves—copies of which I have—to solve the puzzle, and I found that Master K. H. used the term in a special and quite definite sense.

He explains three kinds of manvantaras, pralayas, etc.—universal, solar, and minor. A minor manvantara is composed of seven rounds, i. e., the circuit seven times of a planetary chain of seven globes. To such a chain our earth belongs. A solar period consists of seven such sevenfold rounds, i. e., forty-nine; seven such planetary chains compose a "solar system"; in three of such chains our Earth, Mars, and Mercury form the D globe. Globe D of the Mars chain and globe D of the Mercury chain are visible to us, because those chains are sufficiently near our own in evolution, one behind us, one ahead of us, for their matter to affect our senses, while the remaining four chains are too far away in evolution to have enough in common with us for visibility. Mars and Mercury bear a special relation to our Earth in the whole evolution of the solar system, though not part of the Earth chain. The other four planetary chains belonging to our solar system are too far behind us or in front of us for even their globes D to be seen.

Other planets belonging to the solar system of Science as arranged in the West do not belong to the solar system of the Esoteric Philosophy, and it is the ignoring of this which has led to the confusion. A western reader naturally gives the term his own sense, not knowing that in the teachings it was used in a quite different one. And so, once more, we find the Masters' doctrines self-consistent.

ANNIE BESANT.

NOTE. The above article, sent for coincident publication in PATH and Lucifer, is an important contribution, as it furnishes a final explanation which, if properly taken, will tend to assuage controversy. On page 163, Vol. i, Secret Doctrine the author, referring to this subject in a foot note, says: "Copies of all the letters received or sent with the exception of a few private ones—in which there was no teaching", the Master says—are with the writer". Some may have imagined that this statement in the foot note was a "license" taken by the author of the Secret Doctrine, but surprises are not uncommon, and there seems to be very little doubt about the truth of the assertion. It is extremely easy to misunderstand in respect to the "almost ideal machinery of the occult Cosmos" when we are dealing with it in English words produced by a thoroughly materialistic development, but in the course of time the teachings given out all will be found in harmony as our views expand. The word "solar", for instance, connotes only ideas in relation to the visible sun, and yet it is the only English word we could use if we wished to speak of an unseen solar orb superior to and governor of our visible one. In time, however, all these perplexities will be relieved.—ED.

INDIA BETWEEN TWO FIRES.

THE above is the general topic for discussion by our dailies and weeklies just now. It seems to me that the above is perfectly true, but not in the sense they take it. India, educated, thinking India, is now truly between two fires; on one side is the fierce fire of materialism and intellectual selfishness, fanned by our foreign education, casting a lurid glare on our impoverished condition, making it doubly hideous; on the other side is the yet but tiny spark of our Sanatana Dharma, which the Theosophical Society is ever trying to fan into a flame, and which even at this stage is shedding its calm radiance over the minds of men. Young men, graduates of our Universities, are swayed to and fro, now abject followers of the men of science, now inclined toward our Religion; now a rank skeptic, now a new convert to a belief in the Shastras. Brothers do not agree with each other; one a bigot of science, and the other no less a bigot of his idol. Father and son, younger and elder, husband and wife, master and servant, teacher and students, all of them disagree; the one a rigid Hindu, the other a hater of all beliefs and dogmas. Truly we are passing through strange and dangerous times, and none can say whether it will be all plain sailing hereafter or there is a breaker ahead.

Twenty years ago, it was twenty years and no more, we two students, while boldly declaring our Religion to be Hinduism, considered ourselves something like heroes; and now many seriously question the truth of that which they do not find in the Shastras. Now the question is, which is to win at last, bigotry or Theosophy? By bigotry I mean bigotry either in Science or Religion, materialism or transcendentalism; for they are equally pernicious, equally limiting further progress, intellectual as well as spiritual. Even now the war has commenced between disbelief and belief on the one hand and between reasonable belief and blind faith on the other, and many are passing from blind disbelief to blind faith without pausing to think what they are doing; so belief is between two fires, and yet hopes to win at last.

There are two very popular weekly papers in Bengal. One condemns all that is foreign, is opposed to all innovations and reforms (even the Railway and the Telegraph, strange as it may appear to you); the other would REFORM everything Indian, and condemns all that we have. Both are largely read, both admired by many. So those that think calmly and judge soundly are between two fires; yet they fondly hope that they will in time prevail.

On the one hand, the introduction of Western civilization is ever increasing our wants; on the other, we are, for many reasons, becoming poorer and poorer; many find themselves unable to make the two ends meet, others are in pinching want. While foreign luxuries are becoming common, our means of livelihood are becoming scarce, and we find ourselves between two fires as regards our economic condition.

You in the far West may not sympathize with our thoughts and aspirations, with our movements and actions, yet purified, regenerated India, rising Phœnix-like from the ashes of its dark Kali Yuga, would be able to yet instruct the West by expounding its time-honored Shastric teachings, and in that relation, if not in others, it is bound to the West by the holy tie of spiritual sisterhood, a tie that can not, should not, be ignored by you.

And it is in that belief that I write to you, let Theosophy and Brotherhood prevail all the world over, let us help each other in the cause of Spiritual Progress of Humanity, and there are those who will assist us, as they have founded the Society to which we all have the honor to belong.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

HEVAVITARANA DHARMAPALA is a member of the Indian Section of the Theosophical Society, and visited the Chicago Parliament of Religions as the Buddhist delegate to the Parliament and at the request of the Managers of that gathering. Advantage was taken of his visit to have him represent the Ceylon Section of the T.S. in the Theosophical Society Congress in September, and he then appeared on our platform upon two occasions, the last being at the great extra meeting for a general representation of Theosophy to the Parliament, when 4000 people were present. He is also Secretary of the Maha Bodhi Society of India, which has for its object the restoration to the Buddhists of the Buddha Gya shrine in India, where, however, the Buddhists are not large in number.

Brother Dharmapala's visit enabled many Theosophists to make his personal acquaintance, as he stayed in Brooklyn, N. Y., with the members there, attended their meetings, and spoke to the Aryan T.S. on the same evening with Prof. Chakravarti, Mrs. Besant, and Miss Müller. After the closing of the Parliament he went home by Japan, stopping at San Francisco, where he once more met members of the T.S. and lectured publicly for them, causing much favorable comment in the newspapers of the coast. From there he sailed for home, and in his latest letter at hand just before going to press he expresses the hope of being here again in two years. On all those who met him he made an impression of gentleness, sincerity, and devotion. He is spare in figure, his eyes are black and his complexion very dark. With his oriental face and dressed in the Ceylonese costume he attracted much attention everywhere, and at the Parliament was one of the most noticeable figures.

IMMENSE ANTIQUITY OF AMERICA.

NO. I.

SINCE some Theosophists have taken for granted that authorities agree as to the derivation of the aborigines of America from ancient India,<sup>1</sup> perhaps it would be well to place together as closely as possible the conclusions of an opposite character arrived at by some of the recognized authorities upon American antiquities. This is here attempted, not in a spirit of controversy, but to substantiate the statements of the Secret Doctrine, which has not taught that India was the cradle of the human family.

It will be evident from what follows that central Asia is deemed the starting-point for the races of the Old World only (although this is disputed by many<sup>2</sup>), while the origin of the first tribes of the Western hemisphere is—agreeably to all but a few fanciful writers who have no facts at their disposal to support absurd conclusions—wrapped in profound darkness. Parenthetically it could be added that they have had but little success in tracing other races than the Aryan—as, for example, the Ethiopian—to an original home in central Asia, and this is in agreement with the Secret Doctrine, which places them as one of the direct offshoots of the Atlanteans. The negro had the same physiognomy 3000 and 5000 years ago (as shown by Egyptian bas-reliefs) that he has to-day.

M. le Marquis G. de Saporta indicates the regions of the North Pole as the first home of the human family,<sup>3</sup> and in this he agrees with the Secret Doctrine, for it is the "First Continent", hundreds of millions of years old. He also said:<sup>4</sup>

<sup>2</sup> Dr. Fligier argues in Kosmos that the theory of the Asiatic origin of the Aryan race is not yet as firmly settled as has been supposed. Latham disputes it on geographical grounds in his Native Races of the Russian Empire. Pictet believes, on the evidence of the names of animals and plants that were known to them, that they originated farther north than the Asiatic theory supposes, and fixes their birthplace in southern Russia. Benfey and Prof. Thomaschek of Grätz agree with him, and indicate the region of the southern Volga as their primary home, [etc.] . . . Dr. Fligier believes that the results of linguistic, anthropological, and archeological researches indicate that the [East] Indians and the Iranians lived near each other for a long time in eastern Europe or northwestern Asia, and that the Indians followed the Iranians into Asia.—"The Original Home of the Aryans", Popular Science Monthly, vol. xxi, p. 571.

<sup>3</sup> It will be seen that we are inclined to remove to the circumpolar regions of the North the probable cradle of primitive humanity. From there only could it have radiated as from a center to spread to several continents at once. This theory agrees best with the presumed course of the human races. . . . The general laws of geology favor this hypothesis in a remarkable manner.—"How the Earth was Peopled", Popular Science Monthly, vol. xxiii, p. 678.

The spread of man throughout Europe and Asia does not offer very great difficulties. . . . The difficulties are, however, formidable when we come to America, which we find occupied from one end to the other by races whose unity has struck the best observers. Not only, moreover, did the American man inaugurate on the soil of the New World an original and relatively advanced civilization, but he has left, chiefly to the north, indisputable traces of his presence in the most remote ages. Palæolithic implements have been found in the valley of the Delaware, at Trenton, New Jersey, and near Guanajuato in Mexico, so clearly characterized that they cannot be mistaken. . . . We are thus in the presence of the problem, always coming up before us and always escaping us, of the origin of the American man.

Alex. Winchell, a leading geologist of America, places "Lemuria as the probable cradle of humanity"; and since he also advocates the theory of the lost Atlantis, (vide Pre-Adamites, chap. xxiii), his theories are in remarkable agreement with the statements of the Secret Doctrine. To quote from his book:

From the pre-Australian trunk diverged probably in Western Lemuria a sturdy and prolific stem which was destined to cover Asia and the Malayan regions with dense populations, and to send its streams of migrations over all the New World. . . . It is the great stock from which the straight-haired peoples of all parts of the world have been derived. (p. 369.)

American ethnology is beset with perplexities which have baffled the best skill of investigators. . . . Respecting the origin of the American peoples, the diversity of opinion is almost ludicrous. Polygenists have been ready to regard them as autochthonous. This view is most ably defended by L. Agassiz and J. C. Nott.<sup>2</sup> It is maintained by D. F. von Hellwald,<sup>3</sup> who sharply denies the dispersion of mankind from some original abode in Central Asia. Hon. L. H. Morgan regards the valley of the Columbia river in Oregon as the primitive Eden of America, "the seedland of the Ganowanian family",<sup>4</sup> and he leaves the impression that he considers them autochthonous. Galindo transferred the primitive residence of the human race to America. Very recently Dr. Rudolf Falb is reported to have announced the discovery that the relation of the Quicha and Aymara languages to the Aryan and Semitic tongues is such as to justify the opinion that the primitive seat of the human species was either in Peru or Bolivia. Of those who held to the population of America by immigration, some maintained that the American Indians are descendants of Jews, some that they are the posterity of the "lost tribes" of Israel. (p. 384-385.)

These last prejudiced conclusions are unworthy of serious consideration, since Christians have endeavored to find traces in America of the ten mythical tribes merely because no part of the Old World shows their whereabouts, and profane history is silent on the subject. With such writers Bering's Strait as a route for tropical people is a favorite theme. Many have been the fantastic theories evolved by minds destitute of fact upon the subject. There, for example, is Ranking, who among other things tried to make out that the giants eighteen feet high, spoken of in the ancient traditions of the Incas and Aztecs, were elephants, in the endeavor to prove that "the first Inca of Peru was a son of the Grand Khan Kublan". (See his Historical Researches on the Conquest of Peru (etc.) by the Moguls.) Even among more reliable writers we are given a pleasing variety. M'Causland contends that the original American stock came from the Hyksos, or "Shepherd Kings"; Squier from the Polynesians,<sup>1</sup> Georgius Hornius and Gaffarel from the Phœnicians, Catlin from the Welsh, Barber from the Egyptians, Charnay from the Javans, Rink and others from the Eskimo, while others mention the Norsemen, Irish Kelts, Cyprusans, etc., as their probable ancestors. It shows that where fact is absent hypothesis reigns supreme. After reviewing the evidence Winchell, although a believer in the Old Testament, is compelled to admit:<sup>2</sup>

The weight of opinion, after all, tends to regard the American civilization as indigenous, and this view seems most consonant with the general tenor of the evidence. Common characteristics must be expected to germinate from the common nature of man.

Epitomizing all that has been written on the subject, Chambers Cyclopaedia says:

As to the aboriginal ages there arises a question, too interesting to be overlooked and yet too doubtful to be solved, as to the origin of the native tribes and peoples of America. . . . It appears highly probable that they did not all spring from one and the same primeval band of adventurers. . . . Whence came the successive shoals of invaders? To this question no direct answer can be given. We can only scan the various routes by which, previously to what we call the discovery of America, the Old World was most likely to people the American continent. To begin with the natural routes on the side of the Pacific—Bering's Strait, the Aleutian Islands, and the Polynesian archipelagoes—we can hardly conceive anything but barbarism having been conducted to America by any one of them. The country which stretches backwards from Behring's strait to the Kolyma may be asserted to be, without exception, the most inhospitable portion even of Siberia; and, moreover, the Strait itself has more probably been a channel of migration from America than from Asia, the Tchuktchi of the latter regarding themselves rather as a branch than as a stem of the Tchutktchi of the former. With respect, again, both to the Aleutian isles and the Polynesian archipelagos, the successive stepping-stones in either series, instead of being presumed to have been so many halts for Asiatic Columbus and Magellans, must rather be viewed as each a mother-country to a new colony, as each a point of departure for a fresh swarm. Thus would the ever-aggravating blight of isolation—exemplified even in the Old World among the Laplanders, the Kantchadalas, and the Hottentots—prepare at each remove a deeper and deeper barbarism to land at last on the western shore of America.

These difficulties, however, do not prevent second-rate writers, having in view the biblical theory, from speaking glibly about these routes being means for the peopling of the New World; but since wisdom gives birth to discretion, we do not find high authorities as to American archæology making statements so confidently. For example; at the eighth International Congress of Americanists, held in Paris in 1890,<sup>1</sup>

The Marquis de Nadaillac presented and read an extended review of the evidence on the subject of "The Earliest American". His origin he confesses to be entirely unknown; but he is of the opinion that he occupied the continent of America during the glacial, if not during the pre-glacial period, and that he passed through two periods of cold.

"It was an original civilization", said Baldwin, after carefully weighing the evidence for immigration. He then continues:<sup>2</sup>

It has been said very justly by one explorer of the Mexican and Central American ruins that the American monuments are different from those of any other known people, of a new order, and entirely and absolutely anomalous; they stand alone. The more we study them the more we find it necessary to believe that the civilization they represent was originated in America and probably in the region where they were found. It did not come from the Old World; it was the work of some remarkably gifted branch of the race found on the southern part of this continent when it was discovered in 1492. Undoubtedly it was very old. Its original beginnings may have been as old as Egypt, or even farther back in the past than the ages to which Atlantis must be referred;<sup>3</sup> and it may have been later than the beginning of Egypt. Who can tell its age? Whether earlier or later, it was original. . . .

The decorations and also the writing are wholly original. There is no imitation of the work of any people ever known in Asia, Africa, or Europe. . . . The culture and the work were wholly original, wholly American. . . .

I find myself more and more inclined to the opinion that the aboriginal South Americans are the oldest people on the continent; that they are distinct in race, and that the wild Indians of the North came originally from Asia.

It is thus shown that to attribute to India the distinction of having been the birth-place of the races of the New World is but to set up an hypothesis with nothing to support it. That real authorities upon American antiquities have not done this, is seen from the foregoing quotations, taken from among many similar ones. And this is what is admirable in writers who may be classed as authorities on American archæology, that they readily admit they do not know, and do not try to bolster up preconceived opinions with hypotheses which do not follow from known data. From one who, on account of his being a devout Roman Catholic, we would not look for such scrupulous fairness in matters touching upon "heathen" religions, is Bandelier, now in central South America on a three years' search after antiquities, and from whom much may be expected upon his return. He never allows his own opinions to warp his judgment in such matters. If a new fact comes to his notice, he puts it down just as he obtained it, even though it may seem to destroy some cherished theory of his own. If they all had pursued the stratagems of, say, the Egyptologists, who, because the Jews were said in the Bible to have been held in bondage in ancient Egypt, have never lost an opportunity to distort anything available to bear out such theory, there would be nothing relating to American antiquities worthy of serious study. But happily American antiquarians have not done this, for they frankly admit they do not know whence these people came. For example, Prescott, after scanning all existing authority to prepare his Conquest of Peru, was compelled to admit:<sup>1</sup>

Whence this remarkable race came and what was its early history are among those mysteries that meet us so frequently in the annals of the New World, and which time and the antiquary have as yet done little to explain.

And Squier, an authority on Peruvian antiquities, remarking<sup>2</sup> that "those mysterious records of the past are generally superior in development in proportion as they are anterior in age", thus speaks about the ruins of Tiahuanaco, conceded to be the most ancient in South America:<sup>3</sup>

Unique, yet perfect in type and harmonious in style, they appear to be the work of a people who were thorough masters of an architecture which had no infancy, passed through no period of growth, and of which we find no other examples. Tradition, which mumbles more or less intelligibly of the origin of many other American monuments, is dumb concerning these. The wondering Indians told the first Spaniards that "they existed before the sun shone in the heavens", that they were raised by giants, [etc.]

Now the Theosophist, unlike the orthodox Christian, should feel under no necessity of showing the human race as springing from one type. Monogenists, in the interests of biblical myths, have strained themselves in this direction, but the student of Theosophy, adhering to the reliableness of the documents of the Brotherhood, believes that seven primal races of men, each of a distinct color, were placed on earth simultaneously, each on a separate zone; and that most continents have risen and disappeared since then, the few survivors serving as seed for the different races in widely-separated portions of the earth's surface.

That Atlantis was the origin of both the Egyptians and the races of the new world so closely resembling them will be demonstrated in due course of time. Such was the contention of many noted writers, whose statements corroborate the Secret Doctrine, as will be shown in Paper No. iii. JOHN M. PRYSE.

TWO SPIRITUALISTIC PROPHECIES.

ONE NULLIFIED. THE OTHER FOR THE FUTURE.

IN 1877 the Religio-Philosophical Journal had questions and answers published in its pages, giving spirit lore from "the independent voice," headed as follows :

By the spirit of James Nolan through his own materialized organs of speech in the presence of his medium, Mrs. Hollis-Billing, at her residence, 24 Ogden avenue, Chicago.

The series went on until the year 1878, and covered a multitude of subjects. They are important from the fact that they are definite, and, being from an accepted spirit, should have as much weight as anything invented by living spiritualists. Occasion will be taken to use them now and then to show how the "spirits" agree with Theosophy, albeit their followers do not. The following may serve to discover what certainty there is in a prophecy by a "spirit."

DISCOVERY PROPHESED.

Question. What is your opinion, as a spirit, of the hollow globe theory — that is, that the interior of the earth is adapted to the habitation of man?

Answer. I am not prepared to answer that question. I will say this much, that there is land at the North Pole, and an open sea where you will find people in less than fifteen years.

That was in December, 1877, and now it is 1893, sixteen years, and the prophecy not fulfilled. We waited the full time, as was told to Col. Bundy we would when he was kind enough to give the files of the paper containing the complete series. These failures are always passed over.

FUTURE GREAT INVENTOR NAMED.

In March, 1878, Nolan was asked if it were possible to make a telescope through which we might see beings on other planets, and he replied :

Yes. In the year 1901 there will be a lens constructed, by the aid of which the trees and inhabitants in the planet nearest the earth can be seen. The feat will be accomplished in England by a person by the name of Hollingsworth. He is yet a boy.

This is also definite, and one of its parts can now be inquired into by Theosophists. Does any one in England know of such a boy who by this time is a man and must now be at work in some line leading to the end given? If so, he should be discovered to us and watched to see if the new telescope will be made. 1901 is not so far off, either, that we may not all be able to verify the prediction or add it to the lot in the false list. These two instances are interesting from their definiteness, as it is not easy to fix such matters. It might be a good thing for the spiritualists themselves to scrutinize the record for the purpose of seeing how much the "spirits" really know that men do not.

THE KEY-NOTE.

IT is always the key-note of everything that we want to seek or strike. The key-note of Christianity seems to be the personal or personality, the key-note of Theosophy, individuality; therefore in the evolution of the race they work beautifully together, Christianity preceding the wider Theosophy, which, again, leads into the Universal. There becoming the Wisdom Religion and the "Heir of all the Ages".

We should be grateful to Christianity. As represented by Jesus, it was Theosophy. But at that time the World lived in the personal, and so translated his teachings into its own language, as is the custom of humanity, from childhood on, with everything it accepts—and it must do so to accept it.

The child begins with the personal; it naturally grasps for itself. "Self-preservation is the law of life" has always been said in the Western world, and Christianity has provided for the carrying out of this law. It has a personal God, personal salvation, a personal heaven with a personal harp, classifications of persons there, and personal bodies (which they regard as themselves) here, in this world, even suggesting that these will be resurrected into the other world. Then, only, will they be surely saved, for until then heaven is an uncertain state where they are represented by a filmy something which they call their soul, but to which they hardly venture to give their undivided attention or to consider as necessary, until after death. Meanwhile, their bodies and the relations of this life are more interesting and all absorbing.

This is the Frœbel method. It is the method of all intelligent education and of evolution. "First that which is natural, and then that which is spiritual." But here must come in another stage of development. The continuity of this life is questioned. Death steps in to take our loved ones, and thus our hearts are touched to long for a continuance of these ties, or the rush of civilization causes changes in outside ways. The lesser is sunk in the greater, small business enterprises cease to succeed, everything must change and be on a larger scale, houses must be torn down, palaces must be built, trusts must be formed, people must live in hotels or apartments if they have not purses to conduct life in a large way. The interests of man cease to be centred in himself, he is part of a whole; like a child when he begins to go to school, he is an individual in a community.

Then must begin consideration for others; his own interests cannot exclusively usurp his attention; others have rights; only by conceding these can he hold his place. Here comes in the germ of "Brotherly love", and the consciousness of Karma, or the law of action and reaction, cause and effect. Then, if some loved one is taken away, the feeling comes that there must be something beyond the body, there must be a continuity of life—and here we find the essence of the individual, the soul. Bodies lose their preëminence in our thoughts, we realize that our true life is on other and invisible planes. As we cannot see and hear our departed loved ones, we learn to meet them in the Over-Soul, the Universal, and thus again sink our separateness—this time, of the Soul—in the grand whole, or Spirit. Then man really lives, and begins to realize, to know, what he may be, and that, being Spirit, he can dominate and not be subject to matter, which is but the manifestation of Spirit. This larger life of Spirit with its limitless possibilities is the teaching of Theosophy, which is the continuation of Christianity, and the spirit, but not the letter, of Christ's teachings. We have lived in the letter, the body; now we live in the Spirit. We may live that Spirit in the Churches or out of the Churches. But we are told in the Bible that it is difficult for new wine to be held in old bottles. Form is not lasting, and forms confine. The old meaning clings to them and the Spirit is hampered. When a man wishes to change his life, to live on a higher plane, we tell him he can do it more easily and rapidly by going to a new place, by changing his associations. It needs a man of marked conviction and firm will to renew himself amid old surroundings. And thus in the life of the Soul the beginner can work better and more rapidly among those who believe we are the Soul and the body is but raiment. The literature, the associations, the daily lives of his companions help him. For this reason only would we leave the Churches and join the Theosophical Society, for this and to help on the work of the Society which has helped us. But if we are strong enough to be carried by the Spirit, to live in our souls and aid those still in the bondage of the flesh, amid the old surroundings, we may do a great work in the Churches. That is a question each must judge for himself. In Theosophy one has a larger and more unquestioned freedom to do, to be, and to grow.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ANONYMOUS COMMUNICATIONS.

THE PATH has received an anonymous letter signed "Reader". Such communications are generally not noticed, especially when they contain attacks or objections. This "Reader" thinks that the PATH should not have any advertisements on its covers of outside matters, and says "Please 'fire' all the ads. or I will do that for the Path". Without stopping to reflect upon the language used in this sentence, we wish the "Reader" and all others to know that the PATH has never flourished, as our correspondent says it has, without such aid as advertisements would give. It has been a continual loss to the Editor because the advertisements are of its own books, and Theosophists do not support it. The Society is not its owner and could not sustain it, as the dues paid by members do not pay rent, postage, and printing, but leave a deficit to be met by private persons. Advertisements will be inserted if procurable. The very one "Reader" objected to was donated by the "PATH" in order to procure a piano rent-free for the Sunday "Lotus Circle". If such persons as this anonymous blusterer would contribute more of their means—as others do—and less of their senseless criticism, it would benefit Theosophy. We have worked for seventeen years without their aid, and if they leave our list we can survive and there will be room left for others.

COMFORTS OF THEOSOPHY.

Dear PATH :

As some persons have said that Theosophy seems cold to them, that it takes away their old hope and gives nothing in return, I thought this from a letter to me from one who has had many trials and disappointments in life might do good. He says "I have read Seven Principles of Man and Reincarnation by Mrs. Besant that you sent me. They throw a flood of light on a subject that has hitherto been to me dark and mysterious and apparently beyond my grasp. But these writings by their simplicity and directness open up a field for investigation and thought full of both profit (in the higher sense) and pleasure, making life abundantly worth the living; giving one's soul power to rise superior to all disappointments and adversity, and sustaining the spirit with a peace 'that passeth understanding', together with a charity for the pettiness in others that would otherwise burn out, by resentment and bad feeling, the better part of life. I thank you again for putting these truths in my hands." This, I think, would be the verdict of all those who truly reflect and are not carried away with the selfish desire to throw their burdens on someone else. Yours,

D. D. C.

 THE SEVEN YEAR TERM AND INSURANCE.

Dear PATH :

Having heard that the Life Insurance Companies had begun to recognise the fact that the body makes a complete change in seven years, I asked an Insurance manager the following :

"Is it the custom, practice, or rule of medical examiners of Life Insurance Companies to reject applicants who are or have been afflicted with chronic rheumatism? But if an attack of rheumatism has not been suffered for seven years preceding application, is the objection removed and the application approved so far as that is concerned?", to which he answered "Yes" in both cases. He also informed me, more at length, "that medical examiners considered that any disease that had not manifested for seven years had passed out of the system, although they made tests to discover latent traces; in other words, after seven years the presumption is very strong against its presence."

This seems to me good proof that applied science admits the old theory spoken of very clearly by the Greeks and known before them to the Hindus, of the septenary change completely of the mass of physical molecules. It may be useful to students. Fraternally,

 BACK THEOSOPHIST WANTED.

Dear PATH :

I am a member of the Aryan T.S. and want No 12 of volume IV, Theosophist, for which I am willing to pay a good price to complete my set. Readers will please communicate with the PATH.

Yours,

F. T. S., G.

LITERARY NOTES.

OCTOBER LUCIFER is exceptionally varied and interesting. The new cover is a doubtful improvement, Lucifer himself being obscured by the roughly-designed radiance which serves as a back-ground for all of him but his right arm and his feet, but the lettering is better. A spirited paper on "Some Modern Failings" by a Chinese, Che-Yew-Tsang, is really delightful; "B. K." writes well on "Problem of the Theory of Knowledge"; Mr. Mead's heart-warmed paper on "Fierce Impetuosity" shows a touching earnestness of practical sympathy which endears him to those who had supposed him only a cultivated scholar or a sternly orthodox pupil of the Secret Doctrine; Mrs. Higgins tells of "Buddhist Temples in Ceylon"; "A Rosicrucian Adept" gives strange facts of a case in the seventeenth century; "Karma and Astrology", based on a lecture before the Ludhiana Branch in India, begins most rationally but becomes somewhat fanciful (as what does not?) when it enters astrological territory; Mrs. Besant beautifully and tenderly states her view of Mr. Sturdy's "Gurus and Chelas"; Mrs. Sarah Corbett repeats, though without added thought, the familiar analysis of man's sevenfold nature. Mrs. Frederika Macdonald again attempts to get the better of Mrs. Besant and again fails, Mr. Mead gently but very thoroughly disposing of her. It is strange how some people suppose that fibs can be successfully sustained by audacity and mis-quotation.—[A. F.]

OCTOBER THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XIX" clearly depicts the contrast between Oriental and Occidental opinion of mediums and séances, and gives extracts from letters of Stainton Moses and spiritualistic communications to him. Then comes "The Horoscope of H. P. Blavatsky" by Sepharial, prefaced with a description of characters born under Cancer which is astonishingly accurate as to H. P. B. though written years before the author met her. Her nature and life are then drawn as from Astrology, and Col. Olcott adds a note of great interest. "A Queer Experience" is a remarkable story of hypnotization by an Indian fakir, who also gave correct prediction as to the subject's death. Mr. Sturdy's "Gurus and Chelas" is printed entire, Lucifer having cut out the three paragraphs the author deemed vital. "Krishna's Journey to Mount Kailas" opens most interestingly; there is discussion of the important question whether Reincarnation is taught or denied in Isis; and Mr. N. Ramanujacharia, a writer of great logical power, demolishes a venturesome contributor to The Light of the East who had attempted to criticise Mansel. Col. Olcott in "Cuttings and Comments" collects a number of striking items from the East, one of the most impressive being a remark in the Lahore Tribune upon the perpetual national influence of the Indian epics. Full facts are given of the moral degradation of the late Treasurer at Adyar, his suicide and the cynically heartless letter he left for survivors.—[A. F.]

THE NEW CALIFORNIAN for October contains an instructive article on "Occult Forces" by Dr. J. D. Buck, and a brief but very suggestive paper by H. T. Edge upon "The Three Paths".

LIGHT OF THE EAST for September. "A Chela" asserts that "since the death of Madame Blavatsky the Mahatma K.H. has cut off His direct connection with the Theosophical movement", and expresses his "intention to review Esoteric Buddhism chapter after chapter in the future issues of this journal, and to point out the difference between the doctrines of the Upanishads and the current Theosophical doctrines. If necessary, the real esoteric doctrines of Hindu Mahatmas will be placed side by side with the doctrines preached by Mr. Sinnett." Can it be that the Mahatma K. H., having discarded the T.S., has opened communication with the "Chela" and is about to correct the views He unfolded for publication in Esoteric Buddhism? This possibility is further hinted at on page twenty-one, where we are told "the real secret", i.e. "that the half-a-dozen teachings which one or two Europeans extorted from K.H. were given very unwillingly, and that the real truth about these things was kept in the background." The extortion of teaching from an unwilling Mahatma is certainly a process of which the West has been hitherto in profound ignorance, and if it is again to be attempted with even greater success Light of the East will indeed verify its title.—[A. F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI, No. 11, is on "Evolution", by R.B. Holt. It is a very careful and studious compendium of teachings from thirteen works, H. P. B.'s being naturally the most authoritative, and specially shows what are the agreements between Esotericism and modern Science and how the former supplements the latter. The author senses some of the complications which even the most tender of disciples cannot altogether blink in certain expositions, and calls them "very puzzling", but finds comfort in the "allegorical" theory. Serner logicians might demur to the reasoning at the foot of page eleven, and it is a little risky to define what is "the aspiration of the Absolute" or identify consciousness with Akasa, but the paper is really able and shows great amount of thought and digestion. Probably nobody can altogether escape confusion who subjects super-human topics to human dissection.—[A. F.]

REMINISCENCES OF H. P. BLAVATSKY AND "THE SECRET DOCTRINE," by Constance, the Countess Wachtmeister, is the little book so eagerly awaited by the Theosophic world. In easy style and with perpetual interest it gives the details of H. P. B.'s life while her great work was progressing, extracts from her letters, her fearful sufferings and indomitable courage, the scene when she was snatched back from death's door because choosing a sickly life and the completion of The Secret Doctrine rather than rest, its final issue and the gleam of joy it brought. Many deeply interesting pages tell of the marvelous way in which H. P. B. received or took the facts needed for the book, her utter devotion to the Master, how He advised and helped the Countess herself, how free was H. P. B. from interfering with others' independence of action. The special contributions in the Countess's narrative are two-fold: details of phenomena by or on behalf of H. P. B., and the conclusive proof of H. P. B.'s sincerity and genuineness as attested by one who lived with her day and night and had access to all her papers, belongings, and ways. Most people of ordinary sagacity will think this testimony of more weight than the envenomed slanders of the Psychical Research Societies, Colemans, and the like, who never lived with her, knew not her character or her mission, and who but spit at her safely from a distance. Karma will doubtless have all of them in its keeping, praise be to God! If any criticism on the Countess's truly delightful and valuable work may be made, it is that it might have been fuller, even more copious in incident and phenomenon, richer in personal reminiscence. Appendix 1 gives important facts concerning the Secret Doctrine from various contributors, but the newspaper articles in 11 are mere padding and worthless. (For sale by the PATH; paper 50 cts, cloth 75 cts.)—[A. F.]

SHIN-SHU CATECHISM of the Shinshu sect of Japanese Buddhism, by S. Kato, is published at Kyoto, Japan, by the Buddhist Propagation Society for free distribution. It has ninety-three questions on twenty-three pages, and is beautifully printed in English. The author explains why there are so many sects in Buddhism by saying that Buddha taught many different ways to suit varied natures. This sect is of faith founded by Shinran, who was born A.D. 1173. Christians who wish enlightenment as to religions based on faith and holding views thereon similar to the Christian doctrine should read this. Doubtless by sending to S. Kato, Hongwanjiha of the Shin Shin Sect, Kioto, Japan, copies can be obtained.

SUTRA OF FORTY-TWO SECTIONS translated from the Chinese is another pamphlet from the Kyoto B. P. Society. It gives also two other short sutras, on "Buddha and a Deva" and "The Five Great Bestowments of Charity". These are by M. Matsuyama of Kyoto. The object of the B.P. S. is to propagate Buddhism in foreign lands, by sending missionaries, by publishing Buddhist books and tracts, and by correspondence.

OUTLINE OF TRUE SECT OF BUDDHISM or Shin Shu is by Y. Mayeda, translated by S. Sonoda, published by the B.P.S. at Kioto. The author of the original is a priest of the sect and wrote it for the B.P.S. for distribution at the World's Fair, Chicago. We cannot refrain from these two quotations. On p. 18: "At first sight it may perhaps appear to those who do not understand the true doctrine of the Mahayana that Buddhism is allied to Christianity; but were they acquainted with the profound principles of the doctrine, they would perceive the superior excellence of Buddhism. . . . Moreover, the general morality taught in the Samvitri satya is not like that of Christianity, which is biased and in some cases detrimental to the State"; and on p. 19: "Being, then, suitable to every-day life and avoiding those superstitions into which Christians are likely to fall, there is no doubt that any European or American who studies the religion will be inspired with its truths." Buddhism is becoming active in the West, and judging by the sensation Dharmapala produced it could easily be propagated by competent priests.

ARYAN TRAITS is a book of two hundred pages by Kailas Chandra Mukhopadhyay, M. D., of Chensurah, India, (1891), and just received. No price is given, and all inquiries should go to the author. Its contents deal with almost everything relating to India on its religious and social sides, such as Religion, Idolatry, Life, Yoga, Mantras, Marriage, Education, Astrology, wine, etc. It is a protest from a Hindu heart that is oppressed by the feeble imitation of the worst parts of our civilization which now prevail there, and cries out for a change, for an attempt to get back to the position India once held. Better results would have been reached had there been more condensation. It is a collection of essays of a disjointed character. It serves to point out the spirit slowly but surely arising among Hindus, and which must at last produce good results.

GUIDE TO THE SPIRITUAL, a translation into the German by Dr. F. Hartmann, F.T.S. The title page says, "By Satya Kama Shaivya, Searcher after Wisdom". It is also declared to be drawn from the "only authentic sources and compiled with the aid of a Brahmin". This is vague, for the authenticity of a thing is new to us, especially as the author says the object of the book is to show that self-knowledge is the only true sort. Is this the source? If so, whose self? And the Brahmin, is he one of the Shiva sect, the teachings of which are not allowed by the other sects of the Brahmins? The object of showing that self-knowledge is the only true basis is certainly right and good. (Leipzig, Wilhelm Friedrich.)

ASTROLOGICAL SELF INSTRUCTOR by Bangalore Suryanarain Row, of Bellary, India, and the Astrological Primer by the same author are issued by him from Bellary. He writes that he intends to devote himself to the improvement of the science, and to start if possible an institution for the purpose. Those two works treat of the subject from both the view of the Hindu and European. There is also a pamphlet on the revival of Astrology. The price of the Instructor and of the Primer is about two rupees each, but as we have but three copies any one who desires others should address the author at Bellary, India. The Instructor has two hundred pages and the Primer seventy. The copies on hand will be sold as follows: The Instructor for seventy-five cents and the Primer for thirty-five.

EUROPEAN ORIENTAL DEPARTMENT, No. 6, vol. i, New Series, is a very interesting issue, giving translations from Hafiz the Persian poet, from Shaikh Abu Ali Qalandu the Mohamedan Saint, from the Masnawi-i-Manwi. N. F. Billimoria gives the Nirang Kusti from Zoroastrianism. The Chhing Chang Ching is extracted from Vol. XI of Sacred Books of the East, and K. P. Mukherji closes with an article on the Yoga Sutras which is of value to the student who will think. The Editor notifies all that he will not print for the sake of printing, but only when he has useful matter; a wise decision, and quite the same as the regulation adopted in the American Section.

SEARCH LIGHTS AND GUIDE LIGHTS is a little book by Edgar Greenleaf Bradford, a member of the Brooklyn T.S. It has 103 pages, printed well on good paper. Very evidently, as admitted, the book is tinged with the influence of the writings of Andrew Jackson Davis as well as with the phrenological methods fostered by Fowler and Wells. It is not possible to review it, as that the PATH does not do for any book. A good many good things are in it, but none of them original, and it must be said that the title is not reached in the text; that is, "Man and Nature; what they are, what they were, and what they will be." In the "First Principles" mistakes appear to be made, as he says that if one principle be admitted its counterpart follows, but then denies in the next sentence that good and evil exist coëvally. On what ground we do not know, as there is only an assertion. There is no proof that good is "the only positive principle". Both terms are relative, and, like matter and spirit, both exist together or we could comprehend neither. He is right in postulating that duality is the great cosmic law. But it seems erroneous to say that "form and force exist spontaneously together". The tone and tendency of the book are good and helpful to some, but books become wearisome when one knows that all this is to be found in the old philosophy of the Upanishads.

AMERICAN SECTION ORIENTAL DEPARTMENT will be carried on under new management after January and will give new translations of the Upanishads among other things. Full notice will be sent out with the next issue, now just ready.

REPORT OF THE THEOSOPHICAL CONGRESS. By a slip of the pen, it was announced in the November PATH that orders for the Report were to be sent to the PATH. As a matter of fact this report is sent out at cost, and there is no margin to allow for book-keeping. Orders should be sent direct to the General Secretary and be accompanied by the necessary remittance, 30 cents per copy in paper and 75 cents per copy in cloth. The bound volumes have been delayed in the bindery, but will be ready to send out before this reaches our readers.

VOICE OF THE SILENCE. A new edition of this Theosophical classic is in preparation by the PATH, and efforts are being made to have it ready by Christmas. It will be uniform in size and binding with the pocket edition of Bhagavat Gita, will be printed on the same beautiful paper, from new type, and will contain a fine half-tone portrait of H.P.B. This is a much more expensive book to make than either of the old editions, and in order to meet the wishes of many people it will be bound in two styles: one as mentioned, uniform with Bhagavat Gita, flexible morocco, colored linings, round corners and gilt edges, at $1.00; the other, red leather, round corner and red edges, at 75 cents. This edition will have the notes on the same page as the text to which they belong, thus saving the annoying necessity of perpetual reference to the end of the book.

Mirror of the Movement.

AMERICA.

ARVAN T.S. Sunday evening lectures in November were: 5th, A Pot pourri, H. T. Patterson; 12th, My Other Self, Alex. H. Spencer; 19th, The Aim of Evolution, Wm. Q. Judge; 26th, Man's Place in Nature, Jos. H. Fussell. At the meeting of the Branch on the seventh of November the discussion was on the right proportion of Altruism and Self-seeking. Mr. Fussell and Mr. Freeman held that the natural proportion being so much in favor of self, it was wise to give it no more share. Mr. Budd took similar ground and related the story of Buddha giving himself to the tigress. Mr. Fullerton used the equality of centrifugal and centripetal forces as illustrating the relation, and summed up all in the text "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," adding "and not less or more than thyself." Robt. Grimshaw, Ph.D., followed, saying in substance: "There can be no constant proportion between self-seeking and altruism; it varies with the conditions, as age and environment. The infant fills both hands with offered sweets; still older he offers to others; at twenty he worries for others and himself; at thirty he is concerned more about himself; at forty, his anxiety about himself having probably ceased, he may again become altruistic. We should instruct ourselves before beginning to instruct others, as there are too many preachers explaining things they do not understand. The giving of Buddha's body to the tigress was a pure waste of raw material." Mr. Judge agreed with the first speakers and with the suggestion to instruct oneself before teaching others, but pointed out that the fable as to Buddha was to show how in one birth or life he desired to cultivate compassion solely, and hence went to the uttermost degree, as in others he had done all the world demanded on the plane of selfishness and self-seeking ; he added that under the laws of karma, reincarnation, and unity, self-seeking was unwise and amounted to pure selfishness, and would surely set up a constant tendency in that direction so as finally to sweep altruism away.

CLAUDE F. WRIGHT left Minneapolis for St. Paul on October 17th. On Wednesday, the 18th, he addressed the St. Paul Branch on Karma. On Friday and Saturday he attended meetings of the Branch to discuss business questions and to answer questions on Theosophy put by the members. On Sunday, the 22, he delivered a public lecture at the Society's rooms on Occultism. Next day he went to Lake City, Minn., and lectured in Mrs. Underwood's drawing rooms before a large audience. On Tuesday afternoon he addressed a number of persons on H.P.B., and in the evening formed a branch of seven members in that city. On Wednesday, the 25th, he attended a meeting of the Chicago Branch and discussed Jainism with Prof. Gandhi. The next evening he spoke before the Englewood Branch. Sunday, the 29th, Mr. Wright lectured in the afternoon publicly at Englewood on The Mission of the T.S., and in the evening in the rooms of the Chicago T.S. on Obsession. On Wednesday, November 1st, he left for Fort Wayne. Thursday he lectured there on The Mission of the Theosophical Society. Friday he addressed the Branch on Dreams. Saturday he discussed new methods of Branch work with the members of the Fort Wayne T.S. Sunday evening he delivered a public lecture on Reincarnation. On Tuesday, the 7th, he attended a reception at the Fort Wayne T.S. rooms. On Wednesday he delivered before the Branch a lecture on Death, and on Thursday gave an address on H.P.B. On Saturday morning he left for Bluffton, Ind., accompanied by Judge O'Rourke and Mr. Henry Cohen, and that evening lectured publicly on Theosophy. The next day he arrived in Chicago and attended a meeting at the rooms of the Society in the evening. On Sunday evening he spoke before the North Side League on Karma. On Wednesday, the 15th, he attended at the Chicago T.S. rooms and spoke on Desire the Cause of Creation, the subject for that evening's discussion. On Saturday, the 18th, he attended a Bhagavad Gita class at the rooms of the Society, and on Sunday lectured publicly at the rooms on Occultism in Daily Life. On Monday, the 20th, he attended a conversazione given by the Chicago Society. Mr. Wright's tour will now extend through Toledo, Columbus, O., Memphis, and New Orleans.

MILWAUKEE, WIS. A great deal of interest was aroused by a week's visit from Burcham Harding. Arriving Tuesday, November 7th, he addressed Brahmana Branch that evening, using as a text a selection from the Bhagavad Gita. Wednesday night, at the residence of L. H. Cannon, he delivered an address on the Masters. Thursday night a public lecture was delivered on "Theosophy in the Bible," in Severance's Hall, to a small but deeply interested audience. Friday evening he gave a talk on "Theosophy" at the residence of Dr. Ford, and Saturday at the same place, to members only, on Branch work. Sunday evening he was invited to address the Liberal Club, which meets in Severance's Hall, and he took for his topic, "Evolution from a Theosophical Point of View." A good-sized audience listened attentively to the lecture, and in the discussion that followed many of the members of the club were ready to admit the reasonableness of reincarnation. As an illustration of the interest shown, the presiding officer of the club did not adjourn the meeting until after 10:30 p.m., and then for some little time discussion was carried on in groups around the hall, of the points brought out by the lecturer. Monday was devoted to local work and visits among those who had manifested an interest in Theosophy. Tuesday night was one of the most largely attended Branch meetings we have had in years. Mr. Harding spoke on "The Importance of Reincarnation." A vote of thanks was tendered Mr. Harding by the Branch for the good work he had done, the new life he seemed to have breathed into the Branch. The rumors current in "Jericho" to the effect that we were simply in an astral state, he declared not only to be misleading but false. Hereafter there will be public addresses on Sunday night, besides the regular Branch meeting Tuesday. Theosophical books will also be on sale. The papers have had most excellent reports of the public meetings, besides interviewing the lecturer on the movement. The good wishes of the members, collectively and individually, followed Mr. Harding on his journey to Chicago, Wednesday, November 15th. May our good Karma bring him to us again at no remote day!—(Communicated).

CINCINNATI T. S. is now located in one of the modern office buildings of Cincinnati. It occupies the entire seventh floor of the new Goodall Building on Ninth street opposite the new City Hall. The seventh floor has been undivided, and thus a large hall, with windows on three sides, has been secured. It will seat with the present number of chairs about two hundred and fifty people. In one corner of the room is a doorway leading to a small room used as a library. Large double doors open from the hall and elevator landing into the assembly room. On Saturday night, September 9th, the rooms were crowded with invited guests to witness the dedication of the new rooms to Theosophical work. The President, Dr. J. D. Buck, occupied the chair, and on the platform beside him were Annie Besant, Bro. Chakravarti, and Bro. Judge. Dr. Buck made a few remarks and introduced Bro. Judge, who spoke of the T. S. and its work. Then Bro. Chakravarti spoke of Theosophy in India, and Annie Besant closed with eloquent remarks on the duty of members to the local branch. The following Sunday and Monday Mrs. Besant lectured in the Pike Opera House to audiences composed of the thinking people of Cincinnati and vicinity. The Cincinnati T. S. has planned a series of Tuesday evening lectures, essays, and readings, to occupy the time from now until June, 1894. Subjects have been assigned, and the following have been given: October 3d, "Theosophy in History, Literature, and Philosophy" by J. D. Buck; 18th, "The Objects and Aims of the Theosophical Society," J. A. Knapp, "The True Theosophical Life," Mrs. Elizabeth Burdick; 17th, "The Three Postulates of the Secret Doctrine" by Dr. W. A. R. Tenney; 24th, same subject continued by Mrs. B. C. Buchanan; 31st, "Evolution as Taught by Modern Science and Evolution as Taught by the Secret Doctrine" by Dr. Thos. M. Stewart; November 7th, same subject continued by Miss Rose Winkler and Mrs. J. A. Knapp; 14th, "The Septenary in Man" by Dr. Thos. M. Stewart and Mr. J. A. Knapp; 21st, "The Septenary in Nature," Mrs. J. D. Buck and Mrs. D. W. Lockwood; 28th, continuation of the subject by Mrs. Thos. M. Stewart.

MACON T. S., Macon, Ga., was chartered on November 21st with eight charter-members. This branch is the result of earnest and careful work carried on for many months by a zealous member-at-large, who made thoughtful discrimination before acquiescing in the signatures to application. It is the first branch in the great State of Georgia, and ranks 82d on the American Roll.

CHICAGO THEOSOPHICAL ACTIVITIES are multiplying. A Bureau of lecturers has been formed to carry on Sunday lectures at the three centres already established. These now include Mr. R. D. A. Wade, Mr. Geo. E. Wright, Miss Pauline Kelly, Miss Leoline Leonard, and Mrs. M. M. Thirds, all of whom are prepared to do regular work in this field. One or two others will probably be soon added to this bureau. On October 25th Mr. Virchand R. Gandhi of Bombay, India, representative of the Jains at the Parliament of Religions, lectured before Chicago Branch on "Jainism". Mr. Claude F. Wright was present, and added much to the interest of this discourse by questions which called out fuller explanation of points differing from Theosophy, as well as by drawing attention to their treatment in Theosophic philosophy. Remaining with us for a few days, Bro. Wright lectured at Headquarters the following Sunday evening on Obsession. Lectures since then have been: November 5th, Personal Responsibility in Theosophy, Mr. Burcham Harding; November 12th, Methods of Spiritual Development, Mrs. M. M. Thirds; November 19th, Occultism in Daily Life, Mr. Claude F. Wright; November 26th, Hindu Philosophy, Mr. Geo. E. Wright. At the League Hall the lecture course receives gratifying encouragement, a constant increase in attendance being reported.

ST. PAUL T.S. has moved its quarters from the Globe Building to 521 Endicott Building.

CORINTHIAN T.S., Corinth, N. Y., was chartered on October 26th with five charter-members. This is the branch originating from the Theosophical work carried on during the summer at the Maschmedt Farm. Mrs. C. H. G. Maschmedt has been elected President, and Mr. Robert A. Chandler, formerly of Saraswati T.S., New Orleans, Secretary. The Sunday meetings at the Farm cannot maintain the remarkable interest of the summer, but good numbers always assemble, and the Theosophical center is strengthening and growing. This is the 80th Branch on the American Roll.

LAKE CITY T.S., Lake City, Minn., was chartered on November 7th with eight charter-members. It is the 81st Branch on the American Roll. The President-elect is Mrs. Anna B. Underwood, and the Secretary Mr. Roy Underwood.

BROOKLYN T.S. Sunday evening lectures in November were: 5th, Man, Visible and Invisible, Wm. Q. Judge; 12th, The Coming Doom, Jas. H. Connelly; 19th, Theosophy of Small Things, H. Alfred Freeman; 26th, A Pot-pourri, H. T. Patterson.

"H. P. B." T.S. Sunday evening lectures in November were: 5th, The Riddle of Man, by T. Richard Prater; 12th, Health, Physical, Mental, and Spiritual, by Dr. E. G. Day; 19th, The Goddess Maya, by Miss Katherine Hillard; 26th, Similarity of the Doctrines Taught by Christ and Buddha, by Dr. T. P. Hyatt.

ATMA T.S., New Haven, Conn., holds regular meetings every Monday evening at the house of the Secretary, 998 Grand avenue. Through contributions, etc., the Branch has a considerable library of Theosophical books, which it lends out to members and enquirers.

OBITUARY. Mrs. Mary E. Gunn of Excelsior T.S., San José, died at San Francisco on October 4th, aged fifty nine. Faithful wife, loving mother, true friend, humane and charitable in life, she is a loss to the Society.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

DR. GRIFFITHS lectured in Redding, California, on September 29th, and on the 30th the Redding T. S. was organized with five charter members, Mr. Ruggles Bostwick being elected President, and Mr. W.P. England Secretary. At the request of a number of citizens who rented and advertised a hall, a second lecture was given to an enthusiastic audience on October 2d. The Branch has ordered books for the nucleus of a library, and gives other indications of good work. On October 7th and 8th two lectures were given in Chico. On the 11th Dr. Griffiths visited Marysville, meeting a number of persons who had heard the lecture the year before and had since been studying and thinking over Theosophy.

SRAYAKA T.S., Marysville, California, was chartered on October 26th with six Charter-members. It ranks seventy-ninth on the American Roll. Mr. John W. Rupert has been elected President, and Mr. Wm. T. Henn Secretary. The local press gave very ample reports and commented favorably upon the organization of the Branch. The good work of Bro. William Henderson in Marysville prepared the way for this success, and his coöperation with the Pacific Coast lecturer did much towards making the Branch possible.

DR. ALLEN GRIFFITHS spent several weeks in Sacramento in October and early November. Branch and other meetings were held, besides two public lectures. On November 5th the subject was "Evolution," and most copious reports of this and of the lecture upon "Reincarnation" were given in the Bee, the principal local paper.

EUREKA T. S., Sacramento, has just made an important step forward by establishing a Headquarters. Two very large parlors which will seat eighty or one hundred people have been secured for six months, and will be daily open from 1 to 3 and from 7 to 9 p.m. Regular Branch meetings are held on Thursday evenings, and on Sunday evening is a public meeting for presenting the basic truths of Theosophy. The Library is one of the largest and most complete on the Coast, having nearly two hundred books, and as the Headquarters and the various meetings are advertised, good use will no doubt be made of it. The Librarian is daily in attendance. The rooms are handsomely carpeted and furnished, and photographs of H.P.B., Col. Olcott, Mrs. Besant, Mr. Judge, and others, also of Adyar, London, and the N.Y. Convention, adorn the walls. Magazines and current literature are upon the tables. The Headquarters is at 610½ I st, a central location. This admirable undertaking is due to the energy and whole-heartedness of a few of the oldest members, especially to one Brother who advanced the money and assumed all responsibilities. All success to him and it!

WILLAMETTE T. S., Portland, Oregon, had Sunday evening lectures in November; 5th, Transmigration, John M. Lüsbürg; 12th, Theosophy, the Ethical Educator, Mrs. L. D. Durkee; 19th, Theosophy and Evolution, A. R. Read; 26th, Karma, Miss Mamie McCasky.

DHYANA T.S., Los Angeles, resumed its regular weekly meetings after the summer vacation on Thursday evening, October 5th. The Secret Doctrine was taken as the subject of the winter's work, preceded each evening by short readings from the Voice of the Silence, Mr. J.J. Fernand leading the meetings and directing the course of study. These meetings are of interest mainly for somewhat progressed students, but special effort for spreading primary teachings is in union with the Los Angeles Branch in maintaining a Headquarters and vigorously sustaining the Sunday evening meetings there and the Friday evenings for inquirers.

SANTA CRUZ T. S. has outgrown its old quarters and has rented for Sunday evening meetings a nicely furnished Hall seating two hundred people. The meetings will be duly advertised, and good attendance is expected. All means hard work for the few who are active. Mrs. I. C. Oakley gave a very fine lecture upon "H. P. Blavatsky, her Life and Work", which was well received, and Mr. Dharmapala's lecture was so crowded that several hundred went away unable even to get standing room. Theosophic interest is growing wonderfully throughout California, and the great need is missionaries.

AT BLAVATSKY HALL, Los Angeles, Sunday evening lectures in November were: 5th, Instinct, Intelligence, and Intuition, Mrs. L. E. Giese; 12th, Theosophy and Ethics, H. A. Gibson; 19th, Post Mortem States, Dr. G. F. Mohn; 26th, Reality and Illusion, Frank Neubauer.

DR. GRIFFITHS lectured on Evolution in Oakland, Calif., November 12th, to a good audience.

AURORA BRANCH of Oakland, Calif. has changed its place of holding public Sunday lectures to I. O. O. F. Hall, corner 11th and Franklin sts, which, besides being much larger than the former place of meeting, is better lighted and ventilated. Audiences have been larger since the change, and indications warrant the prediction that Theosophy in Oakland will be even better and more ably presented than ever before. This is saying a good deal, for Aurora has always been one of the most active Pacific Coast Branches.

THE P. C. COMMITTEE has just issued a circular letter to Branches adjacent to San Francisco announcing reorganization of the Lecture Bureau and offering to supply Lecturers during the winter. The following Lecturers and Subjects are available: Dr. J. A. Anderson, Reincarnation, Karma, Septenary Man, Evolution; Mrs. S. A. Harris, The One Life, Functions of the Seven Principles; Abbott Clark, Theosophy: The Science of Life, and the Art of Living, Karma and Common Sense, Wise Men of the East; E. B. Rambo, Mahatmas, Objections to Reincarnation, The Good Law, The Heart Doctrine; Julius Oettl, Ambition, Duty, Enthusiasm; Mrs. V. S. Beane, The Destiny of Man, The Gates of Life, The Lost Chord; Mrs. J. R. V. Shoultes, The Inspiration of Theosophy, Facts of the Astral World, From Man to God, From the Human to the Divine.

BOTH T. S. BRANCHES in San Francisco continue weekly meetings with growing numbers and interest. The Headquarters have become too small, and larger are being sought: this is true also of the Aurora T. S., Oakland. The H. P. B. Training Class is effecting good results in teaching methods of imparting knowledge, and is cultivating in speeches good enunciation, pose, and gesture.

LONDON LETTER.

CHANGES AT HEADQUARTERS have been made in the use of the rooms. From 1891 until lately the two rooms used by H. P. B. were not used, one of them being her front work-room and the other, adjoining, her bed-room in which the bedstead remained. Now the iron bed has been removed and stored, and the room will be used, as also the front room to some extent. But in the front room will be kept, as before, the various objects, as well as the case containing pens and other relics of H.P.B.; the bronze casket containing the ashes will also remain in place.

On October 27th, there was a meeting of the Psychological Research Society at Westminster Town Hall, at which Mr. Walter Leaf read a paper to expose once more H. P. Blavatsky whom this Society cannot let rest. It consisted of a translation of letters said to be from her to Solovieff. Much the same thing had been done before, and the letters were very pointed, though not such evidence as came to much. A peculiarity of the reading was the giving of very droll passages or ironical ones in a somber tone meant to becloud them. No applause greeted the paper, and the reader sat down in cold silence. Mr. G. R. S. Mead was there and asked for a hearing, which was given him after his name was divulged. Things then went thus:

Mead. "I am the Secretary of the Theosophical Society" (applause). He then slowly and quietly said, in substance,— That he had one advantage over Mr. Leaf, as the speaker had known H. P. Blavatsky long and intimately, whereas Mr. Leaf had never seen her (applause). If Mr. Leaf had known her, he would have understood better her love of humor and fund of wit, and would not have read her jokes with a long tragical face (laughter and applause). It was true that Mme. Blavatsky began with the Spiritualists: no one but an idiot would have begun otherwise, seeing that that body of people already believed in the actuality of psychic phenomena (applause). Referring to Mr. Leaf's statement that H.P.B.'s speaking of Mahatmas was an afterthought, Mr. Mead said her own diary written in 1851 was as good evidence as any other, and that in the Headquarters was her old diary in which, under date of August, 1851, she had set down that then for the first time she had met physically "the Master of her dreams" (applause). Mr. Leaf had mentioned the large fortune of the Baron de Palm left to the T.S.; this fortune consisted of a few shirts and unpaid bills (roars of laughter and applause). What would the members of the S.P.R. think if the members of the T.S. constituted themselves a private detective bureau to spy into the life of the S.P.R. members, contrary to dear English traditions of gentlemen? (loud applause).

An old gentleman then arose, saying he felt mean to have sat and listened to such a paper peering through key-holes and reading people's private correspondence; he felt humiliated. This was Mr. Page-Hopps, the best known Unitarian minister in London. Another rose and asked why these things had not been published when Mme. Blavatsky was alive (applause). Mr. Leaf said in a weak voice that that would be explained when the matter was printed (silence). Mr. Myers then tried to make things better, and said the ideas of Theosophy were very like his own. It seems that the S.P.R. has an idea that by belittling Mme. Blavatsky as much as possible, some progress will be made in deducing laws from the facts of all sorts about dreams and the like, which they collect and store. I hear that the offer made by Mr. William Q. Judge last summer to the Psychological Society to submit to examination has been considered and on October 6th was ordered to be laid on the table.

A Lotus Circle is being started here. All the workers seem to be more in earnest than ever.

In Sweden they are starting a sub-Section as allowed by the Constitution, and I understand nine charters have already been issued.

AUSTRALIA.

MRS. COOPER-OAKLEY'S VISIT. The Sydney Theosophists were delighted to welcome Mrs. Cooper-Oakley on the 11th of July last, and a cycle of activity was inaugurated on the first night of her arrival. She met us and talked of Theosophy, of methods of work and propaganda pursued in London and other centers, and sketched out a plan for work here. The preliminary meeting was held at 14 Bond st. A larger room was taken in Hunter st. and a depot for literature opened. Mrs. Oakley held classes, and the number of attendants was fifty. She lectured publicly once a week to steadily increasing audiences. Lectures were also given to the Socialists and Woman Suffragists, there being good attendance. A Sunday evening lecture was given at the Unitarian church on "Spiritual and Ethical Teachings of Theosophy." It was crowded. Other parts of her work were parlor talks.

As a result of the visit a Theosophic League was made. It will have free lectures, distributes pamphlets, helps branches and all enquirers. There are two bodies besides the League. Newspapers gave good notices of Mrs. Oakley's work and opened their columns to letters on the subject. Visitors to meetings and parlor talks comprised all grades of Sydney society.

The newly-formed League opened with Sunday night lectures. Bro. Martyn began with one on "Down through the Ages," and on August 27th Bro. Guilford spoke on "The Two Paths." About fifty people came on each occasion. — (Communicated).

SUPPORT OF THE T.S.

"Hard times" have begun to seriously affect our Fund, and I have very few new names to add since last report.

My thanks are specially due Bro. W.M., Brooklyn, N.Y., one of the new pledgers, who sends with his September remittance $5.00 extra, stating that as he had collected some funds unexpectedly, he would divide with the T.S., thus revealing his thoughtfulness and care for the welfare of the Society. Also to Bro. H.W.G., who sends with his monthly remittance $2.00 to apply upon the Indian deficiency.

The new badges now on sale at headquarters and by me are moving well, considering the amount of publicity that has been given them, and this is another source of revenue that promises well.

My report since last report to date is as follows :

New subscribers in the ten cents per month class : O.P.M., C.E.F., per year, $2.40.

New subscribers in the twenty-five cents per month class : I.L.H., B.S., W.H.S., per year, $9.00.

New subscribers in the one dollar per month class : W.M., E.W., H.B.S., per year, $36.00

Total subscribers previously reported, 60. New subscribers since, 8. New total, 68. Grand total per year previously reported, $716.20. Total pledged by new subscribers, $47.40. Grand total per year to date, $763.60. Profits on sales of badges, $46.25. Total value of Fund for first year to date, $809.85.

G. E. H.

247 Green st., DAYTON, OHIO, November 15, 1893.

Received November 20th from G. E. Harter the sum of $48.95, being subscriptions since last report (October 16th).

ADYAR DEFALCATION FUND.

The defalcation by the late treasurer S. E. Gopala Charlu reported in the PATH and Lucifer was duly communicated to this Section; and Col. Olcott writes stating his intention of similarly notifying the Indian Section, at the same time expressing pleasure at the promptitude of the response from Europe and America. He will also start a fund there so that those who took upon themselves to guarantee reimbursement may not be unduly taxed. Responses have begun to come in from the American Section, and up to the date of this report are as follows; in cash not including pledges of future payments :

S. W. C.	$10.00	C. F.	$ 5.00	Mrs. J. C.	$ 2.50

OCCULT ARTS.

No. IV.

THE following is extracted from H. P. B.'s first book, and is printed in this series with the belief that it will be useful as well as interesting. She gives some fundamental oriental propositions relating to occult arts, thus:

1. There is no miracle. Everything that happens is the result of law—eternal, immutable, ever-active. Apparent miracle is but the operation of forces antagonistic to what Dr. W. B. Carpenter, F. R. S.—a man of great learning but little knowledge—calls “the well ascertained laws of nature”. Like many of his class, Dr. Carpenter ignores the fact that there may be laws once “known”, now unknown, to science.

2. Nature is triune: there is a visible objective nature; an invisible, indwelling, energizing nature, the exact model of the other and its vital principle; and above these two is spirit, the source of all forces, alone eternal and indestructible. The lower two constantly change; the higher third does not.

3. Man is also triune: he has his objective physical body; his vitalizing astral body (or soul), the real man; and these two are brooded over and illuminated by the third—the sovereign, the immortal spirit. When the real man succeeds in merging himself with the latter, he becomes an immortal entity.

4. Magic, as a science, is the knowledge of these principles, and the way by which the omniscience and omnipotence of the spirit and its control over nature's forces may be acquired by the individual while still in the body. Magic, as an art, is the application of this knowledge in practice.

5. Arcane knowledge misapplied is sorcery; beneficently used, true magic or wisdom.

6. Mediumship is the opposite of Adeptship; the medium is the passive instrument of foreign influences, the Adept actively controls himself and all inferior potencies.

7. All things that ever were, that are, or that will be, having their record upon the astral light, or tablet of the unseen universe, the initiated Adept, by using the vision of his own spirit, can know all that has been known or can be known.

8. Races of men differ in spiritual gifts as in color, stature, or any other external quality; among some people seership naturally prevails, among others mediumship. Some are addicted to sorcery, and transmit its secret rules of practice from generation to generation, with a range of psychical phenomena, more or less wide, as the result.

9. One phase of magical skill is the voluntary and conscious withdrawal of the inner man (astral form) from the outer man (physical body). In the cases of some mediums withdrawal occurs, but it is unconscious and involuntary. With the latter the body is more or less cataleptic at such times; but with the Adept the absence of the astral form would not be noticed, for the physical senses are alert and the individual appears only as though in a fit of abstraction—"a brown study", as some call it. To the movements of the wandering astral form neither time nor space offers any obstacle. The thaumaturgist thoroughly skilled in occult science can cause himself (that is, his physical body) to seem to disappear or to apparently take on any shape that he may choose. He may make his astral form visible, or he may give it protean appearances. In both cases these results will be achieved by a mesmeric hallucination simultaneously brought on. This hallucination is so perfect that the subject of it would stake his life that he saw a reality, when it is but a picture in his own mind impressed upon his consciousness by the irresistible will of the mesmeriser.

But while the astral form can go anywhere, penetrate any obstacle, and be seen at any distance from the physical body, the latter is dependent upon ordinary methods of transportation. It may be levitated under prescribed magnetic conditions, but not pass from one locality to another except in the usual way. Inert matter may be in certain cases and under certain conditions disintegrated, passed through walls and recombined, but living animal organisms cannot.

Arcane science teaches that the abandonment of the living body by the soul frequently occurs, and that we encounter every day in every condition of life such living corpses. Various causes, among them overpowering fright, grief, despair, a violent attack of sickness, or excessive sensuality, may bring this about. The vacant carcass may be entered and inhabited by the astral form of an Adept, sorcerer, or an elementary (an earth-bound disembodied human soul), or, very rarely, an elemental. Of course an Adept of white magic has the same power, but unless some very exceptional and great object is to be accomplished he will never consent to pollute himself by occupying the body of an impure person. In insanity the patient's astral being is either semi-paralyzed, bewildered, and subject to the influence of every passing spirit of any sort, or it has departed forever and the body is taken possession of by some vampirish entity near its own disintegration and clinging desperately to earth whose sensual pleasures it may enjoy for a brief season longer by this expedient.

10. The corner stone of magic is an intimate practical knowledge of magnetism and electricity, their qualities, correlations, and potencies. Especially necessary is a familiarity with their effects within and upon the animal kingdom and man. There are occult properties in many other minerals equally strange with that in the loadstone, which all practitioners of magic must know and of which so-called exact science is wholly ignorant. Plants also have like mystical properties in a most wonderful degree, and the secrets of the herbs of dreams and enchantments are only lost to European science, and, useless to say too, are unknown to it except in a few marked instances such as opium and hashish. Yet the psychical effects of even these few upon the human system are regarded as evidences of a temporary mental disorder.

To sum up all in a few words; Magic is spiritual wisdom; nature the material ally, pupil, and servant of the magician. One common vital principle pervades all things, and this is controllable by the perfected human will. The Adept can stimulate the movements of the natural forces in plants and animals in a preternatural degree. Such experiments are not obstructions of nature but quickenings; the conditions of intenser vital action are given.

The Adept can control the sensations and alter the conditions of the physical and astral bodies of other persons not Adepts; he can also govern and employ as he chooses the spirits of the elements. He cannot control the immortal spirit of any human being living or dead, for all such spirits are alike sparks of the Divine Essence and not subject to any foreign domination.

Propositions 2 and 3 contain and include the seven-fold classification. In 1877 H. P. B. was writing for those who had known but the three-fold scheme. In number two the vital principle (prana or jiva) is given; the body with vitality makes two; the real man inside called the soul, being composed of astral body, desires, and mind, makes five; the spirit, including the connecting link of Buddhi, completes the seven. The will is one of the forces directly from spirit, and is guided, with ordinary men, by desire; in the Adepts' case the will is guided by Buddhi, Manas, and Atma, including in its operation the force of a pure spiritual desire acting solely under law and duty.

SPIRITUALISM.

A "SPIRIT" TESTIFIES ON MATERIALIZATIONS.

LAST month we gave two prophecies from the "spirit" Jim Nolan as reported some years ago by the Religio-Philosophical Journal.<sup>1</sup> As this "control" has expressed himself quite definitely on several subjects, this article deals with some of his views on the phenomena of materialization of "spirit forms". The method of communication needs explanation. It is reported as being through his "materialized organs of speech". It is what is sometimes called the "independent voice". In these phenomena the medium was not entranced but carried on conversation, and the voice would sound from the air or out of the wall. Sceptics of course say that it is purely ventriloquism by the medium, but there are a large number of credible and intelligent witnesses who say that after careful examination no such trick was played, and that in several instances the voice was plainly heard while the medium was speaking at the same time. There is no exclusive impossibility in the matter, for two classes of spirits can project a voice from what appears to be empty space. The first is composed of the spirits of living men who have gained great occult power, and the other of certain gross entities existing in Kama Loka.

The séances used for this article were reported by the R. P. Journal, beginning October 13, 1877. Replying to the first question, Jim Nolan's voice said that he understood "the processes of form materialization of spirits", and was then asked to fully explain such alleged materializations. His answer completely demolishes the theory that a spirit can materialize itself, and throws doubt around the identity asserted for any so-called spirit, but his views have not been accepted by the Spiritualists. He said :

Question.—Will you fully explain the mechanical process, without going into the chemical properties of the various constituents farther than may be essential to a clear understanding of your statements?

Answer.—You understand that electrical particles in a darkened room are in a quiet condition ; and they are collected together by the spirits and laid one upon the other until a form is completed. After completing this materialized form, we take magnetism from the medium, or such magnetism as we can get from the circle, and put a coating upon the electrical particles of the physical body just completed ; and then the spirit steps into it and uses it in precisely the same manner as you use your physical form, controlling it by strong will.

power. There are also other modes of materialization ; sometimes we merely gather electrical particles and reflect upon them the face of some spirit, a reflected image as from a mirror is then seen ; or we first place these electrical particles gathered in on a sheet, like, for example, a sheet of paper ; then we coat this sheet with certain chemicals from the atmosphere, and then we reflect electrically upon them, and that brings the form of a face, and you clearly identify the likeness of a spirit ; for instance, here is a young girl not more than 16 ; the medium can be covered with a coating and made to look precisely like her, and then made to appear like the form of an old man of ninety. Sometimes spirits walk out upon the floor. Frequently the medium walks out covered with this dressing or a coating looking exactly like your deceased relative, and, should that fade off, the medium would be standing in your presence.

Being then asked a question regarding deception by mediums when presenting themselves as the spirit called for, he made the following interesting remarks in reply to the second query :

The only mode of purification is the proper purification of yourselves. I will venture to say that you can bring twenty people into this room to-night who ask for materialization ; ten out of that number would rather have the medium walk out from the cabinet and personate their friends, provided they did not positively detect the swindle, than go home without any manifestations. The spirits see this, and if not exactly honorable assist the medium. It is very rarely in cases of materialization that over two or three forms out of the whole number manifesting at a seance are newly materialized ; the same form is used with another coating. Really, what would be the use in building a house for every one who wishes to go into one for some especial purpose ? Another point : the materialized form shown never belonged to the physical part of that spirit ; such materializations merely consisting of chemical, electric, and magnetic principles or elements gathered from the atmosphere by the controlling or working band of spirits.

On the twenty-seventh of October in the same year Nolan was asked to explain the dematerialization of spirit forms, and said :

There is in such cases a black or darkened atmosphere thrown around it. It does not actually dematerialize. If it did, it could not be brought back again so quickly. When a body is materialized the particles composing the same are gathered together by the spirits and placed one upon the other until the desired form is completed ; if these are separated they go back to the elements they were in before and we only gather them together again with greater difficulty ; and often when the form disappears from view and you think it is dematerialized, the spirits have placed around it a darkened atmosphere to shut it from the view of those present.

On the seventeenth of November, 1877, the questions put were cognate to the present subject, and one of them, the fourth of that day, asked if fabrics such as pieces of garments were materialized so as to remain thereafter. Nolan justly replied :

No : such fabrics are not materialized. The spirit can clothe itself in garments that are brought from some place on earth ; they are in every sense of the word material. It is impossible for spirits to materialize any fabric or garment so that it will remain on your earth. It would be impossible for a garment materialized by the spirits to remain on the material plane.

At another séance held in the same place and reported in the same journal of October 27, '77, Nolan was asked about memory by the first question. In replying he upheld the old views about the astral light, only calling it "magnetic light". As he was speaking of memory he went into an explanation to sustain his position and said :

In ancient times men called a certain light surrounding and emanating from every person the astral light, and upon which, they taught, was impressed or imprinted every thought or act of the individual. We, the spirits, . . . call this emanation a magnetic light. . . . All the acts of life are photographed upon the astral light of each person . . . the astral light retaining all those peculiar things which occur to you from day to day during life.

This is all theosophical and true. It has a wider range than the subject of materializations, and if followed out to its right conclusions will upset many a theory held by spiritualists of their own invention or given them by some of the "lying spirits" Nolan spoke of.

All these remarks by Jim Nolan's spirit we commend to the attention of Spiritualists and Theosophists. The first have ignored them and all conclusions to be made from them for years, and impugned their wisdom by contrary action. The word of one "spirit" should be of more weight than the theorizing of a living follower of mediums. In the plane from which the manifestations come the "spirit" must have more knowledge of these phenomena than the people who live in bodies on this. And when we find—as in the case of Nolan—a great deal of Theosophical and Occult wisdom displayed through his medium, who was unconnected then with the Theosophical Society, giving explanations which accord with what many a Theosophical student knows to be true, his opinions are of greater weight than those of such spooks as deal in platitudes or continue to crystallize more deeply the preconceptions of the medium or the sitters.

Nolan's explanations completely dispose of the identity of the alleged spirits. They assume a good deal in the line of Occultism, but nothing different from the explanations of similar astral and psychic phenomena offered by Occultism and Theosophy. They overturn, it is true, many of the spiritualistic theories, and that is why they have no credence there, for if followed out they would lead to Theosophy. In many of his other replies he says that which if attended to would have long ago purged Spiritualism, excluded the bosh that comes in floods from mediums, and made the cult of value to the world. He urged purity of mediums and their non-contact with the world. He demanded a cessation of wonder-mongering, of seeking for gratification of curiosity, of selfish questioning for business or other temporary purposes; he insisted on intelligence in question and investigation; he found his requests refused, his suggestions ignored, and then—he disappeared. There are some who think, and perhaps with reason, that he was no disembodied spook, but the spirit of an intelligent living person who sought near the descending arc of the cycle of “spiritualism” to inject a new method and bring about if possible a revival of true psychic investigation and demonstration in a body of people already largely prepared. But he was denied and ignored.

From what he says we can deduce the following as testimony from the world called by spiritualists the world of spirits:

(a) That no “materialized form” is the form of the spirit claiming it.

(b) That all such forms are merely electro-magnetic shapes capable of deluding, being mere reflecting surfaces.

(c) That the necessary elements for them are sucked out from the medium and sitters, thus depleting the vital forces of all present.

(d) That in many cases the supposed face of the deceased is a simple picture drawn from the astral light and reflected on the prepared electro-chemical magnetic surface, being delusion number two.

(e) That the astral light and its properties—or some such medium—are known to this super-sensual plane from which the phenomena come.

(f) That the astral light contains, preserves, and reflects when needed the images of persons who have left the earth, hence also of those living as well as of all events.

(g) That inasmuch as no sitter knows personally the facts of the super-sensual realm and its denizens—excluding the few who have vision—all sitters are at the mercy of the spooks and the pictures, and, it being declared by a spook-land denizen that two or three forms at the most are used for a much greater number of alleged identities to masquerade in, the whole question of the identity of reporting spirits is plunged in doubt. This has always been asserted by Theosophists, and in the end of 1877 was clearly and forcibly said by H. P. Blavatsky, who, as Theosophists know, often said during her life that all phenomena were full of “psychological tricks’

(h) Referring further to (c) we find that attending séances is full of danger to the sitters from the loss of vitality due to the physical and nervous elements taken from their bodies for the purposes of phenomena, whether those be materialization or other. Certainly the materialization séance is positively shown by this "spirit" to have such dangers. And if anyone will take the trouble to read what H. P. Blavatsky said (see Incidents in her life) to her sister about what she saw with clairvoyant eye at séances he will more clearly see the danger; spooks dignified with the name of "spirit" were hovering about like octopi ready to pounce on any sensitive person for the purpose of drawing his vitality; they enveloped such, looking like vast sponges, and then disappeared into the form of the person, sure to leave him less so much energy.

Finally it results that there is a distinct issue raised by Jim Nolan which should be decided by the followers of mediums and "spirits" whether he is right or wrong; if right, as he seems to be from a philosophical view of the matter, then all theories different should be given up. At any rate the spiritualist ought to give a good reason why the views of this spook, so concordant in many things with Theosophy, have had no acceptance, and why he is a liar or a fool and all the rest wise.

THE FIVE GREAT BESTOWMENTS OF CHARITY.

ONCE upon a time, Buddha was residing in the garden Anata-pindada at Jetavana in Sravasti, with a great number of Bikshus. He thus addressed them:—There are five kinds of charity, of which now I will tell you. The first is abstaining from the taking of life. Bikshus, this is a great charity. But let us see, Bikshus, by what reason it is called a great charity. If there was no destroyer of life, all sentient beings then would be favored with the enjoyment of fearless living; and when their mind was free from all fear, such evil as enmity, hatred, and injury would cease to make its appearance. Then all peace on earth and in heaven! This is the reason why abstinence from the taking of life is a great charity. So also of the other four great bestowments of charity, which consists of abstaining from theft, adultery, falsehood, and intoxication.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

GEORGE ROBERT STOWE MEAD is the General Secretary of the European Section T.S., and works day in and day out at the Avenue Road Headquarters in London. He is an Englishman and was born in 1863. His father, Col. R. Mead, late deputy Commissioner Her Majesty's Ordnance, is a distinguished Ordnance officer. So George's childhood was spent among soldiers, sailors, cannon shot, shell, guns, and bayonets. His education was obtained mostly at King's school, Rochester. At St. John's College he won school scholarship, and proper Sizarship at Cambridge. He then "went up" destined to read for mathematics supposed to be his forte. Pastors and masters said he must be a "wrangler". But he took the bit in his mouth, threw mathematics to the dogs, and read for Classical Tripos. In that he took classical honors. So far life was aimless and creedless, but unconsciously he was looking for something in life as a reality.

Having become a full-blown A. B. the query was "what to do?" He was offered a chance in an old established practise of an uncle in the law. He refused this, and while looking about taught at a large preparatory school. In 1884 when he went down for Cambridge he read Esoteric Buddhism, and then wrote to B. Keightley, saw Mohini, and was put on the track of Hindu philosophy, where he felt as if at home. Then he read all he could find on the subject, with no taste for phenomena, but the latter were also studied as a necessity. After three years of teaching he became restless and resolved on a new path, entering as an undergraduate at Oxford to read for classical honor and take up philosophy so as to get a fellowship and then come out for Theosophy.

After reading fourteen hours a day for five months, rest became necessary, and, the risk in the scheme seeming too great, he went to France to Clermont Ferrand and entered at a small university there, following the literary and philosophical lectures for six months. While there he was able to start many on Theosophy and Spiritualism, and had an epitome of discussions printed in French. This made a small riot, pulpits preaching against Spiritualism. From there he came back to London, taught once more for a year, then left, and met H. P. Blavatsky.

Two days after H. P. B. came to London in 1887, he met her at Norwood. She as usual asked him to stop; all seemed familiar as if he had known them all his life. He spent holidays at Lansdowne Road house, working as was possible. In July, 1889, he came to work under H. P. B. for good, giving up all else. Since then there he has been, and there he also lost that great and good friend whom to know was to admire and revere. No more can be said, as life is all before him, and perhaps he is destined to work long and well for the old T.S.

Mead is strong in word and manner; his eye is bright, clear, and sincere; his voice not unusual; his devotion undoubted. About the medium height, he is built for work and to last.* All that we sorrowfully confess is that his hair is just beyond the auburn, like some sunset afterglow.

RELATIONS WITH MASTERS.

ONE of the first experiences of a new Theosophist just acquainted with the doctrine of Masters is a desire to be brought into contact with Them. As yet there can be no fitness, no claim, and the desire is born rather of curiosity or a natural ambition for a rare privilege. As acquaintance with real Theosophy expands, the desire abates, for the fact is perceived both that the privilege has not been earned and that its bestowal would be premature. Then with clearer views as to the actual functions of Masters and as to the immediate duty before the aspirant, comes full conviction that ample resources of ordinary kind exist for present light and strength, as also that relations will arise when, and only when, Masters discern both the need and the right. It may even be said that the fitter the preparation the less the desire, since increasing humility from sense of shortcoming averts the supposition that relations can be yet possible.

In a previous article there were stated the class to whom Masters vouchsafe proof of Their existence, and also Their object in so doing. The class is of those who have been zealous, faithful servants in Masters' Cause, and the object was needed help, sympathy, encouragement, or stimulus. What degree of service warrants the manifestation is of course a question for the donors alone to decide. No one else, the recipients least of all, is in position to conjecture.

Evidently relations may be, as to the workers, conscious or unconscious. The former would exist, in minor form, wherever a Master, by whatever method of communication He might be pleased to adopt, made clear the fact that He had observed the worker, had approved his devotion, and felt for him interest and care.

Such an assurance would demonstrate several things;—that earnest service was certain to attract attention; that it would, when of sufficient amount to justify notice, receive it; that the interest would never cease while the service was maintained; and that it would be sure to manifest whenever circumstances called for help, sympathy, or active sustentation. At a more advanced stage—Chelaship, the connection would be of course distinctly avowed and the Chela be admitted to closer union, but how the avowal would be made, and what terms exacted, and what rules prescribed, must be unknown to us who are without this experience.

• But unconscious relations may be just as real. They probably exist in every case where a human soul senses the value of spiritual things and feels an impulse to secure them, for the first flutter of spiritual life must be instantly discerned and welcomed by Those whose mission it is to disseminate such life throughout humanity and to foster its progress. Hence every aspiration connects with Masters and ensures responsive aid. When it so far asserts itself as to lead to active philanthropic work, particularly if in the Society which Masters have established as Their special agency for the spread of the Wisdom Religion at this era, the subject of it is brought more directly (as it is termed) within Their "ray", and thus is affected by the forceful warmth which streams along that. Ideas arise from time to time within his mind which seem quite normal to its usual workings, but which really have been sown there by a Superior; impulses start from no obvious cause, yet the actual cause is not suspected; affairs prosper, but are accounted for on ordinary grounds of energy and persistence. That a Master may be tracing out the course and facilitating its pursuance does not occur to the pilgrim. Yet all the time that influence may be at work, and, if it is unopposed by counter ones, may lead on to a stage of service and of merit where the unconscious help may be revealed to consciousness. Thus, as in evolution universally, there is the incipience of life, the gradual invigoration of that life, its emergence into active function, its efflorescence in visibility, its recognition as a fact.

But let us suppose that spiritual vitality, accompanied with that unselfish effort for others which is its evidence and test, has so far progressed that recognition of it is appropriate. Still there needs an occasion not less so. A superfluous demonstration would be counter to that wise law of economy ruling here as elsewhere in Nature. Masters, we are told, are "readjusters", not continual interferers at every point and allowing no play to spontaneous movement or to maturing character, but wise overseers who interpose only when interposition is needful to avoid costly loss, to prevent serious mistake, to correct error, to recover from depression, to confer necessary strength, to give encouragement, to assuage doubt, to suggest duty, to arouse assurance. So long as men are fallible they are liable to exhibit fallibility, but thorough devotion gives Karmic claim to help against the fallibility's becoming disastrous and impairing the devotion. At the point where weakness threatens disaster and where Karmic right entitles to assistance, is an epoch justifying a disclosure from Masters. If everything is going well and if no adequate capital of merit has been accumulated, there is no reason for manifestation: in the converse condition, the reason is ample.

How, at such a point, is the manifestation made? Assuredly no one can presume to enumerate all modes, or even apparently fix limits to the action of Masters. There must be many means of which no one short of Mastership can conjecture. Yet in published Theosophical works, and in confidential utterances to others from Theosophists thus honored, it is certain that among those modes there must be (a) a message sent through an equally zealous member with an organism psychically fitted for receiving and transmitting it; (b) a written communication from a member already in relations with Masters and receiving direction to write it; (c) a written communication through and by an actual Chela acting under orders; (d) a direct message given by a known Chela and avowedly as message from a Master; (e) a precipitated paper effectuated directly by a Master or by a High Chela thus instructed; (f) vocal utterances through the physical body of a proper subject temporarily overshadowed or even fully occupied by a Master; (g) a communication by a Master himself to the interior being of the recipient, it being seized by intuition and by use of inner faculties. There is of course still another case (h), that where a Master personally appears and speaks; but as this is known only in exceptional instances or where Chelaship actually exists, it has no place in the matter now considered.

To describe tests of genuineness in any or all the above modes must here be impracticable. Much depends upon what the recipient antecedently knows of the transcriber or writer; much upon the circumstances of the specific case; much upon the intuition of the recipient; very much upon the character of the communication. The present treatment is only of cases where genuineness is amply evidenced to the one concerned.

The immediate effect of such a message is a mixture of humbleness and encouragement: humbleness that so much imperfection still survives in one so honored, encouragement at the knowledge that a Master has deemed him worthy of His notice. The avowal of the notice is an avowal that relations exist, but as they only exist because of the worthiness thus indicated, the succeeding perception is first, that they will exist only so long as the worthiness is maintained, second, that they will be annulled whenever that worthiness sinks below the necessary level. Hence follows the conviction that the relations are henceforth on the responsibility solely of the disciple, the Master having already signified His readiness to continue them and the disciple being therefore the one to determine whether his conduct shall make possible the continuance. He has been invested with a privilege : it is for him to preserve or to forfeit it.

Succedent thereupon is a two-fold condition within. There is a new sense of the reality of Masters as a working factor in Theosophical life, and a very deep and heart-touching realization that the recipient's course has been upon the right path, imbued with the right motive, and thus far successful in its purport. His impulses have not been misguided, nor his aspirations visionary, nor his work deficient : all have been endorsed by an authority abundantly capable. Distrust would be both groundless and disrespectful ; even uncertainty may be thrown away as unjust. The other conviction is of profound resolution that the course which has received such endorsement shall be pursued, that the relations it has evoked shall be maintained. And thus the effect of a conscious tie to Masters is a union of encouragement with determination.

As conscious relation with Masters is far more than a valued honor, being really of incalculable importance in spiritual progression, the question of its extension and strengthening has enormous moment. Obviously, anything which is incongruous with it, whether of interest, memory, imagination, desire, thought, whether in habits, pursuits, speech, action, needs abandonment as setting up vibrations not concordant and therefore hostile. Men are not perfect beings : if they were, they would not be here : and Masters do not expect a perfection which is necessarily non-existent. But they do expect at least an honest effort to correct all vibrations which antagonize Their presence and Their influence, even though human weakness ensures occasional slips. And in this correction, as otherwise, Their help is pledged to each such effort. Furthermore, the strengthening of the tie is greatly aided by frequent meditation upon Them and an attempt to sense vividly Their nearness, for this actualizes Them in the mind, gives Them reality as living presences around and within, makes the tie more close and palpable. Thought, as Theosophy ever emphasizes, is a most potent agent, creating forms, vivifying them, perpetuating them. And when exercised upon existing entities such as Masters, it gives them interior reality, force, influence. Daily the hindrances to their aid abate, the relation becomes habitual, the consciousness of it normal.

How shall relations with Masters be attained? Simply through the performance of duty. There is no other recipe for any good. But duty is a highly inclusive term. It means all that is owed to oneself and one's Higher Nature, all of self-discipline and purification and advance; and it means all that is owed to others, to generous help of the race, to the work of the Theosophical Society. It covers all obligations, but its fulfilment secures all blessings.

Are relations with Masters to be avowed? Certainly never for self-satisfaction, even less for pride or glory. Such a state of mind would vitiate them at once. It cannot be said that at no time, in no circumstances, for no purpose, may this be done, for Esoteric Buddhism and not a few other Theosophical publications have had of necessity their groundwork in such relations, but for ordinary Theosophists, not called by obvious duty to proffer personal experience in support of doctrine, there is a silence which is golden. It is no hardship, since the more sacred of life's chapters are not opened on the highway; it is not useless, since it avoids cavil by the jealous and the scoffing; and it is not unwarranted, since the most richly endowed of men are the least assertive or proclamatory,—the very Masters Themselves.

THE SYMBOLISM OF THE UPANISHADS.

I.

STUDENTS of the Oriental Theosophy, which finds its highest expression in the Ten Upanishads, are met at the outset by a serious difficulty which has proved a real stumbling-block in the way of many earnest disciples, and has almost completely veiled the true meaning of these most ancient mystical books to all who have approached them in a purely literary or philological spirit.

This serious difficulty, which is caused by the symbolism of the Upanishads, requires two qualifications for its solution: first, some knowledge at first hand of the interior truths and realities represented by these symbols ; and secondly, a certain acquaintance with the symbology of the great religions of antiquity. This ancient symbology is marked by such a uniformity in countries and times as widely separated as those which gave birth to the Vedas and the Book of Job, the Mysteries of Osiris and the Apocalypse, that, in view of these resemblances, not only is one led to infer an identity of inspiration underlying all ancient symbolism, but also that an acquaintance with the method of expression of one ancient faith will often give clear insight into the darkest passages of another.

The source of this original identity of inspiration is not far to seek : for all the ancient religions treat of the same subject, the mysteries of the interior development of man, and the understanding of the universe which is reached in the course of that interior development. It is evident that a complete and exhaustive understanding of the ancient scriptures and the mysteries of inner life which are hidden beneath their symbols can be attained only by those whose inner unfoldment has gone so far as to identify them with the spirit in which these ancient scriptures were written, the universal spirit of wisdom and goodness. But though a complete understanding of the whole meaning of books like the Upanishads is thus impossible for all but the highest and holiest Sages, one cannot follow the path of interior development, of the inner light, with earnestness and integrity, without gaining some insight into the hidden meaning of the symbols ; and this, added to an acquaintance with other scriptures, may make clear much that seemed hopelessly obscure.

The best way to illustrate this is by a concrete example ; and we cannot do better than begin with the Katha Upanishad—the “Secret of Death,” as one translator calls it—which is distinguished for its purity and beauty of style and its universal application to human life, not less than for its avoidance of mere technical and scientific treatment of certain special powers and potencies of the inner life, such as one finds, for instance, in the Chhandogya and Brihadaranyaka Upanishads. The Katha Upanishad begins :

Vājashravasa, verily, seeking favor, offered in sacrifice all he possessed. He had a son, also, by name Nachiketas. Him, though still a child, faith entered, when the offerings were brought. He meditated :

— These have drunk water, eaten grass, given milk, and lost their strength. Joyless worlds he gains who offers these. He addressed his father :

— To whom, then, wilt thou give me ? said he. Twice, thrice he asked him.

— To Death I give thee, said he.

It would not be contrary to the spirit of these ancient scriptures to find a meaning in the names of Nachiketas and his father. Vâjashravasa may mean "one who sacrifices according to tradition or ritual", while Nachiketas may mean "one who has lost the desire for sensation". But without insisting upon this, we may turn to the general meaning of father and son. A son, in the symbolism of the Upanishads, means a new birth; either spiritual regeneration, or simply reïncarnation; this meaning of the new life which faith had entered, or of the soul in that new life, is represented here by Nachiketas. His father is the past birth, or the condition before the spiritual rebirth, which offers an inadequate sacrifice.

The lean cattle, who have "given milk and lost their strength", represent either worldly enjoyments or the physical powers which enjoy them; just as perfect, well-nourished cows represent the spiritual powers which succeed them. Vâjashravasa, the type of the soul in the former or unregenerate birth, offered up these lean cattle, the physical enjoyments; Nachiketas, his son, the new or regenerate birth, perceived that this offering was inadequate; the offering needed was not the sacrifice of worldly enjoyments, but the sacrifice of self.

— I go the first of many; I go in the midst of many. What is this work of Death, that he will work on me to-day?

Look, as those that have gone before, behold so are those that shall come after. As corn a mortal is ripened; as corn he is born again.

[ Nachiketas comes to the House of Death. Nachiketas speaks : ] — Like the Lord of Fire, a pure guest comes to the house. They offer him this greeting :

Bring water, O King Death!

Fair hopes and friendship, truth and holy deeds, sons and cattle, all forsake the foolish man in whose house a pure guest dwells, without food.

What is the House of Death to which Nachiketas comes? It has two meanings. The first and universal meaning is the physical world, the "world of birth and death" to which the soul comes in each new life. The second, more special, meaning is the underworld, visited by the spirit of the neophyte at initiation.

[ After three days, Death returns. Death speaks : ]

— As thou, a pure guest and honorable, hast dwelt three nights in my house without food—honor to thee, pure one, welcome to thee—against this, choose thou three wishes.

[ Nachiketas speaks : ]

— That my father may be at peace, well-minded, and with anger gone towards me, O Death; that he may speak kindly to me, when sent forth by thee; this of the three as my first wish I choose.

[ Death speaks : ]

— As before will he be kind to thee, sent forth by me ; by night will he sleep well, with anger gone, seeing thee set free from the mouth of Death.

The three nights which Nachiketas passes in the House of Death have also two meanings ; the first, the universal meaning, in which the three nights are the “ three times”, present, past, and future, the three conditions to which everything is subject in this physical world, the House of Death. The special meaning refers to the initiation in which the soul “ descended into hell, and rose again the third day”. One of the three wishes of Nachiketas refers to each of these “ three times” ; the first, “ that the father may be at peace”, refers to the past ; the meaning of “ father” being the same as before.

— In the heaven-world there is no fear ; nor art thou there, and fear comes not with old age. Crossing over hunger and thirst, and going beyond sorrow, he exults in the heaven-world.

The heavenly fire thou knowest, Death ; tell me it, for I am faithful. The heaven-worlds enjoy undyingness. This as my second wish I choose.

[ Death speaks : ]

— To thee I tell it ; listen then to me, O Nachiketas, learning that heavenly fire. Know thou also the excellent winning of endless worlds, for this is hidden in the secret place.

He told him then that fire, the source of the worlds, and the bricks of the altar, and how many and what they are. And he again spoke it back as it was told ; and Death, well pleased, again addressed him.

The next three verses, which speak of the triple fire as part of a ceremony, are evidently a later addition ; they are therefore omitted here. It is possible that they take the place of older verses which spoke too clearly of the sacred fire and were therefore omitted in the later manuscripts. But the secret of the triple fire may be revealed by the words, “ he told him that fire, the source of the worlds, and the bricks ( of the altar ), how many and what they are ” ; the triple fire being here the Higher Triad, the unmanifested three that underlie creation, preservation, and regeneration ; as also the being, consciousness, and bliss of the Self, the Âtmâ. The altar being the manifested world, which is crowned by the unmanifested three. The square altar is thus the lower quaternary, the bricks being the four or seven planes or worlds of manifestation. The triple fire and the square altar would thus be the triangle above the square in symbolism, the triangle being the same as the Egyptian pyramid, also connected with “ pur ” or fire. The “ speaking back ” is the reflection of the seven in Nachiketas, the individual soul.

—This is the heavenly fire for thee, Nachiketas, which thou hast chosen as thy second wish. They shall call this fire thine. Choose thy third wish, Nachiketas.

[Nachiketas speaks:]

—This doubt that there is of a man that has gone forth; "he exists" say some, and "he exists not" others say. A knowledge of this taught by thee; this of my wishes is the third wish.

[Death speaks:]

—Even by the gods it was doubted about this; not easily knowable and subtle is this law. Choose, Nachiketas, another wish. Hold me not to it; spare me this.

[Nachiketas speaks:]

—Even by the gods, thou sayest, it was doubted about this; nor easily knowable is it, O Death. Another teacher of it cannot be found like thee. No other wish is equal to this.

This third wish is the essence and crown of the whole Upanishad. Not the first wish "that the father may be at peace," that the past may "sleep well"; nor the second wish, the heavenly fire, are the true mystery of the Secret of Death.

The words, "the doubt that there is of a man that has gone forth," evidently bear two meanings. They refer first to the death of the body, and the doubt as to the survival of the personality. But this is not the deeper meaning. Nachiketas has confidently looked forward to the time when he shall be "released by Death" and "freed from the mouth of Death"; and has spoken of "the heaven-world which enjoys immortality"; so that he does not doubt as to the immortality of the soul, in its ordinary sense of the individual survival after death.

It is not this physical death, but the death which precedes the true spiritual rebirth and inward illumination; the death of the passions and selfishness, of personal desire, which must be passed through before the initiation by the spirit is reached; what Paul calls the "death to sin, and the new birth to righteousness"; the death which comes only once, while the physical death comes many times; the turning-point of the soul, after it has reached its extremest limit on the outward path. This is the death whose secret Nachiketas asks. The "man that has gone forth" would be, in this sense, the Jivânmukta, "for whom there is no return", who has entered Nirvâna, of whom the gods have doubted; "he exists" say some, "he exists not," others say."

Of this secret there is no teacher but Death; the death of selfishness must be passed through before an understanding can be reached of that true undyingness "which is not immortality but eternity"; and which may be reached in the midst of life, long before the time of physical death has come.

[Death speaks:]

— Choose sons and grandsons of a hundred years; and cattle and elephants and gold and horses. Choose the great treasure-house of the world, and live as many autumns as thou wilt.

If thou thinkest this an equal wish, choose wealth and length of days. Be thou mighty in the world, O Nachiketas. I make thee an enjoyer of thy desires.

Whatsoever desires are difficult in the mortal world, ask all desires according to thy will.

These beauties, with their chariots and lutes— not such as these are to be won by men— be waited on by them, my gifts. Ask me not of dying, Nachiketas.

This answers to the offer made by the Lord of the House of Death to another neophyte, who, like Nachiketas, “descended into hell, and rose again the third day”; the offer of the kingdoms of this world and the glory of them. It would seem that the knowledge and power which make the spiritual rebirth possible are great enough to render certain the winning of any lesser prize, if the ambition to be mighty on the earth remains. These alternatives are offered, therefore, by the power which, if they are refused, will become the Initiator.

— By to-morrow these fleeting things wear out the vigor of a mortal's powers. Even the whole of life is little; and chariots and dance are in thy power.

Not by wealth can a man be satisfied. Shall we choose wealth if we have seen thee? Shall we desire life while thou art master? But the wish I choose is verily that.

Coming near to the unfadingness of the immortals, a fading mortal here below, and understanding it, understanding the sweets of beauty and pleasure, who would rejoice in length of days?

This that they doubt about, O Death, what is in the great Beyond, tell me of that. This wish that draws nigh the mystery, Nachiketas chooses no other wish but that.

DISAPPEARANCE OF ASCETICS AT WILL.

WE often read of Yogees and Rishees disappearing on a sudden; a moment before, they were speaking to a king or his ministers, their mission ends and they disappear. How could they do so? Did they appear in their Mayâvi Rupa? Could they dissolve their physical bodies at will and re-form them? I was often confronted by these questions but could not answer satisfactorily; many of our Saints have thus disappeared, a few even after the Mahommedan Conquest of India. One was seen to enter a temple for the apparent purpose of worship, but was never seen to come out again; the temple had but one door and no windows; he was living near the temple long since—in his physical body; his work ended, he disappeared on a sudden.

2. Now it must be understood that in all such phenomena what is absolutely necessary is a developed and trained will and a strong power of concentration practiced for a long time. The Yogi simply hypnotizes the persons present and passes out unobserved. To a person thus trained it is only necessary to concentrate on the thought that his body is without a rupa, and as a strong-scented essence when opened in the midst of an assembly affects all present, that focalized thought sends out rays on all sides and affects or hypnotizes those standing near; and they do not see the Yogī, though he might pass by them or be close to them. That this can happen has been already proved in France and other places by hypnotic experiments.

3. But no such successful concentration is possible without preliminary training, without long practice. In those days they never tried to know something of every thing, but each tried to excel in that which appeared best suited to his nature.

4. The Yogees in those days mixed more freely with men, and perhaps the conditions were more favorable then. It was only after the battle of Kuru Kshetra and the death of Sree Krishna that they retired to thenceforth live in a secluded sacred spot where the influence of the Black Age would not be felt.

5. And now Antardhanam, as such disappearance is called, is no longer regarded by our Indians, educated in the science of the West, as belonging to the realm of truth and reality, until western hypnotism, a monster infant of occult laws, shows them that Antardhanam is not an impossibility after all.

6. But that power of Concentration, that preliminary training are no longer to be found in us. We aim at knowing all about everything, can talk on a variety of subjects which must have bewildered many a sage, had they been living still, and we are always active and talking, and imagine that we are progressing.

7. Thus in the Yoga Sutra of Patanjali we find in the twenty-first Sutra of Bibhuti Padu that on concentrating on the rupa of our body, its visibility being suspended, there is no more union with the power of seeing, and Antardhanam is accomplished. Now it must be understood that in order that we might see an object three things are necessary, viz.: 1. The visibility of the object; 2. Our power to see; and 3. The union of the two. If, for instance, there be no transparent media between our eyes and the object to be seen, the first condition is wanting and we do not see it; if, again, the object is visible but our eyesight is not strong enough, we do not see it because condition No. 2 is not fulfilled. It sometimes happens that being deeply absorbed in thinking we sometimes do not see an object though perfectly visible to us and our eyes directed towards it; in this case there is no union between the two. To make an object invisible, therefore, we should cut off this union; in order to do this, the minds of others must be affected, and this is done by a trained and concentrated will.

KALI PRASANNA MUKHERJI.

Barakar, India, September 10, 1893.

ED. NOTE.—The aphorism of Patanjali on the subject of this article is No. 21, Book II, and in the American edition reads as follows:

By performing concentration in regard to the properties and essential nature of form, especially of the human body, the ascetic acquires the power of causing the disappearance of his corporeal frame from the sight of others, because thereby its property of being apprehended by the eye is checked, and that property of sattva which exhibits itself as luminousness is disconnected from the spectator's organ of sight.

In the old edition and in that published later by M.N.Dvivedi, the word used for concentration is sanyama. This is to be translated as concentration, and also "restraint", which comes to the same thing. The aphorism raises the issues made by modern science that no disappearance is possible if the object be in line with a normal eye and there be light and the like. Hypnotism has for some made the modern view a little doubtful, but many deny hypnotism, and the cases of disappearance in those experiments have all been but disappearances for the senses of but one person who is admittedly under some influence and is not normal in organ and function. The author cites alleged cases of complete disappearance of ascetics from the sight of normal persons normally exercising their senses. It is not a case of hypnotism collectively or otherwise, but should be distinguished from all such. In hypnotic cases normal function is abated and the mind imposed with an inhibiting idea or picture which seems real in action to the subject. In the cases of the ascetics there is left to those about perfect control of their organs and senses, the powerful mental action of the ascetic bringing into play another law, as indicated in the aphorism, which prevents the senses, however normal, from seeing the form of the ascetic. Form, it is held by the occultists of the school to which Patanjali must have belonged, is an illusion itself, which remains for the generality of people because they are subject to a grand common limitation due to the non-development of other than the usual senses. It would seem that all clairvoyance might prove this, as in that it is known by the seer that every form visible to our eye has extensions and variations in the subtler parts of its constitution which are not visible on the material plane. The illusionary nature of form in its essence being meditated on, one becomes able, it is held, to check the "luminousness of sattva" and thus prevent sight. This does not mean that ordinary light is obstructed, but something different. All light, gross or fine, is due to the universal sattva, which is one of the qualities of the basis of manifested nature. And besides showing as ordinary light, it is also present, unseen by us it is true, but absolutely necessary for any sense-per ception of that sort, whether by men, animals, or insects. If the finer plane of this luminousness is obstructed, the ordinary light is none the less, but the result will be that no eye can see the body of that person whose mind is operative at the time to cause the obstruction of the luminous quality mentioned. This may seem labored, but it is in consequence of our language and ideas that such is the case. I have known some cases in the West of disappearances similar to those mentioned by the foregoing article, and in Secret Doctrine and, I think, Isis Unveiled are some references to the matter where the author says the power conferred by this is wonderful as well as full of responsibility. While very likely no Theosophist or scientist will be able to use this power, still the cases cited and the explanation will go towards showing that the ancient Rishies knew more of man and his nature than moderns are prone to allow, and it may also serve to draw the attention of the mind of young Indians who worship the shrine of modern science to the works and thoughts of their ancestors.

BUDDHA AND A DEVA.*

THUS I have heard. On a certain day the Blessed one (Buddha) dwelt at Srasvati, at the Jeta grove, in the garden of Anapindaka. When the night was far advanced, a radiant celestial one (Deva), whose countenance was exceedingly sublime and whose refulgent splendor illuminated the whole of the grove, approached the Bhagavat (Buddha) and worshipped him, standing aside. He then addressed the Bhagavat in verse—What is the sharpest sword? What the deadliest poison? What the fiercest fire? What the grossest darkness?

Bhagavat replied in verse—A harsh word is the sharpest word; covetousness, the deadliest poison; anger, the fiercest fire; ignorance, the grossest darkness.

The Deva asked: Who does gain the greatest benefit? Who does lose the most? What is the most invulnerable armor? What the best weapon?

Bhagavat replied: He is the greatest gainer who gives to other, and he loses the most who receives from other. Patience is the most invulnerable armor; wisdom the best weapon.

Deva: Who is a thief? What is the most precious treasure for the wise? Who is a robber (not only on the earth, but also in the heaven)?

Bhagavat: Evil thought is a stealer; virtue, the most precious treasure for the wise. Immorality is a robber, not only on the earth but also in the heaven.

* A Sutra, translated from the Chinese by M. Matzuyama. From Tracts of Buddhist Prop. Soc. of Kyoto, Japan.

Deva: Who enjoys the greatest happiness? Who is the richest? Who is the noblest? Who the most ignoble?

Bhagavat: He whose desires are moderate is most happy; he is richest who is contented; the virtuous is noblest; the vicious is basest.

Deva: What is that which is attractive? What is that which is disgusting? What is the most horrible pain? What is the greatest enjoyment?

Bhagavat: Good is attractive; evil, disgusting. Of all the pains, the hell is the most tormenting; the deliverance from re-birth is the height of bliss.

Deva: What wish is right and proper? What wish is wrong and improper? What is the most violent fever? Who the best physician?

Bhagavat: Emancipation from transmigratory existence is right and proper to wish for; but not all the evil desires. Concupiscence is the most violent fever; Buddha, the best physician.

Deva: What power is able to ruin all the world? By what influence is all the world confused? What makes us forsake our friends? What does prevent our being born in the heaven?

Bhagavat: It is by ignorance that all the world is ruined, and by sceptics that it is confused. A cruel, covetous heart causes us to forsake our friends. Our attachment to agreeable objects renders it impossible for us to be born in the heaven.

Deva: What is it that neither fire can burn, nor water corrode, nor wind crush down, but that is able to make good the whole world? What was secure from the attack of a malefactor who would come to take it away?

Bhagavat: Blessing!

Deva then asked and said: Now I have only one doubt left to be resolved; pray clear it away for me:—Who has been, is, and will be the greatest self-deceiver?

— Bhagavat answered and said: Whoever possesses great riches, and yet fails to use them for promoting his blessings, has been, is, and will be the greatest self-deceiver.

The Deva, having heard the words of the Bhagavat, was full of exceeding joy, and worshipped him, throwing himself down at his feet. And he disappeared suddenly from the presence of the Bhagavat.

“There are three branches of the law. Sacrifice, study, and charity are the first”.—Chandogya Upanishad.

THEOSOPHICAL CORRESPONDENCE CLASS.

SOME WORK OF THE CLASS.

THIS Class was started in the American Section for the purpose of helping the members in the course of study and in all matters pertaining to the Society. Very soon after the first notice was given members began to come in, and at this date, December, one hundred and forty-six persons have joined, coming from all parts of the Section. No authority is claimed, and members are helped by comments made on answers and by references to books and articles. At the same time it is likely that a large index or reference book may result from the work, referring to all sorts of articles and subjects in the whole field of T. S. literature. This in itself will be a valuable thing to have, and if means and energy warrant it might finally be gotten out in book form.

In the first list of questions the following among others was put:

What is the basis, genius, and spirit of the T. S. constitution?

Its object was to direct the mind to the organization itself, and to give an opportunity to personally with each one point out certain matters which ought to be better understood than they are, as the replies demonstrate. Some sample replies are here given without names.

39. I have been a member of the T. S. for eight years, and have never seen its constitution nor ever heard of any.

42. The basis of Theosophy is the revelations by letters and speech from Mahâtmas; its genius and spirit, the teachings of eternal truths of nature and universe.

62. Its basis is the establishment of a Universal Brotherhood. Its genius is to awaken the sleeping soul of man to a knowledge of its true powers, its true work, its true destiny. To arouse and stimulate to action the untried, undeveloped forces of the soul. To lift man out of the illusions of matter that he may make a more steady and rapid progress toward his spiritual development and perfection. To teach him to estimate correctly between material and spiritual progress, just how much one is worth in comparison with the other and just what ends are to be obtained with one or the other.

Its spirit is to eliminate selfishness, to inspire in the individual a beneficent, universal love of humanity in preference to a selfish, personal love. To persist in an increasing endeavor to purify the soul, lift the aspirations, ennoble the thoughts, not so much for the sanctification of self, as for the sake of purity and righteousness as principles of the Divine Will and for the maintenance of the Divine Harmony. And also for the psychical influences unconsciously engendered by holy thought and holy living. To eradicate error, false conceptions, mistaken interpretations. To annihilate prejudice and all systems of hasty, unjust conclusions. To follow out the golden rule "Do unto others as you would be done by." To incite to an exact uprightness in all things. To cultivate tolerance, patience, gentleness, sweetness, humility, and devotion in the cause of others.

41. The basis, genius, and spirit of the Theosophical Society is unselfishness, or the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man.

69. The basis of the T.S. is a belief in the unity of all life, spiritual and physical; its genius that this unity of all life brings us into such relations directly or indirectly with other races, nations, and brother men as to cause any injury done by one to another to mutually affect other races, nations, and men upon the earth. Its spirit is that of compassionate sympathy for, and mutual helpfulness to, all beings.

90. The basis, genius, and spirit of the T.S. Constitution are expressed in the first object and in its motto, "There is no Religion higher than Truth". It would unite men of all creeds and races in a bond of brotherhood and mutual toleration upon the common ground of Truth, which is the nucleus about which all creeds and dogmas have crystallized.

58. Sincere and earnest belief in the Masters of Wisdom seems to me to be the basis of the Theosophic Constitution.

9. The basis of the T.S. is the Brotherhood of Man; its spirit is entirely unsectarian and has no creed or dogma to promulgate; respectful tolerance is shown to all religions, creeds, and races of men; the genius of the T.S. is the desire to uplift humanity to a higher level.

33. Oneness, development, charity.

The above are fairly representative of all, and of the general spirit of this Section. They show that all have missed the gist of the question, which was directed to the organic law under which we work, but at the same time demonstrate that the true idea of the movement as a human development is pretty well understood. If the question had been as to the movement apart from the Constitution of the Society, all the replies would have been very good. Number thirty nine apparently saw the precise point from the reply that he or she had not even heard there was a Constitution. But that also illustrates another thing, that it is possible to proceed vigorously with such a work as ours even if the members do not think there is any organic law. Of course it would not do for officials to be ignorant of the Constitution, but it appears that if men are working as so many in the T.S. do work the law need not be known, inasmuch as they become in themselves the right law. However, the way to have replied properly to the question as put is something like the following:

"The Basis: (a) Equality of members irrespective of caste, sex, color, race, or creed; (b) Autonomy or self government of all Branches and Sections; (c) Federation, in which, though each Branch and Section governs itself, all must act in conformity to the general Constitution; thus the Branches of a Section are under the jurisdiction of the federated Section and governed by its general law, which in turn must conform to the law of the whole T.S.

In addition to the foregoing, the basis, genius, and spirit of the organic law or Constitution are autonomy, equality, non-sectarianism, non-dogmatism, absence of creed, and tolerance of opinion. The objects of the Society are the aim to which the Constitution is directed.

The Theosophical movement as distinguished from its Constitution is based on fraternity and unity, its genius is the pursuit of truth and tolerance, its spirit is unselfishness leading it to spread the truth with tolerance and to work for the uplifting of the race.

From all the above a branch might exist as one of the T.S. and be composed wholly of members who had a specific belief, provided they did not force it on others nor claim for the belief the endorsement of the organized Society".

LITERARY NOTES.

NOVEMBER LUCIFER gives Dr. Buck's paper, "Theosophy historically considered as underlying all Religions and Sacred Scriptures," read before the Parliament of Religions. "The Battle of Salamis" is a vivid description by one who was killed during the course of it. "Ibsen's works in the light of Theosophy" is begun, as also a fine article on "Ancient Egypt". Mr. Mead's "Intuition" opens auspiciously, but lapses into mere quotation from the Bhagavad Gita, so that, although closing well and quoting a beautiful Persian legend, it is far less instructive than it might have been. "Theosophy and Theosophists" is true enough, but not as able as Mr. Kingsland's productions usually.—[A. F.]

NOVEMBER THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XX" deals with the teaching given to and the Occult experience of Stainton Moses, with some curious facts as to the persistence of the "Lodge scent", especially as to H.P.B.'s hair. "The Esoteric Significance of the Ten Avatars" begins very well and might be of exceeding interest, but is not. The second Avatar of Vishnu, the Kurma (tortoise) is described without any reference to a tortoise at all. "Phenomena of Slade while sleeping" narrates most singular incidents occurring when that famous medium was unquestionably asleep. "The Doctrine of Maya and the Hindu Scriptures" is a very able article, in the style and worthy of Mansel, and is specially interesting because denying that the doctrine is ever explicitly put forth in Hindu sacred books. The summation on pages 99 and 100 of the actual doctrine taught is singularly fine, admirable for condensation, clearness, and rationality, and is most gratifying to Westerns who, no less than the learned writer, believe in a "Universal Spirit, intelligent and eternal, omnipresent and omnipotent", who "wills" the "process of evolution called laws of Nature". The treatment of "liberation" and illusion is equally satisfactory. "American Indian Jugglers" narrates astonishing feats, probably a revelation to most persons in the U.S. The editorial comment on the second paper following is very nice, though it misses the point of the paper itself, and also fails to perceive that the objection had been therein anticipated and met. Sepharial gives the "Horoscope of H.S.Olcott, P.T.S.", and the subject of it makes the needful corrections. Like other astrological readings, it is a mixture of singular accuracy with as singular error. The Theosophist is quite right in thinking the Forum too expository of the views of two persons (however differing!), and if it has any recipe for cajoling or extorting contributions from F.T.S. in general, that recipe would be as welcome to the two as to their readers. "Cuttings and Comments" is a delightful addition to the Theosophist.—[A.F.]

THE NORTHERN THEOSOPHIST is a new periodical without locality stated, but the last line of the last page (8th) says that communications may be sent to Middlesbrough, apparently in England. The editorial is remarkably sensible and good, and there are other worthy contents. Price is only a penny. Bertram Keightley is announced to lecture through the Northern Counties early in January, which means a great boon to that region.—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI, No. 12, gives two papers, "The Legend of the Grail" and "Karma", both by Mr. R. Machell and both charming in matter, spirit, and diction. The former states the original of the various legends and explains their symbolism Theosophically, all in a sweet and gracious style which makes them the more attractive. It reminds of Miss Hillard. "Karma" is not less delightful, and most clearly explains the bearing of the great Law on questions of Justice and Prayer, showing with peculiar lucidity the error of supposing that help to sufferers is a necessary interference with Karma. But should not the word "not" on line 8 of page 13 be expunged? There is a mixed metaphor on the last page, and the curious (however common) mistake is made of using "fruition" as if it meant "fructification" instead of "enjoyment", but such delightful papers can well excite the envy of even the sternest verbal critic.—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHY; ITS AIMS AND TEACHINGS, by J.H. Fletcher and S.G.P. Coryn, is a pamphlet of 15 pages treating excellently well the main truths of Theosophy in form for popular comprehension. Under distinct heads these are clearly and tersely expounded, the whole constituting a good work for distribution, though a little peremptory in tone. There is one assertion requiring emphatic rebuke,—"Theosophists are Pantheists". No one has the right to make such an assertion of a whole body when, as is well known, it is true of only a part, and the assertion is thus not only false but audacious. It would be instantly repudiated by many of the more devout Theosophists, and, by some of the more logical, repudiated with indignation. F.T.S. who undertake to appropriate to their own little schools the whole term "Theosophy" incur something much more serious than exposure by a reviewer,—the danger of repelling and revolting from the Wisdom Religion thoughtful inquirers who as yet do not know that a pamphleteer is not the T. S.—[A.F.]

SECRET DOCTRINE. Volume one of the new edition of Secret Doctrine is now ready, and a copy has been sent, charges paid, to all subscribers who have complied with the conditions under which the reduced rate, $10.50 per set, was offered. Volume two, it is now thought, can be sent out in January: as to the Index, we have not information sufficient to assign a date on which it will certainly be ready.

KEY TO THEOSOPHY, IN SPANISH. Brother José Xifre of Madrid, Spain, has translated and published in Spanish H.P.B.'s book under the title of La Clave de la Teosofía. It is from the establishment of Julian Palacies, Calle del Arenal, num 27, Madrid, Spain, from where it may be had. It has a portrait of H.P.B. There is a prologue by the translator in which is a short statement of the Theosophical movement. He says that all the miseries of the race flow from selfishness and ignorance, and that our object is to do away with these by enforcing Universal Brotherhood and giving the truth as to man's nature. There are also a good glossary and appendixes. The latter give the facts about the Society so as to inform inquirers. Spanish address is "Revista Teosofica", Cervantes 6, pral. Madrid. We hope it will have a wide circulation among Spanish readers.

Mirror of the Movement.

AMERICA.

MR. BURCHAM HARDING arrived at Syracuse, N. Y., on 21st November, and was entertained by Mr. Underhill and Mrs. Clarke. Besides the usual Branch meetings, parlor talks were given at the houses of Dr. Walsh, Mrs. Myers, Mrs. Goodrich, Mrs. Kenyon, and others. Sunday, 26th November, lectured at Butler's Hall, which was crowded. Sunday, Dec. 3, occupied the pulpit at the May Memorial Church by invitation of the pastor, Dr. Calthorpe, and spoke on Theosophy to a large and appreciative audience.

This branch was organized last October by the united efforts of Dr. Dower and Mr. Gerhardt, and has already enrolled between 40 and 50 members. The meetings are well attended and great interest is aroused among many leading inhabitants. A strong spirit of harmony and desire for greater knowledge of Theosophy is exhibited.

December 11, passed the day at Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y., among the members of a class recently formed for the study of Theosophy. Reached Jamestown, N. Y., December 12. This branch has awakened to new life, a headquarters has been taken on a leading street, where one of the members will reside. The hall will seat about 100. A syllabus of discussions will be used at the usual weekly meetings, public lectures will be given on Sunday evenings, besides classes for study. For the convenience of the numerous Swedish inhabitants, it is proposed to hold classes in that language.

On Sunday, 17th, occupied the pulpit of the Congregational Church at the usual morning service. There was a good attendance. In the evening lectured at Skandia Hall on "Theosophy in the Bible." Parlor talks have been given each evening at the members' houses, and the outlook is very encouraging.

ARYAN T. S. had Sunday evening lectures in December: 3d, Man, Visible and Invisible, Wm. Q. Judge; 10th, The Moneyed Poor, H. Alfred Freeman; 17th, Witchcraft, Leon Landsberg; 24th, Theosophy as a Religion, Alexander Fullerton; 31st, Magic, Henry T. Patterson.

NEW ENGLAND THEOSOPHICAL CORPORATION. This is a corporation which has been formed in Boston by members of the T.S. there and in its vicinity for the purpose of acquiring a headquarters and forwarding the general practical good of the movement. They have a house at 24 Mt Vernon St., near the State House and the famous Common. The President is Geo. D. Ayers, Vice Pres., Robt. Crosbie, Sec., Miss M. Guild, Treas., Fred. L. Milliken. The Directors are taken from the membership of the Branches. By means of this corporation all the New England Branches can, if they wish, unite in all practical work, and there is a large field for it in the New England States. Members of the Society will live in the house, and from rents thus obtained, as well as from other theosophical practical matters, the income to run it is expected to come.

THE TOLEDO BRANCH has been favored by a visit from Mr. Claude F. Wright, and from Friday Nov. 24th until the following Tuesday afternoon he was indefatigable in holding meetings and talking with members. He has left not only a lasting impression upon the hearts of Toledo F.T.S., but a reminder of his visit in the form of numerous Theosophical symbols, with which he decorated the walls of Lotos Hall. Since its organization, not one year ago, the Branch has added six names to its roll, now numbering thirty-one. In spite of the loss of the President by death and the removal of the Vice-President from the city, the work continues with unabated interest, each member seeming to feel an added responsibility. The word "Service" has been adopted as the watchword of the Branch, and will soon be placed by the fine portrait of Madame Blavatsky which adorns Lotus Hall.

BROOKLYN T. S. had Sunday evening lectures in December: 3d, Man's Place in Nature, Jos. H. Fussell; 10th, Evolution Through Re-birth, Wm. Main; 17th, The Heaven of Theosophy, Alexander Fullerton; 24th, Talmudism and Theosophy, Leon Landsberg; 31st, Memory, Harrie S. Budd.

"H. P. B." T.S. had Sunday evening lectures in December: 3d, Magic, H. T. Patterson; 10th, Vibrations, Jas. H. Connelly; 17th, Visible and Invisible Man, Wm. Q. Judge; 24th, Man's Place in Nature, J. H. Fussell; 31st, The Moneyed Poor, H. Alfred Freeman.

CHICAGO'S LECTURE BUREAU has been strengthened by the addition of another member, Miss Eva F. Gates, who is the sixth speaker enlisted for regular duty. During December the following lectures have been given: "Theosophy in Practice," Miss Pauline Kelly; "Law of Re-birth," Mr. R. D. A. Wade; "Life Is What We Make It," Miss Eva F. Gates; "Theosophic Ideals," Mr. George E. Wright; "Life, Here and Beyond," Miss Leoline Leonard; "Christmas Thoughts," Mrs. M. M. Thirds. During his recent visit Brother Claude F. Wright adorned the walls at headquarters with several Theosophical symbols, among the paintings being the Society's seal and the winged globe. Additional furnishing for our rooms includes a new outfit for the platform and a piano.—(Communicated.)

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

WILLAMETTE T. S., Portland, Oregon, had Sunday evening lectures in December: 3d, Clairvoyance and Dream States, A. Schutz; 10th, English Mystics, Mrs. M. E. Martin; 17th, Reincarnation, Mrs. M. J. Robinson; 24th, Socrates and the Grecian Philosophers; 31st, Life and Work of Madame Blavatsky, Mrs. A. R. Read.

THE LAST DAYS OF NOVEMBER were spent by the Pacific Coast Lecturer in Stockton, California. T. S., informal public and other meetings were held. A lecture on "Satan—Good and Evil" was given December 3d to an interested audience. Stockton Branch has a library and headquarters. Heretofore branch and public meetings have been held as one. But the Branch decided to separate this into two. Branch meetings will hereafter be held during the week, at which more systematic study will be had. The regular Sunday evening public meeting will be continued, but with the added factor of doing that kind of work which appeals particularly to beginners and the general public. The intention is in future to engage more actively in both branch and public work. Help will be received from the Pacific Coast Committee Lecture Bureau, and indications are hopeful.

MACON T.S., Macon, Georgia, has elected as President Mr. Iverson L. Harris, and as Secretary Mr. Walter T. Hanson, Bibb Manufacturing Company.

EUROPE.

A SCANDINAVIAN SUB-SECTION has been organized under the Presidentship of Dr. G. Zander. Some 250 members of T.S. residing in Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and Finland are on its roll. Ten charters have been recently issued to new Lodges in these countries, and the activity seems to be steadily increasing. In one small town Mr. Algren drew an audience of over 500 people.

THE NORTH OF ENGLAND FEDERATION of the T.S. has been formed by some of the northern Lodges to organize the spreading of Theosophy in that part of the country, and to review and compare the work done there. A quarterly meeting of the Federation was held on November 4th in Bradford; delegates attended from the Bradford, Athene, Harrogate, Leeds, Liverpool, Manchester City, Middlesbro', and other Lodges. Mrs. Isabel Cooper-Oakley was present from Headquarters. A special supplement was issued with the December Vahan giving a report of this meeting. The principal subjects discussed were: philanthropic work in the neighborhood of Lodges; presswork and correspondence; the education of Theosophists, young and old; the correspondence scheme started by the General Secretary, American Section; Finance. This second meeting of the Federation was characterized throughout by much good feeling and enthusiasm.

BLAVATSKY LODGE, LONDON, has been very active of late in spite of the absence of its President, Mrs. Besant. The Ocean of Theosophy is still discussed at the Saturday meetings. Of the Thursday evening open lectures, one given by Dr. A. Keightley on The Action of the Lives was thought to be of special interest as showing how much could be adduced from microscopic research in support of various Theosophic tenets. Mrs. Keightley's paper entitled What Proof have We?, Dr. Wynn Westcott's on The Rosicrucians, their Religion, Ethics, and Policy, Mr. Mead's on Gnostic Christianity, and Mrs. Cooper-Oakley's on The Voice of the Silence were perhaps the most appreciated of any others lately given in this Lodge. A "Question Box" has been put up in the Hall, and members are invited to insert written questions for reply at the meeting following the one at which they are read out.

A LOTUS CIRCLE has been started at Headquarters on lines similar to those followed in America. This has been done owing to the exertions of Miss A. M. Stabler of the H. P. B. Branch in Harlem. Already considerable success has attended the innovation. Workers here are consequently once more indebted to American enterprise.

THE DUTCH LODGE, next to the Swedish, shows the greatest signs of health and steady progress amongst the foreign Branches. The Amsterdam Headquarters has been recently enlarged, and now has a room which will easily seat a hundred persons or more. Propaganda is not confined to existing centres only, but the war is vigorously carried into the enemy's camp—Antwerp, Haarlem, Rotterdam, and other at present untheosophical towns being visited in turn. University students in Holland seem to listen with more readiness than elsewhere. In England a halo of conservatism surrounds them which is hard to break through.

INDIA.

THE WORK of two young men, members of the T.S. at Bellary, deserves notice. They are R. Jagannathiah and T. Swaminatha, who have been publishing the Bodhini but have turned their attention now chiefly to a vernacular publication fund and work for the T.S. in the vernaculars of the district. This has been very uphill work, and they deserve praise for continuing, and also further help from those who can give it. In 1887 they started the Sanmarga Samaj, its declared objects being, in fact, a rendering of those of the T.S. so as to bring them home to those who read only in Tamil and Telugu. That effort brought them in touch with the masses, and now they have gone further. A free Sanscrit school was started and a pandit secured for it, and now some twenty students are on the roll. The school was recently raised to high school standard, and the government has recognized it as "Advanced". An improvement is proposed by them in the way of adding a place for boarding poor students who are now willing but unable to attend. To cover this they have begged rice and grains from people and have also obtained promises from a village to keep it up. They find the villagers true to their promises, but many difficulties impede the way. They need tracts and leaflets in the language, and this calls for printing, which now has to be done far away and is costly. They expect to have five new students from the proceeds of the rice donations. These are all to be educated Theosophically so as to be able to preach and explain symbols, ceremonies, and the like, and thus by giving rational explanations to wean people from dogmatic and theological views. The plan also includes a Theosophical Journal for the villagers who would collect at night to hear it read and expounded to them by the preachers of the Samaj. This is unusual in the West, but is a custom in India. It is also proposed to issue translations in Tamil and Telugu of T.S. books and thus bring those to the people. All this sort of work is just what is needed. It is hoped by them and others that it may lead in time to an actual vernacular section at work for and under the T.S. Any one who feels moved to help this work should send a remittance to Secretary of Sanmarga Samaj, Bellary, India. The literature and lectures of T.S. in English reach only those who know that tongue, but this work if fully carried out will reach down through the whole mass of India's peoples and bring the light of Theosophy there where it is as much needed as anywhere, and indeed for India it is more needed there than in any other stratum of society. The work ought not to be opposed because it was not started by the T.S., as it was and is done by members who are devoted and who desire to reach the people gradually in the only way possible for them.

MRS. BESANT IN INDIA.

The very gratifying news has reached here that Mrs. Besant is now actually on Indian soil. She sailed from Marseilles in company with the Countess Wachtmeister, and arrived at Port Said after but little really bad weather. At Aden, beyond the Red Sea, a message of greeting was received from Col. Olcott, and then the steamer proceeded to Colombo, where the Col. had gone to receive the illustrious visitor. During the voyage Mrs. Besant gave several Theosophical lectures by request, taking opportunity to give the Anglo-Indian officials on board a taste of the venerable literature of the land they are ruling without understanding. At Colombo Mrs. Besant was waited upon by Col. Olcott, Mr. d'Abrew, Mrs. Higgins, and others, and a most enthusiastic reception vouchsafed. Particulars of her Indian tour may be expected in later PATHS.—[A.F.]

CEYLON.

THE SANGAMITTA GIRL'S SCHOOL at Colombo, Ceylon, has been inspected by the Government official, who pronounced it the best on the whole Island. This abundantly vindicates the choice of Mrs. Higgins as Principal. The School is in great need of financial aid, but also of a lady-teacher to assist Mrs. Higgins, the pupils now numbering one hundred and seven, of whom twenty four are boarders. It is thought that within five years there may be from two hundred to three hundred schools in Ceylon under influences more or less Theosophic, the popular movement having rapidly extended. If there was money to make these schools absolutely free, the work of educating the future mothers in Ceylon, already so practical and useful, would be of unspeakable value. The General Secretary will always most gladly forward any contributions for the Sangamitta School.

UPANISHADS ON RE-BIRTH.

THE above quotation from Prashna Upanishad gives the old doctrine, the same as in Buddhism, that re-birth is due to mind and to the tendencies therein. "Whose fire has burned out" means the fire of life expiring. "According to his thoughts" does not refer to what one wishes to have for rebirth, but to the seeds of thought left in the mind from the thinking of each hour of life; these in a mass make a tendency or many tendencies which on coming out either keep the soul to that family in all modes of thought and act or tend to segregate the soul from the circle into which it was born. "This life leads to a world of recompense", because by the fire of life it is linked to the Self, which being thus bound goes after death to the state where recompense is its portion. The alternation to and fro from one state to another for purposes of compensation is not the attainment of knowledge but the subjection to results eternally, unless the soul strives to find the truth and becomes free, and ceases to set up causes for future births.

A Jewish tradition says that Adam had to reincarnate as David and later as the Messiah; hence "to dust thou shalt return".

THE SYMBOLISM OF THE UPANISHADS.

II.

THE first part of the Katha Upanishad, if we have interpreted its symbols aright, taught the descent of Nachiketās—the soul—into this outer world, graphically described as the House of Death; its lingering there for three nights, which are the three times, past, present, and future, that condition everything in the House of Death; there confronted by Death, the prince of this world; the soul is offered three wishes, one for the past, one for the present, one for the future. The first is the quiescence of the past and the tranquil return of the soul to the source whence it fell into the “mouth of death”, the second, the secret of the three fires on the four-fold altar, or the three divine energies which underlie the four-fold world of manifestation, the world of the present; the third is the secret of the Great Beyond, that real world to which the soul’s true life belongs, and whence it has strayed into this House of Death.

The first two wishes have been already satisfied; the third is treated of in the second and third parts of the Upanishad, which we shall translate and comment on as before. In the second part, the speaker is Death the Great Initiator; not the body’s death, but the death of the lower self, which alone can open the doors of the Great Beyond. What lies behind that door is told as far as words can tell it; it is the eternal mystery, which remains hidden in secret, and everlastingly unrevealable for all who have not passed the initiation—or “new beginning”—of the death of the lower self.

—The better is one thing; the dearer is another thing; these two draw a man in opposite ways. Of these two it is well for him who chooses the better; he fails of his object who chooses the dearer.

The better and the dearer approach a man; looking closely at them, the Sage discerns between them. The Sage chooses the better rather than the dearer; the fool chooses the dearer, through lust of possession.

The better is what belongs to the real world, the Great Beyond. The dearer is what belongs to this unreal world, the House of Death, in whose gift are “wealth and length of days, the great treasure-house of the world, and the beauties with their chariots and lutes”; representative of the ideals of the lower self. The better and the dearer are the blessedness and the happiness, in Carlyle’s inimitable chapters of Sartor Resartus which speak of the Everlasting No, the Center of Indifference, and the Everlasting Yea; where with matchless vividness and power are depicted the death of the lower self and the new birth of the soul. These two, the better and the dearer, draw every man in opposite ways; every man, that is, has the longing for Death's fair gifts; and also the incipient sense of the Great Beyond, called, in its negative aspect, Conscience, but which becomes positive, as intuition and growing omniscience, when Death's Initiation has been passed through.

[Death continues:]

—Thou, indeed, understanding dear and dearly loved desires, Nachiketas, hast passed by them. Not this way of wealth hast thou chosen, in which many men sink.

Wide apart are these two minds, unwisdom, and that of which the knower says "it is wisdom". I esteem Nachiketas to be one seeking wisdom, nor do manifold desires allure thee.

Others, turning about in unwisdom—self-wise, thinking they are learned—and fools, stagger, lagging in the way, like the blind led by the blind.

The Great Beyond gleams not for the fool, led away by the delusion of possessions. "This is the world, there is no other", he thinks; and so falls again and again under my dominion.

The understanding of desire is the deep and irrevocable conviction, based upon the experience of innumerable lives, innumerable incarnations, that desire can never be satisfied; that the gratification desired is never actually touched, but remains each time just one step out of reach. Like fruit under a glass case, the object of desire is never seized, but every effort towards perfect gratification is stopped by an irresistible barrier. The essential nature of desire is that it actually is never gratified, but every effort at gratification leads to another and this again to another. Every attempt at gratification is at once a disappointment and the father of a new desire. To this understanding of desire, which is the last ripeness of the lower self before it falls off the tree of life, must be added another qualification, the firm steady will, which, after the conviction of the futility of desire has been fully reached, gives effect to that conviction by checking the little children of desire, as they are born in the mind and run down through emotion into action. These three worlds, the world of mind, of emotion, and of action, are the "three worlds" which are to be conquered by the neophyte, and the first, that of the mind, must be conquered first. When this is done, the outward actions of desire, robbed of their motive power, will cease of themselves; their continuation would show, not that the soul had risen above the body, of whose mere outward acts it was independent, but that the first of the three worlds, the mind where the children of desire are born, was still unconquered and unclean. The delusion that a pure soul may accompany impure action is a part of that un wisdom which brings men "again and again under the dominion of death". Then Death speaks of the Great Beyond :

—That is not to be gained even for a hearing by many ; and, hearing it, many understand it not. Wonderful is the speaker of it, blessed is the receiver ; wonderful is the knower of it, blessed is the learner.

Not by a baser man is this declared ; but it is to be known by much meditation. There is no way to it unless told by another, nor can it be debated by formal logic.

The comprehending of this cannot be gained by debate ; but when declared by another it is dearest to a good understanding. Thou hast obtained it, for thou art steadfast in the truth, and a questioner like thee, Nachiketas, is dear to us.

That which many do not even gain for a hearing is the Voice of the Silence, the first glimmer of the inner light which shines in the soul and illumines the Great Beyond. Many who hear it understand not ; they follow the "promptings of conscience" blindly and haltingly, knowing not that this is the first gleam of the light that lightens the world. "The speaker of it" is the Higher Self, which brings the light to the soul ; the hearer of it is the soul which receives that light. The Higher Self is the "other that tells it" ; without being told by that other, it cannot be known ; but whenever the hearer is ready, the teacher is ready also ; when the soul is purified and reaches out toward the light, the light will certainly appear.

—I know that what is called precious is unenduring ; and by unlasting things what is lasting cannot be gained. Therefore the triple fire was chosen by me, and instead of these unenduring things I have gained what endures.

Thus saying, and having beheld the fulfilment of desire, the seat of the world, the endless fruit of sacrifice, the shore where there is no fear, great praise, and the wide-famed world, thou, Nachiketas, hast wisely passed them by.

The lasting thing which cannot be gained by the unlasting is peace, which can never come from the gratification of desire, but only from the kindling of the triple fire, the three-fold Higher Self, of Being, Bliss, and Knowledge. The words "the fulfilment of desire" refer to Death's offer in the first part of the Upanishad. The seat of the world is the "Kingdoms of this world and the glory of them" ; the fruit of sacrifice or good deeds is the rest in Devachan—the shore where there is no fear ; all this, Nachiketas, understanding its unlasting character, had passed by

— But that which is hard to see, which has entered the secret place and is hidden in secret, the mystery, the Ancient; understanding that bright one by the path of union with the Inner Self, the wise man leaves exaltation and sorrow behind.

A mortal, hearing this and understanding it, passing on to that righteous subtle one and obtaining it, rejoices, having good cause for rejoicing; and the door to it is wide open, I think, Nachiketas.

“The Mystery, the Ancient” is the Higher Self, which for the unenlightened is hidden in the secret place, the beyond, above the ordinary consciousness of the soul; it is the ancient, because the Higher Self is the power which again and again causes the incarnation of the personality through a vast series of lives, and thus, as the Ancient of Days, it is endless both backwards and forwards. It is to be found by the path of union with the Inner Self, the bridge so often spoken of in the Upanishads. This bridge, which the disciple must cross by becoming it, is really the identification of the personality with the life of the Higher Self by perfectly following its dictates and assimilating its nature; by the perfect obedience through which alone there is liberty.

A mortal learning this obedience and understanding it, and then becoming himself the path by identifying himself with the law of the path, reaches that Subtle one, where is eternal joy and not that lower exultation which is merely the opposite of grief; this exultation and grief being the two sides of the lower, personal self, while joy and peace are of the Higher Self and have no opposites; for the Higher Self is beyond the world of opposites, heat and cold, sorrow and exultation, and the rest. As the law is always waiting for obedience, the door is always open.

— What thou seest to be neither the law nor lawlessness, neither what is commanded nor what is forbidden, neither what has been nor what shall be, say that it is THAT.

That resting-place which all the Vedas proclaim, and all austerities declare; seeking for which they enter the service of the eternal; that resting-place I briefly tell to thee.

It is the unchanging Eternal; it is the unchanging Supreme; having understood that eternal one, whatsoever a man wishes, that he gains. It is the excellent foundation, the supreme foundation; knowing that foundation, a man grows mighty in the eternal world.

The Higher Self is again defined as that which is free from the pairs of opposites; that which is neither the righteousness of the ritual law nor yet the unrighteousness of breach of that law; neither the performance of ritual nor its neglect; but a new life, a new yet ancient being, above the virtue and vice of the ritual law, because it dwells in the Great Beyond, while the law of ritual is, at best, for this world or for Devachan. The Higher Self is also the resting-place declared by the Vedas, because it rests above the personal life, while the personal life goes through endless alternations of birth and death; as the Higher Self, being a facet of the Infinite One, contains within itself the infinite; he who has gained it possesses all things, and therefore possesses whatever he may desire.

[Death speaks:]

—The knower is never born nor dies; nor is it from anywhere, nor did anything become it. Unborn, eternal, immemorial, this ancient is not slain when the body is slain.

If the slayer thinks to slay it, if the slain thinks it is slain, neither of them understands; this slays not, nor is slain. Smaller than small, greater than great, this self is hidden in the heart of man.

He who has ceased from sacrifices and passed sorrow by, through the favor of that ordainer beholds the greatness of the Self.

Though seated, it travels far; though at rest, it goes everywhere; who but thee is worthy to know this bright one, who is joy without rejoicing?

The "knower" is again the Higher Self, which knows all things. It is the ordainer, because it is the will and power of the Higher Self which ordains the incarnations of the personality and directs the whole series, with a single purpose, from beginning to end; correcting one life and supplementing its deficiencies in those that follow. Though seated, though at rest, it travels far, from one end of the chain of births to the other; it is everywhere, in every birth, because it overshadows and ordains them all.

[Death continues:]

—Understanding this great lord, the Self, the bodiless in bodies, the unstable in stable things, the wise man cannot grieve. This Self is not to be gained by speaking of it, nor by cleverness, nor by much hearing. Whom this chooses, by him it is gained; and the Self chooses his body as its own.

He who has not ceased from evil, who is not at peace, who stands not firm, whose emotions are not at rest, cannot obtain it by understanding. Brahman and Kshattriya are its food; its anointing is death; who knows truly where it is?

This final clause reiterates the truth that through the death of the lower self, and perfect integrity, and through these only, the path to the Self can be known; that Self whose food is Brahman and Kshattriya—knowledge and power; and whose anointing comes only through the death of selfishness. When selfishness is dead, then that Self chooses the purified soul, which gradually becomes one with it, in the resting-place which all the Vedas sing.

WHAT is the hypnotic force or influence? What really happens when a hypnotic experiment is performed? What is proved by it? What force is exerted that, after making a man sleep, rouses him to a false wakefulness in which he obeys a suggestion, seems to lose his identity, becomes apparently another person, speaks a language he knows nothing of, sees imagined pictures as real ones? How is it that in this state his physical body follows the operator's suggestion and becomes blistered by a piece of paper which possesses no blistering power, sneezes when there is no actual titillation of the olfactory nerves, shivers over a hot stove, and perspires if it be suggested that a block of ice is a mass of fire?

All this and very much more has been done in hypnotic experiments, just as it was done many years ago by mesmerizers, electro-biologists, and wandering fascinators of all sorts. Then it was outside the pale of science, but now since physicians renamed a part of it "hypnotism" it is settled to stay among the branches of psychology theoretical and applied. The new schools, of course, went further than the first did or could. They added a species of witchcraft to it by their latest claim to be able to externalize and localize the nerve-sensitiveness and hence mental impressionability of the subject; to put it in his photograph or within a glass of water, so that if the former be scratched or the latter touched, the patient at once jumped or screamed. This is the old way of making a wax image of your form and sticking pins in it, whereupon you pined and died; men and women were burned for this once. This, while interesting and important if true, possesses the interest of a nightmare, as it suggests how in the near future one's picture may be for sale to be blistered and stabbed by an enemy, provided the extraneous localization of sensibility is first provided for. But the other experiments touch upon the great questions of identity, of consciousness, of soul, and of personality. They raise an issue as to whether the world be physical and mechanical, as Descartes thought, or whether it is fleeting and a form of consciousness existing because of thought and dominated by thought altogether, as the Theosophists modern and ancient always held.

Professor James of Harvard has published his conclusion that experiments in hypnotism convince him, as they have convinced many, of the existence of the hidden self in man, while the French schools dispute whether it is all due to one personality mimicking many, or many personalities wrapped up in one person and showing one phase after another. Facts are recorded and wonderful things done, but no reasonable and final explanation has been made by the modern schools. Except here and there they, being ignorant of man's hidden real nature and powers, or denying the existence of such, see no cause for alarm in all these experiments and no danger to either society or the individual. As the true evolution of man's inner powers at the same rate and time concurrently with all other racial and planetary evolution is not admitted by these schools, they cannot perceive in the future any possibly devilish use of hypnotic powers. The Theosophist, however, suggests an explanation for the phenomena, points to similar occurrences through history, and intimates a danger to come if the thinking world does not realize our true nature as a being made of thought and consciousness, built in and on these, and destructible by them also so far as his personality is concerned. The danger is not in knowing these things and processes, but in the lack of morality and ethics in the use of them both now and in the future.

One theory for use in explaining and prosecuting hypnotic research is about as follows. Man is a soul who lives on thoughts and perceives only thoughts. Every object or subject comes to him as a thought, no matter what the channel or instrument, whether organ of sense or mental center, by which it comes before him. These thoughts may be words, ideas, or pictures. The soul-man has to have an intermediary or connecting link with Nature through and by which he may cognize and experience. This link is an ethereal double or counterpart of his physical body, dwelling in the latter; and the physical body is Nature so far as the soul-man is concerned. In this ethereal double (called astral body) are the sense-organs and centers of perception, the physical outer organs being only the external channels or means for concentrating the physical vibrations so as to transmit them to the astral organs and centers where the soul perceives them as ideas or thoughts. This inner ethereal man is made of the ether which science is now admitting as a necessary part of Nature, but while it is etheric it is none the less substantial.

Speaking physically, all outer stimulus from nature is sent from without to within. But in the same way stimuli may be sent from the within to the without, and in the latter mode is it that our thoughts and desires propel us to act. Stimuli are sent from the astral man within to the periphery, the physical body, and may dominate the body so as to alter it or bring on a lesion partial or total. Cases of the hair turning grey in a night are thus possible. And in this way a suggestion of a blister may make a physical swelling, secretion, inflammation, and sore on a subject who has submitted himself to the influence of the hypnotizer. The picture or idea of a blister is impressed on the astral body, and that controls all the physical nerves, sensations, currents, and secretions. It is done through the sympathetic nervous plexus and ganglia. It was thus that ecstatic fanatical women and men by brooding on the pictured idea of the wounds of Jesus produced on their own bodies, by internal impression and stimulus projected to the surface, all the marks of crown of thorns and wounded side. It was self-hypnotization, possible only in fanatical hysterical ecstasy. The constant brooding imprinted the picture deeply on the astral body; then the physical molecules, ever changing, became impressed from within and the stigmata were the result. In hypnotizing done by another the only difference is one of time, as in the latter instances the operator has simply to make the image and impress it on the subject after the hypnotic process has been submitted to, whereas in self-hypnotization a long-continued ecstasy is necessary to make the impression complete.

When the hypnotic process—or subjugation, as I call it—is submitted to, a disjunction is made between the soul-man and the astral body, which then is for the time deprived of will, and is the sport of any suggestion coming in unopposed, and those may and do sometimes arise outside of the mind and intention of the operator. From this arises the sensitiveness to suggestion. The idea, or thought, or picture of an act is impressed by suggesting it on the astral body, and then the patient is waked. At the appointed time given by the suggestor a secondary sleep or hypnotic state arises automatically, and then, the disjunction between soul and astral body coming about of itself, the suggested act is performed unless—as happens rarely—the soul-man resists sufficiently to prevent it. Hence we point to an element of danger in the fact that at the suggested moment the hypnotic state comes on secondarily by association. I do not know that hypnotizers have perceived this. It indicates that although the subject be dehypnotized the influence of the operator once thrown on the subject will remain until the day of the operator's death.

But how is it that the subject can see on a blank card the picture of an object which you have merely willed to be on it?

This is because every thought of any one makes a picture; and a thought of a definite image makes a definite form in the astral light in which the astral body exists and functions, interpenetrating<sup>g</sup> also every part of the physical body. Having thus imaged the picture on the card, it remains in the astral light or sphere surrounding the card, and is there objective to the astral sense of the hypnotized subject.

Body, soul, and astral man properly in relation give us a sane man; hypnotized, the relation is broken and we have a person who is not for the time wholly sane. Acute maniacs are those in whom the disjunction between astral man and soul is complete. Where the hypnotized one remains for months in that state, the astral man has become the slave of the body and its recollections, but as the soul is not concerned, no real memory is present and no recollection of the period is retained.

The varied personalities assumed by some subjects brings up the doctrine of a former life on earth for all men. The division between soul and astral man releases the latter from some of the limitations of brain memory so that the inner memory may act, and we then have a case of a person reënacting some part of his former life or lives. But a second possibility also exists,—that by this process another and different entity may enter the body and brain and masquerade as the real person. Such entities do exist and are the astral shells of men and women out of the body. If they enter, the person becomes insane; and many a maniac is simply a body inhabited by an entity that does not belong to it.

The process of hypnotizing is as yet unknown in respect to what does happen to the molecules. We claim that those molecules are pressed from periphery to center instead of being expanded from the inside to the surface. This contraction is one of the symptoms of death, and therefore hypnotizing is a long step toward physical and moral death. The view expressed by Dr. Charcot that a subject is liable to fall under the influence at the hands of anyone should be admitted, as also that in the wake of the hypnotizer will be found a host of hysteriacs, and that it all should be regulated by law is unquestionable. I go still further and say that many persons are already in a half-hypnotized state, easily influenced by the unprincipled or the immoral; that the power to hypnotize and to be sensitive to it are both progressive states of our racial evolution; that it can and will be used for selfish, wicked, and degrading purposes unless the race, and especially the occidental portion of it, understands and practices true ethics based on the brotherhood of man. Ethics of the purest are found in the words of Jesus, but are universally negatived by Church, State, and individual. The Theosophical doctrines of man and nature give a true and necessary basis and enforcement to ethics, devoid of favoritism or illogical schemes of eternal damnation. And only through those doctrines can the dangers of hypnotism be averted, since legislation, while affixing penalties, will not alter or curtail private acts of selfishness and greed.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE, F.T.S.

WHAT PROOF HAVE WE ?

MR. CHAIRMAN, Friends: Before entering upon the question of the evening I shall ask your permission to make use, temporarily, of the pronouns "you" and "we". By the use of the pronoun "you" I shall for the moment designate persons outside the Theosophical Society, who might or might not be enquirers about, or interested in, the Eastern Teachings. By the use of the pronoun "we" I shall designate all members of the Theosophical Society, and I will beg you to remember that I recognize in reality no such distinction; that I make use of this nomenclature for the purposes of clear illustration only, and that experience has shown full well that there are many devoted Theosophists who have never heard that word, and many using the word who have not even grasped the outermost significance thereof.

The question of the evening is "What proof have we?" Now this question is being asked daily more and more, is pressing upon us from all sides. For this reason, before entering into any argument as to the nature of proof itself, I wish to examine into the bearing and the reason, in short the justification, of this question; I wish to see what reason there is in its being put to us at all. And above all it is necessary to know why it is put to us and who are the persons who bring it forward. For at the very outset of his entrance into the Theosophical forum (and by "forum" I mean that place wherein a man may speak of his convictions—and be heard), the Theosophist finds himself almost immediately confronted by this question of proof. Too often the question converts the forum into the arena; the place where the combat as if for life, or for that which is dearer than life, goes on. The rightfulness of this question naturally becomes our first concern. When we speak of our belief you press up to us demanding this proof. What right have you to make that demand? There are two things which constitute a man's right: first, there is his need of a thing—his real need; that constitutes a right in the eyes of any moral community; secondly,—and a bad second,—there are the rights of custom. Let us examine the lesser rights first, viz.:—the rights of custom.

Are you accustomed, then, in your daily life to demand the proof of things before you can accept them? Do you demand proof of the purity of the water you drink, of the food you eat, of the financial investments you make? On all these depend health, life, immunity from care. Do you go to the root of each subject, examining each for yourself, or do you take the asseveration of one or another expert on the subject? You do examine, I know, but do you examine to the very root? No! What journeys, what expense, what knowledge would that not involve! Hence the custom has arisen of accepting the verdict of an expert number of our fellow beings upon such points: each such person is supposed to have examined more or less into the subject, though he may or may not have done so. Have you ever heard the story of the aged gentleman who determined to take nothing without absolute proof and who was therefore found at midnight still longing to partake of his early cup of coffee, usually taken before rising, because the busy chemist called in had not yet had time to decide whether milk, sugar, and coffee were pure? Would you not, then, be quite as belated in your daily life if you were to undertake to obtain unimpeachable proofs for yourselves? It has hence come about that you believe many an improbable thing without proof. You trust your friends, your wives, your societies, your churches, your scientists, yes, even your theologians, at times, without proof. It would be rare to find a man who would admit that he did not believe the world moves round the sun, and yet what proof has he of that? None. He has not even the knowledge necessary to obtain the real proof, that proof which is found alone in a man's own experience. In the same way he has accepted the presence of life, or lives, in the air and the water. He has accepted many a problem, many a discovery in this scientific age; he feels that to deny these would also make him a laughing-stock. And if we ask him "What proof have you of this or that?", he gives us in reply some well-known name. To such a point has this practice been carried that Prof. Tyndall said some years ago in the United States that in his belief the testimony of a number of veracious witnesses constituted ample proof. We can give you this, and the world-known names besides if you will, in support of Theosophy, but you would not accept; you probably would laugh at it. In our opinion you would be quite right in doing so. Nevertheless I point out to you that in thus meeting us at the outset with a demand for proof, you are setting up as a right that which you do not ask of any other department of the world's knowledge, except in a very few rare circumstances which I shall specify hereafter. To take up another point of the subject; not long ago I met a gentleman well-known in all English-speaking countries as a literary man of wide and varied accomplishment. He spoke to me of certain matters in which I felt deep interest. So deep indeed was this interest that later on I said to him "Can you give me any proof of what you advance?" What was his reply? It was this: "I did not ask you to believe the statements I was then putting forward, as matters of interest, of conversation, of what you please; I repeat, that I did not seek your belief, consequently you have no right to ask proof of them. Proof may only justly be asked of a man who is endeavoring to secure your adherence to what he puts forward".

This I believe in the common tenet. Consequently, the Theosophist, young or old, educated or non-educated, wise in experience or just entering upon that experience, official or non-official, has an entire right to put forward his belief with all the eloquence and earnestness he can muster to the task without laying himself open to any charge of dogmatism, without giving you any right to demand his proofs. In order to be dogmatic he would have to make two assertions. (a) "These are the lines of my belief and I will never alter them, never enlarge them; they shall never grow fuller or wider than they now are. (b) I insist upon your accepting this present statement of mine as the only truth". If he have not unmistakably done these two things, he triumphantly escapes the charges of biased minds who see dogmatism in his earnestness and narrowness in his eloquent definition. I think if you will follow out these lines it will be plain to you that custom does not sanctify this demand so, pressed upon Theosophists; no, not even that hallowed Custom which has been erected as a goddess in our midst but which changes her fashion and face with every year. Even the legal rule demands that the accuser, the challenger, shall prove his case.

In coming to a man's need of proof we touch upon deeper ground. I do not mean to say by this that the need is deep in every man; as we have in fact seen, it rarely is so. But let us suppose a man who has gone forth from all accustomed modes of thought, self-banished, as it were, from the normal realm of mind. Hungering for food, food for that man who is "the man that was and is and shall be, for whom the hour shall never strike", he comes and asks us "What proof have you of these things?" To his need we must perforce turn a compassionate ear. And yet, how little can we do; for, look you, we are not divided from him in thought, or heart, or experience by any will whatsoever of our own. It is the mere fact that we have touched what he has not touched, that we have seen where his eyes were closed, that we have heard while he listened to another voice, it is this fact which makes the difference between us. It is not a difference of higher or lower, of greater or lesser knowledge, of superiority or inferiority; it is simply the difference of experience, as colorless as the difference between rates of vibration; we have evolved to a different point, or by differing means, and our conclusions vary from his because the content of our consciousness varies from his. But in a moment, in the flash of an eye, he may see all his past by another light, by the inner light, and may find himself transported much further along the great evolutionary path than we ourselves now are. All our knowledge is relative, and where a point of time makes up the situation, another point of time may alter its uttermost foundation.

When, further, a man has a real need of anything in this world, what does he ordinarily do? Let us suppose that he wished to ask of a chemist, of the shoemaker at his awl or of the miner shut out from daylight and health in his pit; what would happen then? We can fancy him going to the miner and saying, "I want proof of the geological strata in which your ore lies; proof that yours is the proper method of excavating: proof that this ore which I see at the mouth of the pit has really been brought up by you and by no other and from the place which you describe". What is the answer? A jeer and a curse, perhaps. Or perhaps a question, "Are you a miner? If you be, come on down and see for yourself". And if you are not, a further jeer. So with the shoemaker. He shows you his finished article; but if you ask him to demonstrate to you that it was made precisely so and so, from the skinning of the dead beast and the tanning of the leather up to the final fashioning that fits for it the child's dainty foot, a stare of surprise will be the least and the most courteous reply you can expect. Or fancy yourself entering the laboratory of Crookes or of Tesla or Edison and demanding proofs of his latest discoveries. Let us again take the Artist, the Sculptor, or any earthly creator you may choose, into this conclave, and let us in fancy ask him for the much-sought-for proof. They may show us the finished thing; they may demonstrate all its parts; is that proof? No! No!. How do we know that it was made as they say; by the methods they describe; with the materials they claim; under the conditions that they assert? We would have to obtain their formula, or what science calls their working hypothesis, we would have to take that home with us, and, securing just the same conditions, just the same materials, work out by their methods, duly prescribed, to their exact results. This being so, the first question they would ask of us is this, "Are you a man of my trade?"; and finding we were not, they too would turn aside from us with a more or less courteous putting-off as the case may be. It is clearly evident that every man who has attained, in any department of life, knows one primary thing, and that is, that no man can understand those results which are his proofs unless he also knows the working hypothesis and has experience of the trade.

What I am coming to is this. In order to have your proof, you must work for it. In all this great universe there is no proof obtainable except by work; whether work of the body; work of the eye; work of the mind, that great overseer which sums up the results of all other classes of work; work there must be or proof there is none. And, speaking for myself, I honor, I may say I revere, the man or woman strong enough, patient enough, determined enough to get proof. For the only proof lies in man's own experience. There is no other that does not melt away like the hoar frost on the mountain, like the foam dashed from the turbulent sea.

It thus comes about that the attitude of the Theosophist, or indeed of any really thinking person, is the attitude imposed by Nature herself. To know a thing you must be it; you must have experience of it. When the Theosophist quotes from the Christian Bible those most occult words, "Lead the life if ye would know the doctrine", he is not putting you off because of any lack of proof of his own, because of any want of power of speech or eloquence, because he cannot point out the work, the method of work, or the way. No; he is uttering one of the eternal verities, and great Nature herself sustains him. Experience you must have, before you know a thing in its depth and breadth and length. In matters of the mind this experience may be purely mental, as in matters of sympathy; but mental experience in certain souls is at once the most objective and most evident of all experiences. Hence when you ask us for proof we know well that you are asking what you ask of very few. We know well that you rarely put your theologians or scientists or great artisans or inventors or mechanics or laborers—no, not even your statesmen or your women—to this test. Nevertheless, the true Theosophist, recognizing that he is in part his brother's keeper, will not return the answer of Cain, who cried "Am I my brother's keeper?", but, on the contrary, he will meet you with a fact in nature—the fact that you must work for your proof even as he worked, and that without such work the facts which he may offer will never become an integral part of your experience, will never be accepted by the thinking man within you as a truth in which he has part.

And now let me ask, What is proof? In Western lands there is a maxim, "The law is common sense." Let us, then, have recourse to this embodied common sense in order to make out our reply. Last week I asked one of the ablest barristers in London for a definition of proof. After a little puzzlement he said that the best reply he could make me would be that proof was "evidence sufficient to satisfy the Court." That sounds well; but Courts vary. There are some inquirers who assert that the production of phenomena would be sufficient proof of all the teachings of the East. This reminds us of the tale of the two Rabbis, the first of whom was endeavoring to prove to the second that he knew more of the Supreme Being than his friend. In proof of this the learned Rabbi No. 1 offered to cause the walls of the temple where they sat to fall down. The second Rabbi placidly remarked: "Friend, that would prove that thou didst indeed know how to cause walls to fall down, but it would prove nothing else." Moreover, a law of the human mind very often commented upon would render such phenomena valueless. I am again reminded of another tale, the newest parrot story as imported from America (with the profanity discreetly left out, for the parrot not being intentionally, or, as we may say, consciously, profane, I think this little attention is due to him in a Theosophical Lodge). My parrot lived in a shop of a seller of fireworks, and was used to seeing very brilliant specimens of coruscations set off for the benefit of intending purchasers. These gave him great delight. In fact, he became quite hardened to them and began to regard them with an air of cynical and accustomed habit. One day, however, the shop blew up; the parrot found himself landed in a distant and barren field, minus his feathers (for he did not take his wardrobe with him on that rapid journey). Scratching his naked head with his bleeding claw, he exclaimed: "Ain't it wonderful! What will happen next?" This attitude is that of the phenomena seeker who, witnessing more and more, desires the repetition of the same experience over and over, but a little stronger each time; as witness the Spiritualists, who with all their remarkable phenomena have built up no real philosophy. But I will not take up your time by enlarging further upon this head, but shall be happy if anything I may have said will serve as a text which you can follow out in your own mind. And to those to whom the whole discourse may appear dull I would offer a prescription embodied in two of George Herbert's most exquisite lines addressed to the Church-goer:

"And, if the preacher weary,
God takes the text and preaches patience."

I am quite sure if you learn patience, Sovereign Patience, from my discourse, you will have learned a virtue greater than any I have within my gift.

Since, then, we find that phenomena are not proof, the nature of proof still remains unexplained. What proof does the Law offer? In almost all cases witnesses come forward and detail the narrative which Court and Jury hear. Take, for example, a murder case. Is the murder shown? No! Is it described? Not always. A tale is told by more or fewer witnesses. Told to whom? To what? To the minds of the Jurymen and the Court, and the Mind, the eternal witness, hears, weighs, sums up, judges, condemns or sets free. Here, then, we have the Law. The oracular embodied common-sense of the land recognizes that proof is subjective and not objective, and that the mind of man is the sole arbiter, the sole judge, and that the evidence upon which he makes up his verdict is evidence cognizable by the mind of man alone, valid to him alone; that mind is indeed the power behind the throne. For, mark you, if the minds of the Jury differ in any case, the Jurymen in the minority who have not seen the case from the standpoint of the majority acquire no condemnation therefor. They are not reproached—not justly reproached, at all events, because they have not seen the case as others do and have not derived the same conclusions from the same evidence. All that is said is that their minds have not acted upon the evidence normal to the majority. And yet even in the history of the Law these minorities have proved to be right with the passage of time. Innocent men have been hung on the verdict of a majority. Take another point: the Law itself recognizes the constitutional inability of two or more minds to see an event alike. Bribed and perjured witnesses always tell the tale exactly alike; by this peculiarity the Law recognizes them. Veracious witnesses, being so many different minds, have each seen a different side of the occurrence. And in this guise we have the Law itself unconsciously acknowledging that every mind is at a different standpoint of evolution from every other. In this lies the reason why each person must gain his own proof through his own experience. To what, now, do these facts lead us? To this: in this highly civilized day, in our very Christian countries, you will take the life of your fellow-beings on subjective proof when you will not for one instant receive the same as valid at the hands of your fellow Theosophists.

If, then, the Theosophist chose, as I doubt not he would choose, to disregard the peremptory nature of this demand for proof and the fact that it is seldom asked except for argumentative purposes, which, as everyone knows, end in mere contention; if he chose, I say, to give serious attention to the question, his natural reply would be this: What is that for which you demand proof? Is it for the whole bulk of Theosophic teaching? Is it for the existence of Masters? Is it for the reality of phenomena? Now of the latter question I think we have already disposed, but there is one thing more which might be said, and it is this: If you are not yourself master to some extent of the laws lying behind nature, or operating through nature, you do not know whether any phenomena which may be produced before you consist in (A) mere mesmeric or hypnotic phenomena causing you to see what has no temporary existence at all, or (B) the actual phenomena in which something has been created by the use of occult or hidden Law, which something did not exist in objective form at all before. It is thus clear that only to the Adept, who needs it not, can valid proof of this kind be given, and that those who ask for it are ignorant in the deepest sense of ignorance. To be ignorant and to know it is a depth; but to be ignorant and not to know it is a greater depth still. Now again, as to proof, as to the existence of a Great Lodge or Hierarchy of Wise Beings. On this I purposely touch very lightly: and I may say, indeed, that if any one came to me saying that I had published my belief in Theosophical teachings and were to ask "Have you any proof?" I should reply: "For myself? Yes! Certainly I have proof. For you? No! For you I have none at all." You would mistake if you were to call this pride on my part. The reply would arise wholly from the knowledge that no man can in any sense be the savior of another man. Each man must arise and must get his own proof, with the help, perhaps, if he be working, of his fellow-workmen. But of proof as to the existence of the Elder Brothers of the race, I may permit myself to make one very common-sense remark, as it appears to me. Reverse the case. Say that I am living in Thibet and that I am asked as to the existence of certain living, very prominent, very highly evolved and able men, residents of America, but who have been known to visit other lands. I tell the Thibetans of these men; they ask for proof of their existence. I show pictures. They are not proof. I show letters. They are not proof. I call upon other men and women who have seen them to testify. Their word too is denied. I point to the religious and other books of America to show that a knowledge of these men has existed for a long period of time. This too is not proof. I call upon our learned men, who admit that the existence of such highly evolved men was always part of the belief of the residents of the country. My Thibetans shrug their shoulders at this mass of testimony and remain unconvinced. And any one of you, if you were standing by me, would no doubt say to me, "In heaven's name why not leave them to their ignorance?" Now this is precisely what I should do; in fact, I should never have proceeded so far as this imaginary picture points out. And why? Because it is part of my experience that no one gets any living proof that way, and I should not waste my time in attempting the impossible. It is not that I know more than the supposed inquirer. It is that the content of my consciousness is not the content of his consciousness and never can become so by any effort of mine. He will have to live and work and get the proof himself, as I did, if I have it at all. And when we add to this fact, that the proof of a man's being a Mahatma or Great Soul has to do with the interior and mysterious processes of the soul itself; that the soul alone recognizes the Great Soul; that such a Being is first met upon the plane of soul, and there only at first; I think you will concede that this subject of proof becomes a very difficult one, and that you must be content to leave me to what you may, if you please, call my delusions; or else you may accept the working hypothesis of living the life if you would know the doctrine, and work out thereby the matter to its ultimate conclusion. For other means than life and work there are none. Other proof of the existence of Great Souls, mastering the bodies in which they dwell, having communion with mankind travelling in pain on the one hand, and with the great boundless freedom of spirit on the other; other proof, I say, than that your soul first touches Their souls, there is none. There never will be any other proof until you have first mastered that truth and have learned to know the intangible eternal presences by a proof more sure than the presence of evanescent form.

Or, again, the proof asked may be that of certain fundamental propositions of Theosophy, such as those laid down in the Secret Doctrine. These are first, the existence of a boundless, eternal Principle of life; second, the universality of the law of periodicity, or Karma; third, the spiritual identity of all souls with the Over-soul. Such proof can be sought, and can, so far as my own experience goes, be found in every department of life. I admit that in this so-called scientific age the merest weaklings are so inflated with the rabies of science that they think they must have scientific proof of everything, and hence would deny what may be called proof by analogy. Science herself, laboriously great but often true, treats us no better. But permit me to take a case in point, an illustration from a lecture recently delivered in this hall on what are called "The Lives." In that lecture it was shown that science demonstrated certain action and reaction always taking place in the unit, as it is called, of protoplasmic matter. It was also shown that this series of action and reaction was precisely the same as those given in the Secret Doctrine relative to the action of the life-principle in regard to the Solar systems, worlds, man, and even the constituent cells of his body. Now, as I say, science would refuse us the right to this proof by analogy. But let us see if we cannot wrest it from her own utterance. For what says science further, after postulating this unit of protoplasm and definite actions and reactions taking place? Science shows at once this fact, that the whole visible universe is built up of a series of just such units. In this conclusion, then, she herself gives us that proof in regard to the universe to which we have laid claim. Or take another case. In the same lecture it was said that protoplasm, the basis of all life, was built up of certain well-defined chemical constituents, but that if you put those constituents together in their exact proportions, living protoplasm would not result. What would be absent? Life would be absent. The scientist claims that there is no such thing as life per se, life in itself. But may we not fairly claim that if the absence of life or motion prevents this chemical structure so carefully builded up after the living model, from being alive, it is a fair conclusion that there is a something called Life whose absence makes the difference between a living thing and a dead thing, as science uses the terms "life" and "death." I speak advisedly of the terminology of science, for to the Theosophist Life and a change in the modes of Life alone are known.

Going thus rapidly over the whole ground of proof, what I would finally suggest to my fellow Theosophists is this: The proof that is wanted is proof of the great spiritual side of life and that which in all directions underlies the visible and material. Now the proofs of life are everywhere. They are found in all occupations, in all departments of life, in all sciences, in all arts; they are best found in the beings of whom life itself is composed. Take, for instance, the question of evolution, that great moot-point which is said to have been the chief among the discoveries (re-discoveries I should call them) of this century. You may find it everywhere. You may find it in statecraft, in the tendency away from warfare and towards arbitration. You may find it in the trades, in the tendency away from monopoly and towards co-operation; yes, even in the limited co-operation of monopolists, which is its most dangerous form. You may find it in education; in the tendency, growing greater every hour, to give the same advantages to both sexes. You may find it in theology, in that these later days have seen the study of comparative theology, in part adopted, in place of that method where a man learned only his own form of belief and, at most, the best argument of other schools, in order to be able to refute. You may find it in the industrial life of cities; in the custom, growing daily greater, of embracing the sale of all manner of goods in one shop, instead of employing that shop as a place where only one species of goods could be obtained. You will find it in the drama, which, opening at the beginning of the century with the statuesque method of the Greek stage, and passing through the romantic, the melodramatic or intensely real, the ideal (as in some plays of Tennyson and others of his school), has finally culminated at the close of the century in a school of playwrights who show all the situations of life arising out of and caused by the complexities of character of that thing painfully created, life after life by man: I mean, the heart of man itself. That heart has built up the whole of life about us. It is responsible for all the strange alternations, struggles, differences, and tragedies of life. The latter-day dramatist has seen it; the prophetic seer has sung it for centuries also. If you turn to music, if you turn to painting, evolution is still plainly discerned. If, then, Theosophists wish to point out such proof relative to the ancient Eastern beliefs as may serve as sufficient basis for a man to begin to work upon, let them turn to the various departments of life and demonstrate the first faint clues of greater riddles in them. Not a mother among her children, not a workman by his bench, not a photographer spreading his film ready for the transforming fingers of the light to create some radiant image and cast it out of space upon the glass, not any man or any woman working anywhere but can bring some material from his or her place of life with which to build broad and wide the base of this universal temple which we can and will raise to the skies. Do not look abroad in things unknown to you for proof; seek that proof of the building spirit, the living spirit, the unseen all-powerful workman, in the Life of which you are part; and having discerned Him behind his customary mask, bring to us the faithful image of that which you have seen. The mother, observing the birth of character with the child, watchful of the development of the mere animal mind, joyous discerner of the first unfolding of the immortal soul, can put together argument for Reincarnation, for the belief that the strong character already shown in infancy—character dissimilar to that of all the ancestry perhaps—has been moulded by many a prior life. In the inter-correlation of forces, the behavior of energy, its conservation and interaction, the scientist can find still other proof. When the microscopist can find no bacteria present in a speck of matter placed under his most powerful lens, the photographer, preparing a plate sensitized to the action of the rays of the ultra-violet only—the unseen rays whose action and existence can only be demonstrated by chemistry—the photographer, I say, photographing by these rays, produces pictures of living and moving bacteria to which the wonder-revealing lens was blind. The astral ray revealing the lower astral forms—is it not a fitting sequence? And H. P. Blavatsky said that the greatest proof of occult theory would be found along biological and chemical lines. The schoolboy reads in his Natural Philosophy the first law of motion: “Action and reaction are equal and opposite in direction.” It is true of emotion as well. And it reveals the Law of Karma. H. P. Blavatsky pointed out the path. We should each seek to give our own proofs. No more is needed. No more can be asked. The proofs lie within yourselves; your daily acts fecundate them, your lives are their heralds. You have but to speak them. There is not one of us from whom all the rest may not learn something of proof, were that proof but brought before them. And is it not a duty which we owe to our belief, to demonstrate the real amplitude of its base?

Or perhaps it is proof of our ideals that men ask. What kind of proof, think you, would hold good of an ideal? I can conceive no other proof than its action upon the life. Were I asked, “Who are these men who have attained in ever so small measure to some proof of these great truths?” I would make answer thus: They are those who have looked upon a far star beyond the tempest. They are those who have worked and toiled and waited, who being crushed have arisen, who having fallen have struggled and have arisen again and again. They are those who have done this for the sole and pure sake of the realization of an ideal which assures them that the salvation of one is inextricably bound up in the salvation of all. They are those who have seen the mighty image of Unity and Harmony far beyond the contemplation of the mere mortal mind, and who work on towards it regardless of themselves, caught up in the glory of that immortal ideal. For the proof of a man is his life. The proof of an Ideal is its life in the soul.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

CLAUDE FALLS WRIGHT was born September 18th, 1867, in Dublin, Ireland. His mother is an English woman, a member of an old Cheshire family. His father was the nephew of a well-known Crimean General named Falls. He was educated at the High School in Harcourt Street, Dublin, where many well-known Irish theosophists were also taught. Preparing to enter the Civil Service in England he passed one grade, but while waiting for an appointment became an accountant in an Assurance Company. When he was eighteen years old he entered the Royal College of Surgeons to study medicine, but had not completed the first year before he heard of Theosophy through Charles Johnston. This subject then claimed his attention and he went over to London at the age of twenty to see H. P. B., afterwards asking her to advise him about going to India, to which she replied, "Do not go, but come to me and I will teach you", but saying he must first form a Branch, if possible, in Dublin. Acting on this, he gathered persons together, and finally a Branch was formed, which was opened by Brothers Judge and A. Keightley. Since then he has devoted himself entirely to the Society.

He was with H. P. B. for three years, and beside her at the time of her leaving this earth. At one time he was one of her secretaries, and at another time manager of the Duke Street Publishing Company, now the T. P. S. Almost every picture and ornament in H. P. B.'s room he put up at her request, as well as constructing many of the shelves for them. During the first and last visit H. P. B. paid to No. 17 Avenue Road, next door to the Headquarters, she leaned on Brother Wright's arm as he showed her around the place, and at the time of her death he knelt beside her holding her left hand, and as she passed away took the ring from off her fourth finger. For a long time he was also Secretary of the Blavatsky Lodge in London. After the death of H. P. B. he came to America, arriving in New York seven months to a day after that eventful hour. Since then he has been traveling about the United States, as far north as Minneapolis and south to New Orleans, working at the Headquarters in Madison Avenue when in the city of New York. A great many members of the Society are now personally acquainted with Brother Wright, and his efforts for the Branches have been productive of great benefit, not only to him but also to the organization. His efforts in the Theosophical field in America entitle him to a place in this gallery, as he has visited most of the Branches on the east coast and far to the west, lecturing in the cities visited to large audiences and helping all centres in plans and organization for the purposes of further study. His work in this direction is invaluable and not only is his coming looked for, but constant calls are made for visits. Although Claude Falls Wright is young he has an ancient look due to a slight baldness; his voice is pleasant and insinuating and his birth gives him that touch of humor which enlivens the dullest subject.

PLOT AGAINST THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.

IN the issue of this magazine for July, 1893, we gave a hint of the conspiracy against the Society, and now will outline a little more. The plot extends from India to America, taking in en passant what enemies it can find in Europe. A Parsee in India gave as many private and confidential papers as he could procure, meanwhile professing love of humanity. These were sent to an American citizen on the Pacific Coast who is engaged in the task of collecting all sorts of matter consisting of old tales and secondhand statements so as to put them in a book to be mis-called a history of the T.S. Such is the present title, though it may be changed later on. The price cannot be given as the size is not known. The value of this collector's historical faculty can be gauged by the following extracted from the English paper Light of December 9th, 1883. Speaking of H. P. Blavatsky he says:

The opponents of Madam B. in India were very anxious to have the matter tested in the country and did all they could to have it legally determined ; but Madam and the Theosophists could not be induced to go into court. On the very day she was to be subpoenaed as a witness by the opposition she left India and never returned thereto.

Almost precisely the reverse of this is true. Madame Blavatsky was most eager to bring prosecution for libel against the slandering journals, so eager that at first all remonstrance was powerless. It was represented to her that no Court could be a fitting resort for decision in cases involving Occult matters, and that every attempt would be made by counsel to throw ridicule on the topics most sacred to Hindus. She was at last only brought to relinquish her purpose by Col. Olcott's assurance that he would resign the Presidency of the T.S. if she persisted. (Theosophist of July, 1891). Hence no suit was brought and no witness subpoenaed. Imagine the value of a "History" composed of items with quality like the above! It takes more than purchased titles to make a historian.

A number of private letters and some fanciful imitations of such will be used in the book in order to show the members of the T.S. as fighting like a pack of wolves for place and power. There is a slightly comic effect in this upon any one who knows the T.S. as it is. There are no salaries, no imposing offices, no popular homage, no opportunity for self-aggrandizement. Theosophy being opposed to conventional beliefs, the more prominent the Theosophist the greater the odium he receives. The real consequence of official station in the T.S. is hard work, and it seems singular that men should wrangle and fight for that!

In truth, the calibre of soul which fits men to pursue the business of getting private letters from those receiving them under seal of confidence, and then using them to misrepresent and belittle the living and the dead, is not such as to lead to fame or even general esteem. The burrowing animals do not rank high among fauna. As the plot goes on, other details will be made public, for there can be no possible objection among Theosophists to swell the publicity which ensures contempt for vilifiers, but as yet it has not a very formidable appearance.

Some newspapers and certain organizations aid this plot indirectly, all claiming to be working for the good of the race. The Psychological Research Society is one of such. It frequently occupies itself with discussions of old private letters written by H. P. Blavatsky in order to show her as an imposter, though in trying to do this they arouse the presumption that she must have had unlimited means and innumerable agents in all lands who were in all sorts of governmental offices, and also that she outranked most men of the day in her personal knowledge and memory.

This can do no great harm. In one case lately at a dinner where the agent of the P. R. Society was, in New York State, he retailed many things directed against her and the T S, and then the company requested Brother Harding, who was present, to tell them all he could of Theosophy. So there the vituperation resulted in a whetting of the minds present for Theosophical food. In India the Times prints letters not signed with real names that attempt to show Annie Besant on the brink of a cataclysm that will shatter her life and show her what a dupe she has been of the present officers of the T S for which she works. But she goes on unmoved, rousing up all India, so that the people begin there also to adore her; and knowing herself whereof she speaks, this branch of the attack is of no avail. It encourages Theosophists, while it must be rather depressing to the conspirators to know that one of the Governors in India asked Annie Besant lately to draw up plans for reform and educational work among the Hindus, requesting her as an F. T. S. to stay there and carry them out. This is not a fiction, like the basis on which the plot rests. So we may keep all our courage undiminished.

OF FUNDS AND PROPERTY.

IT was thought by some at one time in the history of the Theosophical Society that a society fund was an indispensable prerequisite to the growth of the movement. This was a natural idea to a Western man because most of the achievements of the West are the result of the use of money, but if one has a good knowledge of human nature and remembers what has happened in other organizations it must be evident that, while money is necessary in order to get bread to eat, it is not entirely necessary for the work of the Theosophical Society. The Roman Catholic Church is probably the most powerful religious body, controlling vast sums of money and owning the best property everywhere, but its great achievements have been in the line of fostering dogmatism and chaining the minds of men; its latest one a few months ago consisting in compelling St. George Mivart, who is a Roman Catholic, to recant what he said in a prominent review tending to show that eternal damnation is impossible. The Methodist and other Churches of the dissenting side of Christianity sustain large missionary enterprises for which they get millions of dollars from their adherents, and the result is that they pay the salaries of many missionaries, enabling their secretaries at home to accumulate money, produce but few converts abroad, and keep up the breach in brotherhood between the East and West by fostering the idea that the heathen are unregenerate and damned. If the Theosophical Society as an organization had always possessed a fund and property, there would always be those who, moved by selfish motives, would struggle to gain possession of the money and the use of the property for their own benefit. But without a fund belonging to the treasury, the Society has steadily grown in influence and numbers. This is because instead of money to fight for we have had an inspiring ideal, and instead of corporate funds to work with we have had devotion which causes the members to use in the work of the organization their own private means untrammelled by the treasury rules. Thus the Society is poor, and it is sincerely to be hoped that it will always remain without a fund as a temptation to the cupidity of man.

The Headquarters in America, situated in New York City, is a piece of property the title to which is vested in the local Branch, which is a corporation formed for the purpose of holding the property. It does not belong to the Theosophical Society, but it is devoted, under the same spirit of devotion as has moved all true Theosophical workers, to the uses and the benefit of the T. S. The Headquarters in London belongs also to a body of persons, not to the Theosophical Society. Exceptionally, the Headquarters in Adyar belongs as a centre to the Theosophical organization as a whole. It has been said by some that all donations, all legacies, all bequests of property, all general acquisitions of all property for the T. S. work should be to and for the Theosophical Society as legal beneficiary, but with this view I for one cannot agree. The funds that are used in the work, outside of the necessary funds belonging to the various Sections and spent during the year should remain the property of private persons who devote them to the uses of the Society freely and in whatever direction their conscience permits. If we accumulate a large corporate fund we will also accumulate around it those human beings who unconsciously as well as deliberately conceal their motives, who ask to be allowed to work so that they may be paid, and who as members of the whole body owning the fund might have a right to demand its division. May Heaven defend us from such a state of things! If persons have money which they desire to devote in large sums to the Society's work, they should either use it themselves in the lines of that activity or deliver it over to such devoted workers as have shown that their guide in life is self-sacrifice for the whole.

Take a few concrete examples. In the American Section, for instance, salaries are not paid, unless you call board and lodging a salary to certain persons who are without means. There are workers in the official departments of that Section who spend their entire time from early morning till night, and all the money they can spare over their actual necessities, in toiling for the Theosophical Society without a salary and at the same time giving out of their means to the needs of the work. In England it is the same. There Mrs. Besant and others work unceasingly for the Society, she supporting herself and contributing all that remains of her earnings to the needs of the Society. H. P. Blavatsky did the same. Col. Olcott did also and is still doing it. Thus in every direction the real lasting and beneficial activities of the Society are carried on by those who, willing to work for it, do not ask a salary; and those of them who possess means do not wish to be trammelled by rules and regulations relating to a general fund which will always be source of annoyance and a temptation to the wicked. In our history of many years we have had this proved in the case of a treasurer in India who, having the small general funds under his control, stole all that he could lay his hands upon. He was but a mortal thrown into the midst of temptation. If the money were his own and he were working in the Society with it, he would not steal it for he could not.

We ought not to encourage large donations to the treasury, but should spread abroad the principle that private means should be liberally given to the tried ones for use in their discretion when the giver does not know how or has not the opportunity to use it himself. Let them do as has been done; just as one man gave H. P. Blavatsky $5000 for the Girls' Club at Bow, London, for which it was judiciously used by Mrs. Besant as agent; or as another gave a large sum to help start a headquarters; or like another in giving the money to print quantities of tracts and pamphlets; or as another who paid over from time to time to an official enough to sustain a well-tried, devoted, but penniless worker in further hard travelling and speaking for the Cause. In this way devotion becomes more valuable than millions of money; those who are capable of speaking and writing but have no means will be enabled to go on by others who, favored by material fate, have a surplus. But make a large treasury fund, and then no barnacle or drone could be shaken off once it had fastened on the old ship, because he would have a voice in the management of means. Again, those captious, suspicious persons who always know the date of a penny or the number of a bill would harrass those who had the spending.

Again, our poverty and lack of earthly applause and reward have saved us from cranks and sectarians who, subliminally attracted by wealth, would prate of doctrine and duty while they stood guard over the cash-box. In the strength of our ideal and devotion is our power, and that work which is done without reward or the hope of it and without the blighting influence of a debit and credit account goes further and lasts longer than any which is given as return for a money consideration.

REINCARNATION IN JUDAISM AND THE BIBLE.

THE lost chord of Christianity is the doctrine of Reincarnation. It was beyond doubt taught in the early days of the cult, for it was well known to the Jews who produced the men who founded Christianity. The greatest of all the Fathers of the Church—Origen—no doubt believed in the doctrine. He taught preëxistence and the wandering of the soul. This could hardly have been believed without also giving currency to reincarnation, as the soul could scarcely wander in any place save the earth. She was an exile from Paradise, and for sins committed had to revolve and wander. Wander where? would be the next question. Certainly away from Paradise, and the short span of human life would not meet the requirements of the case. But a series of reincarnations will meet all the problems of life as well as the necessities of the doctrines of exile, of wanderings for purification, of being known to God and being judged by him before birth, and of other dogmas given out among the Jews and of course well known to Jesus and whoever of the seventy odd disciples were not in the deepest ignorance. Some of the disciples were, presumably ignorant men, such as the fishermen, who had depended on their elders for instruction, but not all were of that sort, as the wonderful works of the period were sufficiently exciting to come to the ears of even Herod. Paul cannot be accused of ignorance, but was with Peter and James one of several who not only knew the new ideas but were well versed in the old ones. And those old ones are to be found in the Old Testament and in the Commentaries, in the Zohar, the Talmud, and the other works and sayings of the Jews, all of which built up a body of dogma accepted by the people and the Rabbis. Hence sayings of Jesus, of Paul, and others have to be viewed with the well-known and never-disputed doctrines of the day held down to the present time, borne well in mind so as to make passages clear and show what was tacitly accepted. Jesus himself said that he intended to uphold and buttress the law, and that law was not only the matter found in the book the Christian theologians saw fit to accept, but also in the other authorities of which all except the grossly unlearned were cognizant. So when we find Herod listening to assertions that John or Jesus was this, that, or the other prophet or great man of olden time, we know that he was with the people speculating on the doctrine of reincarnation or "coming back", and as to who a present famous person may have been in a former life. Given as it is in the Gospels as a mere incident, it is very plain that the matter was court gossip in which long philosophical arguments were not indulged in, but the doctrine was accepted and then personal facts gone into for amusement as well as for warning to the king. To an Eastern potentate such a warning would be of moment, as he, unlike a Western man, would think that a returning great personage would of necessity have not only knowledge but also power, and that if the people had their minds attracted to a new aspirant for the leadership they would be inflamed beyond control with the idea that an old prophet or former king had come back to dwell in another body with them. The Christians have no right, then, to excise the doctrine of reincarnation from their system if it was known to Jesus, if it was brought to his attention and was not condemned at all but tacitly accepted, and further, finally, if in any single case it was declared by Jesus as true in respect to any person. And that all this was the case can, I think, be clearly shown.

First for the Jews, from whom Jesus was born and to whom he said unequivocally he came as a missionary or reformer. The Zohar is a work of great weight and authority among the Jews. In II, 199 b, it says that "all souls are subject to revolutions". This is metempsychosis or a'leen b'gilgoola; but it declares that "men do not know the way they have been judged in all time". That is, in their "revolutions" they lose a complete memory of the acts that have led to judgment. This is precisely the Theosophical doctrine. The Kether Malkuth says, "If she, the soul, be pure, then she shall obtain favor . . . but if she hath been defiled, then she shall wander for a time in pain and despair . . .

until the days of her purification". If the soul be pure and if she comes at once from God at birth, how could she be defiled? And where is she to wander if not on this or some other world until the days of her purification? The Rabbis always explained it as meaning she wandered down from Paradise through many revolutions or births until purity was regained.

Under the name of "Din Gilgol Neshomes" the doctrine of reïncarnation is constantly spoken of in the Talmud. The term means "the judgment of the revolutions of the souls". And Rabbi Manassa, son of Israel, one of the most revered, says in his book Nishmath Hayem: "The belief or the doctrine of the transmigration of souls is a firm and infallible dogma accepted by the whole assemblage of our church with one accord, so that there is none to be found who would dare to deny it . . . Indeed, there is a great number of sages in Israel who hold firm to this doctrine so that they made it a dogma, a fundamental point of our religion. We are therefore in duty bound to obey and to accept this dogma with acclamation . . . as the truth of it has been incontestably demonstrated by the Zohar and all books of the Kåbalists."

These demonstrations hold, as do the traditions of the old Jews, that the soul of Adam reïncarnated in David, and that on account of the sin of David against Uriah it will have to come again in the expected Messiah. And out of the three letters ADM, being the name of the first man, the Talmudists always made the names Adam, David, and Messiah. Hence this in the Old Testament: "And they will serve Jhvh their God and David their king whom I shall reawaken for them." That is, David reïncarnates again for the people. Taking the judgment of God on Adam "for dust thou art and unto dust thou shalt return", the Hebrew interpreters said that since Adam had sinned it was necessary for him to reïncarnate on earth in order to make good the evil committed in his first existence; so he comes as David, and later is to come as Messiah. The same doctrine was always applied by the Jews to Moses, Seth, and Abel, the latter spelt Habel. Habel was killed by Cain, and then to supply the loss the Lord gave Seth to Adam; he died, and later on Moses is his reïncarnation as the guide of the people, and Seth was said by Adam to be the reïncarnation of Habel. Cain died and reïncarnated as Yethrokorah, who died, the soul waiting till the time when Habel came back as Moses and then incarnated as the Egyptian who was killed by Moses; so in this case Habel comes back as Moses, meets Cain in the person of the Egyptian, and kills the latter.

Similarly it was held that Bileam, Laban, and Nabal were reïncarnations of the one soul or individuality. And of Job it was said that he was the same person once known as Thara, the father of Abraham; by which they explained the verse of Job (ix, 21), "Though I were perfect, yet would I not know my own soul", to mean that he would not recognize himself as Thara.

All this is to be had in mind in reading Jeremiah, "Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee; and before thou camest out of the womb I sanctified thee"; or in Romans ix, v. 11, 13, after telling that Jacob and Esau being not yet born, "Jacob have I loved and Esau have I hated"; or the ideas of the people that "Elias was yet to first come"; or that some of the prophets were there in Jesus or John; or when Jesus asked the disciples "Whom do men think that I am?" There cannot be the slightest doubt, then, that among the Jews for ages and down to the time of Jesus the ideas above outlined prevailed universally. Let us now come to the New Testament.

St. Matthew relates in the eleventh chapter the talk of Jesus on the subject of John, who is declared by him to be the greatest of all, ending in the 14th verse thus:

And if ye will receive it, this is Elias which was for to come.

Here he took the doctrine for granted, and the "if" referred not to any possible doubts on that but simply as to whether they would accept his designation of John as Elias. In the 17th chapter he once more takes up the subject thus:

10. And his disciples asked him saying, Why, then, say the scribes that Elias must first come? And Jesus answered and said unto them; Elias truly shall first come and restore all things. But I say unto you that Elias is come already, and they knew him not but have done to him whatsoever they listed. Likewise shall also the Son of Man suffer of them. Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist.

The statement is repeated in Mark, chapter ix, v. 13, omitting the name of John. It is nowhere denied. It is not among any of the cases in which the different Gospels contradict each other; it is in no way doubtful. It is not only a reference to the doctrine of reïncarnation, but is also a clear enunciation of it. It goes much further than the case of the man who was born blind, when Jesus heard the doctrine referred to but did not deny it nor condemn it in any way, merely saying that the cause in that case was not for sin formerly committed, but for some extraordinary purpose, such as the case of the supposed dead man when he said that the man was not dead but was to be used to show his power over disease. In the latter one he perceived there was one so far gone to death that no ordinary person could cure him, and in the blind man's case the incident was like it. If he thought the doctrine pernicious, as it must be if untrue, he would have condemned it at the first coming up, but not only did he fail to do so, he distinctly himself brought it up in the case of John, and again when asking what were the popular notions as to himself under the prevailing doctrines as above shown. Matthew xvi, v. 13, will do as an example, as the different writers do not disagree, thus :

When Jesus came into the coasts of Cesarea Phillipi he asked his disciples, Who do men say that I am? And they said, Some say that thou art John the Baptist, some Elias, and others Jeremias or one of the prophets.

This was a deliberate bringing-up of the old doctrine, to which the disciples replied, as all Jews would, without any dispute of the matter of reïncarnation ; and the reply of Jesus was not a confutation of the notion, but a distinguishing of himself from the common lot of sages and prophets by showing himself to be an incarnation of God and not a reïncarnation of any saint or sage. He did not bring it up to dispute and condemn as he would and did do in other matters ; but to the very contrary he evidently referred to it so as to use it for showing himself as an incarnate God. And following his example the disciples never disputed on that ; they were all aware of it ; St. Paul must have held it when speaking of Esau and Jacob ; St. John could have meant nothing but that in Revelations, chap. iii, v. 12.

Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out.

Evidently he had gone out before or the words "no more" could have no place or meaning. It was the old idea of the exile of the soul and the need for it to be purified by long wandering before it could be admitted as a "pillar in the temple of God". And until the ignorant ambitious monks after the death of Origen had gotten hold of Christianity, the doctrine must have enobled the new movement. Later the council of Constantinople condemned all such notions directly in the face of the very words of Jesus, so that at last it ceased to vibrate as one of the chords, until finally the prophecy of Jesus that he came to bring a sword and division and not peace was fulfilled by the warring nations of Christian lands who profess him in words but by their acts constantly deny him whom they call "the meek and lowly".

LITERARY NOTES.

DECEMBER THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XXI" continues the copious attention given to Mr. Stainton Moses and the spirit messages he received, but space is found for four passing references to H. P. B., one of them as a "psychic". "The Truth of Astrology" is a most remarkable case of correct horoscope in the Bhrigusambhita leaves. "Idealism" is a very able and profound article, though somewhat contradictory at times. "N.D.K." states some important facts which acquit H.P.B. of Mr. Sinnett's charge that she extorted private papers from a recipient and then used them in the Secret Doctrine, and then contributes valuably to the Mars and Mercury discussion. "Theosophy and Indian Social Reform" is a trifle vague, but seems to be pointing aright. "Modern Indian Magic and Magicians" narrates a singular instance of obsession and its cure, and also two cases of Ashtavadanam, the faculty of doing eight different things at the same time.—[A.F.]

DECEMBER LUCIFER. The fine article on "Ancient Egypt" is concluded. "Building for Eternity" is by Mr. Mead, and expands one's conception of his own expanding soul. It quotes too much, but is vigorous and warm and telling. Mrs. Vera Johnston, H.P.B.'s niece, begins a weird, Frankenstein-like story of great power. Che-Yew-Tsang's second paper, "Some Modern Failings", is one of the most delightful things ever appearing in Lucifer,—or, indeed, anywhere. Common-sense, bright, even at times sparkling, full of thought and wisdom and practical tuition, it arouses envy of the magazine which has such a contributor. One unfortunate assertion mars it,—that thought on another's fault draws elementals which arouse the same fault in the critic. This is to say that elementals can force one to become what one dislikes! Besides, how do we correct our faults but by observing their nature as displayed by others? Yet one slip does not much damage so noble a paper. "The Mahayana as taught by Buddha" is short and of small consequence. That "all things are mind itself" is one of those fanciful extravagances not likely to delude heads called in America "level". Mrs. Frederica Macdonald has rallied from Mr. Mead's gentle chastisement and begun to misrepresent again. Neither the brimstone lake of Scripture nor the mild exposure of Lucifer seems adequate to affright that hardy soul. There is a certain dexterity in her fibs, as well as a neat literary expression, evidencing long and assiduous culture. "Honor to whom honor is due", but let us not forget the same Apostle's advice in Colossians III, 9th—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI, No. 14, is "A Word on Man, his Nature, and his Powers", a lecture delivered by Mrs. Besant on the steamer to India, most happily taken down by a stenographer on board, most happily printed by the T.P.S. as one of its issues. Of course it is grand, noble, full of grace and truth, and the Great Soul speaks throughout in all its majesty and beauty. Oh that the Indian lectures could all be thus taken down and preserved for posterity!—[A.F.]

LIGHT OF THE EAST for November contains a singularly sensible article on the T.S. and the way in which Hindus regard it, giving it most generous credit for its great work in the West. Possibly, however, some readers may doubt whether it is "known to every good Theosophist" that Damodar and Subba Rao and "a whole host of others" were "far more spiritually advanced than the Madame herself". The final paragraph is very funny,—except to Mr. Sinnett and Col. Olcott, whose respective assertions as to Mars and H.P.B.'s ignorance of reincarnation are airily disposed of in most Occidental manner. "They will blaze out in good time", winds up jauntily the writer. On page 67 is a pungent rebuke to such as think Brahm to be unconscious.—[A.F.]

THE AUSTRAL THEOSOPHIST is a sixteen-paged monthly to be issued by the Victorian Theosophical League, Austral Buildings, Collins st. East, Melbourne, for the service of Theosophy in Australasia. It expects contributions from England, America, and India, and will give the notes, reviews, and discussions fitting its mission. The price through Australasia is sixpence a month or six shillings a year; price elsewhere is not stated. It begins in January, 1894.

THE IRISH THEOSOPHIST has added four pages to its size and two-pence to its cost. It is to give special attention to Theosophy for children, and cordially commends the Lotus Circles of America.

BORDERLAND for January has the usual large and varied collection of papers, Hypnotism and Spiritism having special space. In the Theosophical section a most generously ample review is given to the Countess Wachtmeister's book, with copious quotation. It is certainly a great thing for Theosophy at this date that it possesses the fair treatment and even kindly notice of a man so eminent as Mr. Stead, one, too, who so clearly perceives that that cannot be charlatanism which is beloved by a soul with the unsurpassed truthfulness, sincerity, and intelligence of Annie Besant.—[A. F.]

THE SANDUSKY REGISTER of December 31st gives over two columns to a verbatim report of Mrs. Edith Lockwood's essay before the Cincinnati T.S. upon "The Seven Planes of the Universe and the Relation they bear to the Seven Principles in Man".

THE STRIKE AT SHANE'S is the prize story of the American Humane Education Society, and tells how the animals on a farm successfully struck to obtain better treatment. The moral of kindness to animals is good for humans of every age, and is admirably impressed by this well-done tale.

ASTROLOGY, by Walter R. Old, is a series of three lectures delivered before the Mylapur Literary Society of Madras, followed by a horoscope of Queen Victoria and predictions about her up to October, 1895, at which date her demise is hinted at as probable. It is an able book, erudite, written in Mr. Old's accomplished style, not extravagant in its claims, and in some places, as in the treatment of free-will, of excellent argument. Page 22 is more than fine; it is eloquent. The book is stronger as an exposition of Astrology than as a defense of it; for the attempt to prove that the incidents of human life are caused, or even signified, by stellar relations presents logical difficulties appalling to all but the most sanguine natures. Mr. Old gives many singular instances of correct prediction, yet these are merely curious until we know their proportion to incorrect prediction. Has any writer ever furnished such? Astrology will always have attraction for the poetic and the imaginative, but more prosaic minds will be as little likely to seek history and biography in planetary space as to extract sunbeams from cucumbers. Hence the hope of displacing the Government Meteorological Bureau by an Astrological is slim indeed.—[A. F.]

TRANSACTIONS OF THE SCOTTISH LODGE T S, PART IX.—This number is at hand and is extremely valuable and interesting. This Lodge has in it such men as Brodie-Innes. It is a Christian Lodge. This Transaction deals with Zodiacs, Astronomy, and Astrology, giving also some very fine plates of ancient Zodiacs, for which alone it is valuable. Price is sixpence, but this number will be about fifty cents, as the plates are extra. The articles distinctly show the immense antiquity of the Indian and Egyptian Zodiac, and incidentally one must see that the Christian religion merely depicts old sun worship. However we have no desire to convert the Scottish Lodge. The work of the Lodge is accurate, regular, and workmanlike, with very small deviations from the plan on the board.

TRANSACTIONS OF THE LONDON LODGE, No. 19 is by Mr. A. P. Sinnett, and upon "The Pyramids and Stonehenge". Mr. Sinnett's contention is that disclosures from the Astral Light by competent Seers show that Adepts departing from Atlantis settled in Egypt and long ruled it as Adept-Kings, the greater pyramids being erected under their supervision about 200,000 years ago, for initiations as well as the preservation of certain valuable objects of occult character from dangers of earthquake or submergence. Yet the pyramids were under water during one great subsidence of that part of Egypt. Stonehenge was built by Adepts from Atlantis much later, 100,000 years ago, and for a simple public worship, in contrast with the luxury of the deserted Atlantis. The massive stones there, in the pyramids, and at Baalbec were not raised by mechanical process, but by levitation through occult knowledge. Some of the ceremonies at Stonehenge, clairvoyantly revealed, are described. The lecture is most instructive, and is of course in the charming style which makes Mr. Sinnett so envied. As H.P.B. several times said these things, substantially, of Stonehenge and Pyramid, this is not the first promulgation of the idea.

Mirror of the Movement.

AMERICA.

MR. BURCHAM HARDING arrived at Buffalo, N. Y., December 20th, and attended a meeting of the Saturn Club, one of the leading social clubs. Mr. Hodgson lectured upon the "Destructive work of the Psychical Research Society," fifty minutes out of the hour being occupied by a repetition of his worn out so-called "exposure" of H. P. Blavatsky. At the close of the lecture Mr. Harding was allowed to reply, after which questions about Theosophy were put until midnight. The only subsequent reference to the lecture was made by a Spiritualist who contradicted what Mr. Hodgson had stated. The following evening Mr. Hodgson addressed the Liberal Club at their monthly banquet, and again Mr. Harding was allowed to follow him on Theosophy. We must be deeply grateful to Mr. Hodgson for advertising Theosophy, for as the result of his efforts the Universalist Church opened the pulpit on the following Sunday, and there are now three classes at work in Buffalo studying Theosophy. On December 31st at Rochester Mr. Harding occupied the Unitarian pulpit in the morning, addressed the People's Ethical Society in the afternoon, and spoke at the Second Universalist Church in the evening, all three places being crowded. On January 7th he occupied the pulpit at the First Universalist Church at Rochester, and spoke in the evening in the City Hall on "Universal Brotherhood." Three large classes (about fifty persons) are formed to study Theosophy in Rochester, the classes at Rochester and Buffalo working as Branches of the League of Theosophical Workers. On January 10th Mr. Harding lectured before the Saturn Club at Buffalo. On January 14th at Albany, N. Y., occupied the pulpit of the First Christian Church both morning and evening. On the fifteenth he attended, by invitation, the monthly meeting at Albany of the Universalist pastors of the surrounding district. They seemed greatly interested in Theosophy, asking questions, for nearly two hours, and it will probably lead to their studying the subject.

CLAUDE FALLS WRIGHT lectured before the Chicago Branch November 19th on "Occultism in Daily Life". November 20th he attended a conversazione at the rooms of the Society. November 22d he addressed the Toledo Branch. November 23d he lectured in Lotus Hall, Toledo, on "The Mission of the Theosophical Society". "Reincarnation" was the subject of his address the next night, Friday. Saturday he lectured on "Occultism". Sunday, November 26th, on "Dreams". Monday he addressed the Toledo Society on "H.P.B." Tuesday he gave the Branch some practical hints for its working. On Wednesday he addressed a meeting of the members of the Columbus, Ohio, Branch in Dr. Henderson's rooms. Friday, December 1st, he lectured at the Y.M.C.A. rooms on "Theosophy". "Reincarnation" was the subject of his address the next night in the same hall. Sunday, December 3d, he lectured three times; morning and evening at the Universalist Church, Columbus, on "Theosophy", and in the afternoon in the Masonic rooms on "H.P.B." On Tuesday, December 5th, he addressed the Cincinnati Branch on "Dealings with the Dead". Wednesday he left for Memphis. On Thursday, December 7th, he addressed a meeting of the Memphis Branch at the Peabody Hotel.

Friday he lectured on "Occult Development" at the Lumber Exchange Building. In Mrs. Pittman's drawing rooms the next night he lectured before the Branch on "The Masters". "The Basic Principles of Theosophy" was the topic of an address on Friday at the Lumber Exchange Building. On Monday, December 18th, he delivered an address in the Opera House, Vicksburg, Miss., on "Theosophy". Tuesday he addressed meetings in the afternoon and evening at the Carroll Hotel. On Wednesday, December 20th, he lectured on "Occultism" at the Commercial Club Rooms, and the next day he left for New Orleans. Friday, December 22d, he addressed a meeting of the New Orleans Society in Mrs. Gehl's drawing rooms. December 23d he delivered a public lecture on "Theosophy" at the Woman's Club. Sunday evening he addressed another meeting of the members of the Society. Christmas Day he held a joint meeting of the Vyasa and Saraswati Branches. December 26th he delivered a public lecture on "Reincarnation". December 28th he lectured on "Occultism". December 29th he held a meeting of the Saraswati Branch to consider methods of work. December 30th he delivered a public lecture on "The Masters and H.P.B." On Sunday he addressed a meeting in Vicksburg, Miss., and on Tuesday, December 9th, he gave a public lecture on "H.P.B. and the Masters" in Memphis, Tenn. He then returned to New York.

CONVENTION, AMERICAN SECTION.

The Eighth Annual Convention of the American Section will be held on the twenty-second day of April, 1894, at the city of San Francisco, Cal., as decided by the Executive Committee. All the branches on the Pacific Coast have been consulted, and as former Conventions were held at Chicago, Boston, and New York, except the first one (which was very small) at Cincinnati, it seems wise and good to have this one at San Francisco. It will begin the second series of seven years for this Section. The General Secretary will attend from New York, and some others in the East have said they will try to arrange to go. A delegate is expected from London to represent Europe in the person of Mr. E. T. Hargrove, who has for some time been giving assistance at the London Headquarters.

All Branches in good standing are entitled to be represented by a delegate either from the Branch or appointed by it from the general membership. Delegate means also president, but presidents who are delegates should have the resolution of the Branch so appointing them. It is suggested as well that all Branches not able to send a delegate from their own list should appoint a delegate from among the California members, so that as many Branches as possible may be actually represented in person. The General Secretary, or Dr. Anderson, 1170 Market Street, San Francisco, or the Committee at 1504 Market Street, San Francisco, will furnish names of persons who would act as delegates in such cases. It will be well, therefore, to send to either of the said persons an open paper of delegation to be filled by them, or a delegation to some known persons there. But to prevent duplication of names it is better to leave to the Committee or Dr. Anderson or the General Secretary the filling in of names. The chief work of the Convention will be, outside of the usual routine business, to have a good series of meetings at which speakers will deal with Theosophy and Theosophical work.

As at the same time there will be held a Mid-Winter Fair, which, it is said, will have a Congress of Religions, the Pacific Committee of the T. S. has asked that the Society be represented therein, and we understand the application has been granted. This will have place on or about the days of the Convention, so that a series of interesting sessions no doubt will be held, thus giving a wider spread to the Theosophical movement there.

Reports from Branches should be in the hands of the General Secretary in time for him to condense and add to his report; they are not printed separately.

The programme will be made up next month, and it is expected to have the best speakers we can get to deal with Theosophical topics. One session will certainly be devoted to discussion of best branch work and propaganda.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

THE PACIFIC COAST COMMITTEE have issued to all Theosophists upon the Coast a very urgent appeal for the support of the Lecturer, expressing strongly his great services to the cause and the importance of continuing them. They say that through his work not a city or town of any size has failed to hear the truths of Theosophy, and that the press reports of his lectures have been invaluable. Certainly the sustentation of lectureships is one of the most effective works open to the American Section.

EUROPE.

ENGLISH LODGES report steady progress. Regular meetings, both for the public and for members, are being held with increased attendance during the winter months. North London Centre has been chartered as a Lodge, this making the eighth Lodge in the London district. Timely aid was given this new venture by a public meeting held in the neighborhood, at which Miss Stabler, of New York, and C. Collings, of Bow Lodge, lectured with considerable success.

LONDON HEADQUARTERS' STAFF is now convalescent. The work has never been interfered with in spite of persistent illness.

NORTH OF ENGLAND FEDERATION, T. S., will hold its third quarterly Conference at Manchester on February 3rd. A large gathering of Theosophists is expected, and it is hoped that both Mrs. Cooper-Oakley and G. R. S. Mead will be able to attend from Headquarters.

BERTRAM KEIGHTLEY is at present making a lecturing tour in the North of England. A correspondent writes from Manchester: "We have had the most interesting visit from Bertram Keightley. We had nearly seventy at our Lodge meeting (Manchester City) to hear him. His address was a treat." Equally good accounts come from other towns he has visited. Bradford, Harrogate, Leeds, and Middlesbrough will be the chief centers of his propagandist efforts.

THE BOW LODGE, London, have arranged to give a tea to 150 ragged children from the poorest part of their neighborhood—the poorest in London. The tea is to be followed by a Christmas tree, and it is hoped that besides the usual orange and fire-cracker it may be possible to give to each child some warm garment.

HOLLAND still shows increasing willingness to listen to anything that concerns Theosophy. One of the best known weekly papers in Amsterdam publishes the contents of the Dutch Theosophia, and has now asked for a regular contribution of Theosophical articles. Other newspapers make long extracts from the columns of our representative magazine, which was formerly tabooed by the press and the retail trade alike. The children's weekly meetings, held at the Amsterdam Headquarters, are now regularly attended by some forty-four children of from six to thirteen years of age. This far exceeds anything we can show on the same lines in England. T.

SWEDEN. In Sweden a good deal of work is being done. We hear that Mr. Tennes Algren goes about as he can speaking. In one place at the North he had 600 for audience. But as expenses are heavy and Sweden poor, he wants to get as many cancelled stamps as he can and sell them for the purpose of aiding the work. All members in the U.S. who wish to do so may send such old stamps to the address of Gabriel Magnusson, 404 West 48th st., New York City. This is a good work. Mr. Magnusson will forward them to his fellow countryman.

NOTICES.

WANTED.—An F.T.S. who wishes to complete a set of Lucifer makes the following proposition: For Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5 of Volume I, and Nos. 7 and 8 of Volume II, he will pay 50 cents per number, and in addition for each number thus secured will donate $1.00 for the support of the T.S. Or he will take Volumes I and II complete and pay 50 cents per number and contribute $10 to the support of the T.S.

Another F.T.S. desires to complete a set of the PATH and offers 50 cents each for the following numbers: Volume II, No. 10; Volume III, No. 4; Volume IV, Nos. 10 and 11. Information may be sent to the PATH Office.

INDEX TO PATH, 8 VOLS.

A complete Index to the first 8 volumes of PATH, ending with March, 1894, is being made up with great care. If a sufficient number of readers send in advance orders payable in March, or after notification, to justify the expense of publication, the Index will be issued at 50 cents in paper.

THE SUPPORT OF THE T.S.

Considering all the circumstances, I am very glad to report some gain during the past two months, although I am much disappointed in not being able to make the total amount at least $1,000 by the first of the New Year. If every subscriber to the Fund will take it upon himself to mention the matter to one or more members, I am confident that a very satisfactory increase can be made, and at once. I feel very certain that one reason why we have not advanced more rapidly is that a great many members either do not know of or do not understand the object of the Fund. To any such I wish to say: Write to me asking any questions you choose, and I will take only pleasure in explaining everything to you. I am deeply grateful to all who are coöperating with us, and I want to be grateful to a great many more.

My report to date is as follows :

New subscribers in the ten-cents-per-month class: R.F., C.E.S., H.E., A.M.T., B.L. Total, per year, $6.00.

New subscribers in the twenty-five-cents-per-month class: E.F.H., L.P. Total, per year, $6.00.

New subscriber in the fifty-cents-per-month class: C.M. Total, per year, $6.00.

New subscribers in the one-dollar-per-month class: Mr. and Mrs. W.T.P. Total, per year, $24.00.

Total subscribers previously reported, 68. New subscribers since, 10. New total, 78. Total value of fund, first year, previously reported, $809.85. Amount pledged by new subscribers, $42.00. Profits from sales of badges by me, $10.00. Total value of Fund, first year, to date, $861.85.

HEAVEN is long enduring and earth continues long. The reason why heaven and earth are able to endure and continue thus long is because they do not live of or for themselves. This is how they are able to endure. Therefore the sage puts his own person last, and yet it is found in the foremost place; he treats his person as if it were foreign to him, and yet that person is preserved.—Lao-tse.

THE SYMBOLISM OF THE UPANISHADS.

III.

THE third part of the Katha Upanishad continues the teaching of Death to Nachiketās, which has already been followed through the first two parts:

—Those who know the Eternal, the five fires, and the triple flame tell of the shadow and the light entering the cave through the long age, and drinking the reward of good deeds in the world.

No better sentence for illustrating the symbolism of the Upanishads could be chosen. The first words hardly need an explanation. They need, rather, realization in the inmost recesses of the heart. But who are the knowers or practicers of the five fires? These words allude to an ancient penance, when the ascetic stood bare-headed between four fires, in the blazing heat of the Indian sun. But this penance in itself is symbolical. The five fires are the five senses, or the five powers of sensation, which make up the phenomenal, illusory world; and it is the heat of these five fires of delusion which the true ascetic must learn to withstand. The knower of the triple flame is he who knows the Higher Self, the triple Ātmā, or the triad Ātmā, Buddhi, and Higher Manas; that is, Spirit, Soul, and pure reason. What, then, are the shadow and the light that these three tell the knower of the eternal, he who withstands the five fires of sense, and he who knows the triple flame of the Higher Self? We may discern the meaning by the words which follow. The shadow and the light enter the cave, or the hidden world, and enjoy for a long age the fruit of good deeds done in the world. The shadow and the light are, therefore, the Spirit, and its vehicle the soul, which, entering into the hidden world of Devachan after death, reap the good Karma of the past life.

— Let us teach to Nachiketâs what is the bridge of sacrificers, the unperishing Eternal, and the fearless shore of those who seek to pass over.

The bridge by which the sacrificers of self pass over to the shore where there is no fear, the resting-place of the unperishing Eternal, is the link between the Higher and the lower self; it is the latent power of the lower self to rise to the Higher Self, and thus to cross over from the outer world which is its field of life to the inner world of the Higher Self.

— Know that the Self (Atmâ) is the lord of the chariot; that the body (Sharîra) is the chariot; know that soul (Buddhi) is the charioteer; and that mind (Manas) is the rein.

They say that the organs (or impulses) are the horses; and the external world of objects is their road. As the self is yoked to mind and the impulses, the wise say the Self is the enjoyer. But he who is unwise, with mind not bound to the Self (that is, with lower Manas preponderant), his impulses are ungoverned, like the charioteer's unruly horses. But he who is wise, with mind ever bound to the Self (with higher Manas preponderant), his impulses are controlled like the charioteer's good horses.

In this simile of the chariot, Buddhi governs kama through Manas, under the inspiration of Atma. The reins are well in hand, the horses are controlled, when Manas is recipient of the light of Âtmâ, through the mediation of Buddhi; when the lower aspires to the Higher Self. It will be remembered that in the Bhagavad-Gîtâ Krishna is the charioteer or Buddhi.

— But who is unwise, unmindful, and ever impure, obtains not that resting-place (and goal); but falls back into the world of birth and death.

But he who is wise, mindful, and ever pure, he indeed reaches a resting-place from which he is not born again.

He who has wisdom for his charioteer, keeping mind well in hand, reaches the end of the path, the supreme resting-place of the evolving power.

The impulses are higher than the senses; mind (Manas) is higher than the impulses; soul (Buddhi) is higher than mind; and the Great Self (Mahâmâtmâ) is higher than Buddhi. Higher than this Great is the Unmanifested. Higher than the Unmanifested is the Logos (Purushas). Than the Logos none is higher; that is the prop, the Supreme Way.

The "unwise, unmindful" is again he whose lower mind (Manas) is not dominated by the Higher. For only with this domination and preponderance of the higher mind over the lower, by which the center of life passes from the lower mind dominated by desire (kama-manas) to the higher mind dominated by Spirit Soul (Âtmâ-Buddhi-Manas) is the final goal reached; for the center of life thus leaves a temporary and unstable dwelling for one that is eternal and fixed; and thus the end of the path is reached, the supreme seat of the power which evolves the worlds.

— The hidden Self does not shine forth in all beings; but is seen by the keen and subtle soul of subtle seers.

Let the wise man restrain voice (creative power) and mind; let him restrain them by the Self which is wisdom. Let him restrain this wisdom by the Self which is great; and this let him restrain in the Self which is peace.

This is the secret of the triple Self, the three-fold Âtmâ; its three sides are Wisdom, Power, and Peace. These correspond to the three sides of the Self, Sat, Chit, Ânanda, or Being, Consciousness, and Bliss, in the classification of the later Vedantins.

Then, having taught the final secret, the bridge across to the Great Beyond, and the way to cross over, and the nature of the Self that dwells on the other side, Death bids Nachiketas:

— "Awake, arise! having obtained thy wishes, understand them. The wise say the path is hard to traverse, like the keen edge of a razor". Then, having won the soundless, touchless, formless, unfading, the everlasting, that has neither taste nor smell, the beginningless, endless Eternal, that is beyond the Great, he is released from the mouth of Death.

And the Initiation is ended; the lesson of death is learned. The Upanishad concludes:

— This is the immemorial teaching declared by Death to Nachiketas. Declaring and hearing it, the wise grows great in the world of the Eternal. He who causes this supreme secret to be heard in the assembly of those who seek the Eternal, or at the time of the union with those who have gone forth builds for everlastingness; he builds for everlastingness.

A last word as to the meaning of this "union with those who have gone forth". The Sanskrit word used is Shrâddha, the yearly sacrifice to the spirits of ancestors in the ascending line; when the sacrificer is united in spirit to his forefathers in the other world. But the inner meaning is that union with spiritual ancestors in the ascending Guru parampara chain which is described in the last chapter of the "Idyll of the White Lotus". This union with the spirit of the Great Ones who have gone before is the Great Initiation, the theme of the "immemorial teaching of Death".

DIREFUL PROPHECIES.

THE whole mystic fraternity of Astrologers is now engaged in showing how the heavens portend great changes on this our earth. They agree with H.P.B., who said that her Eastern friends told her of coming cyclic changes now very near at hand. Beyond doubt there is some truth in all these sayings, although here and there the astrologers definitely prognostigating are not supported by fact. Sepharial, for instance, staked his reputation on the death of the Prince of Wales, which did not come off, and now where is the reputation? Just as good as ever, for astrologers know that either the judgment of the astrologer may be at fault from sundry causes, or that the birth-hour may be wrong, or that some saving aspect of the stars has been overlooked. Great earthquakes like that of Zante or the one in Kuchan come up, and the astrologers, while they regularly in those years foresaw earthquakes, did not seem able to locate them for any spot. They were afraid to say Persia for fear it might be in London. But earthquakes were foretold. A steady prognostication of disturbance has been indulged in, and this general outlook would seem right. The disturbances were expected in the realm of mind, morals, and religion by those true astrologers who seldom speak, and the increase of crime like that of bomb-throwing justifies each month the general prediction. Seismic disturbance is the physical sign of disturbance in the moral, psychic, and mental fields. This is an old axiom in the East. In the record of the earthquake said to have taken place when Jesus died we have the Christian reflection of the same idea.

That earthquakes, floods, and great social changes would go on increasing has been known to Theosophists since the day Tom Paine saw psychically "a new order of things for the human race opening in the affairs of America", before the revolution. And ever since the increment of disaster has been great. The motto adopted by the makers of the Union—"A new order of ages"—was an echo from the realm of soul to the ears of men on earth. It marked a point in the cycle. The record of the disasters during the years since then would be found appalling. It takes in Asia and Europe, and would show millions of sudden deaths by violent earth-convulsions. And now in 1894 even Herbert Spencer, looking at the mental and social fields of human life, says in a magazine article:

A nation of which the legislators vote as they were bid and of which the workers surrender their rights of selling their labor where they please has neither the ideas nor the sentiments needed for the maintenance of liberty. . . . We are on the way back to the rule of the strong hand in the shape of the bureaucratic despotism of a socialistic organization and then of the military despotism which must follow it; if, indeed, some social crash does not bring the latter upon us more quickly.

Evidently this deeply philosophical and statistical writer feels the pressure in the atmosphere of social and material life. There is much unconscious prophecy in what he says. Earthquakes and deaths from them are dreadful, but they can be avoided when their probable place is known. But social earthquakes, moral pestilence, mental change belong to man, go with him where he goes; and cannot be averted by any alteration of place.

In the Illustrated American a writer on astrology gives definite prophecy of disaster. He erects a figure of the heavens for noon of November 12, 1894, showing a conjunction of Sun, Uranus, Venus, and Mercury in Scorpio, with Saturn only fifteen degrees away. Astrologically this is very bad. With the moon at the full in Taurus—the bull—it is ominous of floods and earthquakes. But we may add that in the psychic Zodiac it shows floods and heaving in the moral and social structure of the poor orphan man. Uranus and Saturn are bad planets anyway; they are erratic and heavy, subtle, dark, and menacing. This writer predicts ominously, but remains indefinite as to place. We will add that dying nations like those of Persia and China will feel most whatever physical effects shall be due; and in Europe, while there will be physical disturbance, the greater trouble will be in the social and governmental structures.

The astrologer then runs forward to December 30, 1901, when he says six planets will be in one sign and in a line, with a seventh opposite on the same line projected. This, it is said by such an ancient sage as Berossus, will bring a flood when it takes place in the zodiacal sign Capricornus, as is to be the case in 1901.

Many Theosophists believe these prognostications, others deride them. The former ask what shall we do? Nothing. Stay where you are. If you remove, it is more than likely you will run into the jaws of a blacker fate. Do your duty where you find yourself, and if from your goodness you are a favorite of the gods you will escape, while if you are not their favorite it is better for you to die and take another chance at bettering your character. Death will come when it will, and why should we fear, since it is "a necessary end". Theosophists too often occupy themselves with these woful lookings into the future, to the detriment of their present work. They should try to discover the fine line of duty and endeavor, leaving the astrologers of to-day, who are more at sea than any other mystics, to con over a zodiac that is out of place and calculate with tables which delude with the subtle power that figures have to lie when the basis of calculation is wrong.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE.

A NOTE ON REINCARNATION.

IT is possible that since in our Western thought there is a good deal of hesitation about accepting the idea of reincarnation, involving, as it does usually, the belief in a previous objective state of existence of which no direct evidence can be offered and no memory remains, much might be done towards making the way plain by more constantly insisting on the simple fact of incarnation. Once people begin to think of themselves as dual entities, part physical and part non-physical, and of the non-physical being incarnated in the flesh in the ordinary course of Nature's providence, the further idea of a repetition of the process will easily creep into acceptance. Christians cannot reject incarnation in respect of Jesus of Nazareth. By-and-bye they will apply it to themselves. Belief in reincarnation will follow naturally. Let us teach that we are descended from the right hand of the Father, and that our destiny lies upward again towards that everlasting seat.

I have not met in my Theosophical reading any treatment of one aspect of reincarnation which has impressed me in considering the objection of failure of memory of past lives. While not a linguist I have devoted some attention to languages, and have been interested in many curious facts concerning idioms, and in the complete representation of ideas obtained in translating from one language to another. In the first place take the Irse, or Irish Keltic. The idiom requires that in giving expression to sensations such as hunger, thirst, fear, happiness, etc., the verb is used with prepositional pronouns. "I fear" would in Irish be literally expressed as "Fear is on me;" "I am hungry" as "Hunger is on me"; "I wish it" as "It is a wish with me". In the other case, take the salutations of various nations. We ask "How do you do?" or "Howdy?" according to our academic or provincial training. The Frenchman enquires "How do you carry yourself?" The German wonders "How goes it?"; and the Chinese "Have you eaten rice?" All these indicate the same underlying idea, but a different method in each case of conceiving and expressing it.

I do not purpose discussing the question of the possibility of conceiving an idea without giving it formal expression, but it is undeniable that the average man cannot think without words; he cannot have ideas until he has the means of expressing them. This is admitted by those who declare the English language deficient in terms fit to convey the force of the metaphysical conceptions found in the Sanscrit. Interesting light is also thrown on the subject in connection with the training of blind deaf-mutes, to whom a form or vehicle of expression is indispensable before reason manifests itself. The brain must be taught or trained to recognize certain symbols, either of form or of sound, before it can become a medium for the conveyance or expression of ideas.

But most of us speak only one language, and that English. We cannot understand a person speaking in a strange tongue, however clearly he conceives his idea in his own mind. The unfamiliar sounds convey nothing to the brain. Could one's brain respond directly to another's brain vibration, mere language would be unnecessary. It is probable that the idea would be transmitted directly without the circumlocution of mouth and ear. This appears to be indicated by what is called thought-transference, varied in Mr. W. T. Stead's experience of automatic writing.

Confined, then, as we are to one language for the recognition of ideas, and that a language scarcely four hundred years old, doubtfully intelligible even in Chaucer, it seems unreasonable to suppose that we could recognize the ideas we formed in the language of another birth until at least we were familiar with the language we actually used in that previous existence, or until such a cultivation of the brain had been successfully undertaken as would permit the direct reception of thought impressions from the astral matrix. Neither can it be denied that this is the case, since we all have ideas "occurring" to us, as we say, for which we cannot account, and which have no apparent origin in our immediate surroundings. May they not be a direct survival from other lives in which they had been promulgated in the speech of the nation and period to which we then belonged? This we could not deny or affirm in the absence of familiarity with the forgotten language. It would be of interest to make enquiry among linguists, especially among those versed in the dead languages of all ages, as to whether any of these old tongues presented readier channels of thought than others, or than the present mother-tongue.

It is evident that the most important point is the necessity of clearly conceiving ideas in themselves, rather than their aspects presented by idiom, or by the varying expression of different languages and thinkers. This of course involves the practice of concentration and the development and control of imagination, the creative faculty on the mental plane.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

GEORGE EDWARD WRIGHT is an American and is now President of the Chicago T.S and the Central States Committee for T.S. work. He was born at Perrysburgh, Ohio, April 13th, 1851. His father, who was prominent in educational circles and author of several school-books, died in 1853, leaving a widow with four young children to support by her own exertions. This she did by teaching, and gave them a good education. George took a classical course at Beloit College and Cornell University. Upon leaving college he took up journalism as a profession, and in 1871 went to Chicago where he served as a reporter on several of the city papers, receiving promotion and recognition finally upon the Chicago Tribune. He represented this important daily at Philadelphia throughout the Centennial Exhibition in 1876, and the following year went to Europe as war correspondent, representing the Chicago Tribune, the New York Times, and the Cincinnati Commercial during the Russo-Turkish war. Returning, he served upon the editorial staff of the Tribune. In 1879 he married, and becoming dissatisfied with newspaper work retired from journalism permanently. In 1882 he founded the Chicago Stock Exchange, and was elected its first Secretary. This institution, keeping pace with Chicago's remarkable growth, has become immensely successful, and he has remained an active member ever since.

In 1886 the tragic death of a brother with unusual phenomena attending it drew his attention towards Occultism, and he began reading in that line, accumulating in this way one of the largest and most valuable occult libraries in the country. Taking up the study of chiromancy, physiognomy, astrology, and kindred sciences, he soon drifted into Theosophical literature, and there found the first really satisfactory solutions to the problems of life. He immediately joined the Theosophical Society, and has been unswervingly devoted to its welfare from that day. During the months of 1889-90, when the newspapers, especially of Chicago, were filled with abuse of Madame Blavatsky, Brother Wright kept conspicuously posted upon his desk in his public office the following notice :

H. P. BLAVATSKY !

Let the journalistic sots continue to slander, and all the little hounds and reptiles to assail! The time will come when her name will be vindicated and her philosophy appreciated.

Strong words these, but the provocation was great. And how soon has the prophecy been verified!

In 1892 Brother Wright undertook with the General Secretary to secure a place for the T.S. in the World's Parliament of Religions, with what success our readers are aware. He was appointed Chairman of the Committee of Organization, and worked faithfully until our Congress was finished and successful. At our various Conventions he has labored hard with the rest. We thought distant members might like to see the face of the Chairman of the local Committee of our Congress, and this is it.

THE FUNDAMENTAL BELIEFS OF BRAHMANISM IN CHRISTIANITY.

MOKSHA Shastra, or the Science of Emancipation or Salvation, is divided into three kinds ; namely, Karma Yoga, Gnana Yoga, and Bhakti Yoga. This three-fold division is found in the Buddhistic writings. It is not unknown to the New Testament writers. We read in I. Corinthians, chapter xii, 8 : "To some is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom ; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit ; to another faith by the same Spirit".

2. To all of these systems the observance of the moral and ceremonial laws is necessary. The Ten Laws are called by the Brahmins the Dasa Dharma ; they are called by the Buddhists the Dasa Sila ; by the Christians they are called the Ten Commandments.

3. According to the Brahmins the cause of Sainsara or the misery of rebirth is Avidya or Ignorance. The Buddhists believe in the same doctrine. In Christianity we find a similar notion. We read in Ephesians, "We are alienated from God through ignorance and vanity of our minds".

4. To dispel ignorance the Brahmins and the Christians agree that we must renounce selfishness and the love of worldly objects.

5. The 'cause of misery, according to the Brahmins, is Avidya, which is defined in the Yoga Philosophy as the mistaking of non-eternal, impure, and painful things for eternal, pure, and pleasurable things. It is the mistaking the carnal for the spiritual, or the loving of the worldly objects instead of the soul. An allusion to this doctrine of the Yoga Philosophy is found in the New Testament. In Colossians, chap. ii, we read, "Why as though living in the world are ye subject to the ordinances? Touch not, taste not, handle not; which are all to perish with the using, after the commandments and doctrines of men; which things have, indeed, a show of wisdom in humility and neglecting the body". In Romans we read that the cause of sin is the phronema sarkos, or the lust of the flesh. We are told that the carnal mind is in enmity against God and cannot please God. The Greek phrase phronema sarkos is in Sanskrit sarirabhimana.

6. The universal laws of Causation and Evolution, which play a very important part in the writings of the Brahmans and Buddhists. are not opposed to the doctrines of Christianity.

7. The word which Sanskrit and Pali writers use to express Rebirth by Karma is punarganmo. In the New Testament we find the word paliggenesia is used to express Regeneration. As the word paliggenesia (Regeneration) is a derivative of the Sanskrit word punarganma, we may presume that the New Testament writers used the Greek word paliggenesia (regeneration) to express the doctrine of Rebirth by Karma.

8. Brahmins and the Buddhists are all opposed to a belief in blind faith or simple dogmas. We read in the New Testament, "Prove all things and hold fast to that which is good".

9. Bhakti Yoga or the doctrine of Sanctification by Faith plays a very important part in the Sacred Books of the Brahmins and the Buddhists. In the New Testament pistis (Faith), which is a derivation of Bhakti, plays the same important part.

10. The definition of Yoga according to the Yoga philosophy is the suppression or stopping of the constant changes of the mental states. In the New Testament we are told that the Soul finds rest when it is in a blissful state. Christ says "Take up my yoke and you will find rest". This is simply a translation of the second Sutra of the Yoga philosophy.

11. The doctrines of the Sermon on the Mount are beautifully summed up in the Yoga philosophy. According to it the surest way to attain enlightenment is:

1. To love happiness.
2. To pity the miserable.
3. To take pleasure in the practice of virtue.
4. To disregard vice.

12. The following two stanzas, which have been taken and translated by the Buddhists and Christians, beautifully express the truths of Brahminism.

1. To abstain from evil, and to be constantly virtuous ; to do good and to lead an excellent life ; this is in fact the surest way to obtain emancipation.

2. Let no one do to another that which he will not like to be done unto himself. This, in short, is the duty or virtue which is binding upon all, though one may practice other things or not.

13. India was not an unknown land to the early Christians. There was some sort of commerce between Palestine and India. According to Eusebius and other early Christian Church historians, there were Christian churches in India, founded by St. Bartholomew and St. Thomas at Calimine. The word Calimine may be derived either from Chola Mane or Kairanini or Triplicane near Madras. The Syrian Christians of India call their saint Marthoma. The word Christ may be derived from either of the two Sanskrit words, Chrishna or Sreshta. In the New Testament the word Chrestos is translated "easy", as in the phrase "my yoke is easy". As every one knows, there is a good deal of resemblance between the lives of Chrishna and Christ.

14. In the New Testament the word Gospel does not always mean the life of Christ. When used by Christ himself the word must mean something other than his own life. The Greek word which is translated Gospel is euaggelion and literally means a good message. It exactly corresponds to the Sanskrit word agama used in the Yoga philosophy in a similar sense. The Sanskrit word used in the Yoga philosophy to express "universal" is savanabhūma or that which belongs to all countries or kingdoms. Therefore the Gospel of the Kingdom which Christ preached is the Universal Moral Laws. Again, the phrase "Gospel of the Kingdom" exactly corresponds to the Sanskrit phrase "Raja Vidya" used in the Bhagavad-Gîtâ. Again, the Greek word which is translated angel is aggelos. This word exactly corresponds to the Sanskrit word Sma Agatos or Sugatas or Tathagatas or Mahâtmas or those who bring good news. It is thus clear that while Buddha preached the Four Noble Truths or Chatur Vyahas, Christ preached the Gospel of the Kingdom, or the Universal Moral Laws or Yamas.

IMMENSE ANTIQUITY OF AMERICA.

NO. II.

THERE were, scattered over the three Americas, remnants of departed civilizations, about which the natives discovered by Europeans knew little or nothing. Some of these monuments betoken an extreme age. Concerning those in Central America Baldwin said :<sup>1</sup>

No well-considered theory of these ruins can avoid the conclusion that most of them are very ancient, and that, to find the origin of the civilization they represent, we must go far back into the "deeps of antiquity". . . .

I refer to it (Catlin's Lifted and Subsided Rocks of America) on account of the very great antiquity it claims for the ancient American civilization. It represents that the advanced human development whose crumbling monuments are studied at Copán, Mitla, and Palenque antedate everything else in the human period of our globe, excepting, perhaps, an earlier time of barbarism and pastoral simplicity ; that its history goes back through all the misty ages of prehistoric time to an unknown date previous to the beginning of such civilization in any part of the Old World. It is hardly possible to make it more ancient.

From this it would seem that America, rather than India, furnished the cradle. The traditions of the people go back quite a ways. According to l'Abbé Brasseur de Bourbourg :<sup>2</sup>

These traditions, traces of which are also to be met with in México, Central America, Perú, and Bolivia, point to the conclusion that man existed in these various countries at the time of the upheaval of the Cordilleras, and that the memory of that upheaval has been preserved.

That such an event must have taken place in a remote age is best understood by the geologist. Nadaillac was willing to admit that "Undoubtedly America bears witness to a venerable past", "without", he said,<sup>3</sup>

Admitting the claims of some recent authors, who are of the opinion that when Europe was inhabited by wandering savages, whose only weapons were roughly-hewn stone, America was peopled by men who built cities, raised monuments, and had attained to a high degree of culture.

Turning now to recognized geology, we find man given place in America in the Pliocene—perhaps the Miocene—age, as great an antiquity as he is assigned in the Old World. In California, a portion of which, according to the Secret Doctrine,<sup>4</sup> belonged to

Atlantis, numerous discoveries have been made which show man to have lived in that region in the most remote times. A fossil skull was found deep under the base of Table Mountain in Calaveras county, the whole mountain having been formed since the man to whom it belonged died. This is, as said by Prof. Winchell :<sup>1</sup>

By far the best authenticated instance of Pliocene man which has been brought to light. There is only a presumption which weighs against it ; the skull is not inferior to that of existing races.

But as he acknowledged, presumption must not be arrayed against fact. Prof. Whitney, who made this discovery to become so well known, said in an address at Cambridge, Mass., April 27, 1878 :

So far as human and geological evidence can go, there is no question but the skull was found under Table Mountain, and is of Pliocene age.

In 1872 he had written :<sup>2</sup>

Evidence is now accumulated to such extent that I feel no hesitation in saying that we have now unequivocal proofs of the existence of man on the Pacific Coast prior to the glacial period, prior to the period of the mastodon and the elephant, at a time when animal and vegetable life were entirely different from what they are now, and since which a vertical erosion has taken place . . . . Rest assured that the Calaveras county skull is not an isolated fact, but that I have a whole series of well-authenticated cases of the finding, in the same geological position, of either human remains or objects of human workmanship.

In a lecture delivered at Manchester, in June, 1879, Mr. H. A. Allbutt, Honorary Member of the Royal Anthropological Society, stated the following :

Near New Orleans, in one part of the modern delta, in excavating for gas-works, a series of beds, almost wholly made up of vegetable matter, were dug through. In the excavation, at a depth of sixteen feet from the upper surface, and beneath four buried forests, one on top of the other, the laborers discovered some charcoal and the skeleton of a man, the cranium of which was reported to be that of the type of the aboriginal Red Indian race. To this skeleton Dr. Dowler ascribed an antiquity of some 50,000 years.

He afterwards reduced the figure to 12,000 ; but on the other hand, Lyell believes the Mississippi to have flowed along its present course for more than a hundred thousand years,<sup>3</sup> so the former estimate may yet be demonstrated as the more correct. Says Prehistoric America :<sup>4</sup>

Amongst the most ancient human relics discovered on American soil may be ranked a skull brought to light by the works of a railway near Denver. . . . Everything points to the conclusion that this skull dates from the same [paleolithic] period. . . . This man lived in the midst of glaciers.

One of the most interesting discoveries—to the Theosophist, at least—was that of the gigantic footprints found during an excavation at Carson, Nevada, mentioned in Secret Doctrine, vol. ii, p. 755. Two of them, besides a fac simile of the whole, were on exhibition in the Anthropological Building at the World's Fair, and are undoubtedly human footprints, as any candid observer will admit. Someone assigned to them an antiquity of over 750, 000 years, which is a much greater age than ever before assigned by our geologists to any human relic. B. B. Redding said :

If it is ever proven they are human relics, they will actually upset all the scientific theories as to the age of man upon the earth.

They will upset such theories as to the size of that prehistoric man as well, and vindicate the Secret Doctrine, for the footprints are 18 inches long by 8 inches in width, representing proportionately twice the size of the man of to-day. The only conceivable reason why they have not been frankly judged human footprints is on account of their size. Thus it is but a matter of prejudice, for had they been only nine inches long, no such doubt would have arisen. However, if a giant, his stride was seemingly not much longer than that of the man of to-day, but it is possible that he was only strolling along. The pressure of the foot is too plain to give rise to the supposition that he had on large footwear. About a half-dozen such tracks going in one direction, with the right- and left-footedness plainly marked, ought to be convincing. Nor is it possible to say that he (or she) was walking on a surface that caved in, thus making the appearance of large feet, for there are hyena foot-tracks alongside which are not thus enlarged. There are also tracks of an elephant, about which Prof. H. W. Harkness said :

There can be no doubt about their character.

Nor should there have been any about the human footprints ; and since on the fifteenth of last August over a dozen more admittedly-human footprints—though smaller ones—have been found in the same excavation, it puts this point out of discussion.

Turning to Central America, we have Dr. Brinton saying :<sup>1</sup>

The discovery of human footprints in volcanic rocks near the shore of Lake Managua, Nicaragua, in circumstances which seemed to assign to them a remote antiquity, has been announced for several years.

The discoverer, Dr. E. Flint, by means of a diagram shows a vertical section of the quarry in which they were found, and gives his decision that<sup>1</sup>

The eruptions covering the southwest slope, and the disturbance caused by one along the ocean beach, elevating the coast range, afford us indisputable evidence of Pliocene man.

Brinton adds that "there can be no doubt of these being genuine footprints"; and that, since they indicate the use of sandals or moccasins, they "cannot be assigned to the earliest stages of human culture".

South America furnished some excellent evidences of the great antiquity of the "New" World aborigine. Under the guano (sea-fowl deposits) on the Peruvian islands at a depth of thirty to sixty feet were found idols, water-pots, mummies, gold and silver ornaments, vases, etc., while, as estimated, "the accumulation of the preceeding three hundred years since the conquest had formed only a few lines in thickness".<sup>2</sup> Commenting on this, H. P. B. said:<sup>3</sup>

If we confine ourselves to a strictly arithmetical calculation, then, allowing twelve lines to an inch and twelve inches to a foot, and allowing one line to every century, we are forced to believe that the people who made these precious gold vases lived 864,000 years ago! Leave an ample margin for errors, and give two lines to a century—say an inch to every hundred years—and we will yet have 72,000 years back, a civilization which—if we judge by its public works, the durability of its constructions, and the grandeur of its buildings—equalled, and in some things certainly surpassed, our own.

The subject of one of the most ancient human relics found in South America was discussed at the Eighth International Congress of Americanists, held in Paris in 1890.<sup>4</sup>

Dr. J. Villanova described a fossil man found by M. Carlos in the valley of the river de la Plata, associated with or near to a skeleton of a megatherium. . . . Dr. Villanova has studied the question of fossil man in times of high antiquity as probably no other Spaniard and but few others in all the world have ever done.

The Secret Doctrine agrees with Prof. Orton in his decision that<sup>5</sup>

Geology and archæology are combining to prove that Sorata and Chimborazo have looked down upon a civilization far more ancient than that of the Incas, and perhaps coeval with the flint-flakes of Cornwall and the shell-mounds of Denmark. On the shores of Lake Titicaca are extensive ruins which antedate the advent of Manco Capac, and may be as venerable as the lake-dwellers of Geneva. Wilson has traced six terraces in going up from the sea through the province of Esmeraldas toward Quito, and underneath the living forest, which is older than the Spanish Conquest, many gold, copper, and stone vestiges of a lost population were found. In all cases these relics are situated below the high-tide mark, in a bed of marine sediment, from which he infers that this part of the country formerly stood higher than the sea. If this be true, vast indeed must be the antiquity of these remains, for the upheaval and subsidence of the coast are exceedingly slow.

As explained more fully by Baldwin :*

This refers to the discoveries made on the coast of Equador in 1860, by James S. Wilson, Esq. At various points along this coast he found "ancient or fossil pottery, vessels, images", and other manufactured articles, all finely wrought. Some of these articles were made of gold. The most remarkable fact connected with them is that they were taken from a "stratum of ancient surface earth", which was covered with a marine deposit six feet thick. The geological formation where these remains were found is reported to be "as old as the drift strata of Europe" and "identical with that of Guayaquil in which bones of the mastodon are met with". The ancient surface-earth or vegetable mould, with its pottery, gold-work, and other relics of civilized life, was therefore below the sea, where the marine deposit was spread over it. This land, after being occupied by men, had subsided and settled below the ocean, remained there long enough to accumulate the marine deposit, and again been elevated to its former position above the sea-level. Since this elevation, forests have been established over it which are older than the Spanish Conquest, and now it is once more subsiding.

Assuming the facts to be as Mr. Wilson reports (and they have not been called in question), it follows that there was human civilization to a certain extent in South America at the time of the older stone age of Western Europe . . . . . The fact that may be considered in connection with another mentioned . . . . . namely, that the most ancient fauna on this continent, man probably included, is that of South America.

Thus the voice of geology proclaims it impossible (granting man's age on earth no greater than the accepted theory) to show that the first American people came from India. It is quite plain to the Theosophist that the only theory which will extricate our archæologists from their difficulties, when dealing with the problem of the peopling of the New World, is that of the sunken Atlantis, which H.P.B. took up so much room in the Secret Doctrine to prove.

NOTE to article "The Letter to the Brahmans" on page 385.

The report of the new revised constitution of 1894 prints among the affiliations with the Theosophical Society a memoranda of resolutions passed in May, 1887, by the Bharat Dharma Mahamandala, held at Hardwar, expressing sympathy with the Theosophical Society. That was a similar meeting to the one reported by Brother Laheri for November, 1893, but the two are far apart as to time.

THE LETTER TO THE BRAHMANS.

IN April, 1893,<sup>1</sup> an open letter to the Brahmans was sent by William Q. Judge. It called them "Brahmans of India", because its writer holds that there are Brahmans of the past now living in Western bodies, and because the term "Brahman" more properly refers in reality to character than to birth. Copies of the letter were sent all over the T. S. in India. Many criticisms were offered, but none were received pointing to the addition of the words "of India". The letter was translated into Sanscrit, Bengali, and Hindi, and in that form was sent all over India.

Although some F. T. S., without corresponding with the Brahmans to whom the letter was directed, said that it was needless and that no idea existed among the orthodox Brahmans that the T. S. favored Buddhism as against other religions, and although the sender of the letter was chided for it, yet the many letters from the Brahmans who are not in the T. S. all state how glad they were to hear definitely that the T. S. was not to be confounded with a Buddhist propaganda. These letters are in Sanscrit, Hindi, Bengali, and English, and may easily be seen at New York.

In the second place the letter aroused discussion of an important point, for in the West the idea is prevalent that the T. S. is a Buddhist propaganda, and T. S. lecturers have to constantly combat this false notion. It is essential that the public shall not misconstrue us and say that because some doctrines given by Theosophists are Buddhistic therefore the Society is also.

So, carrying out the idea of this Letter to the Brahmans, Bro. Rai B. K. Laheri of Ludhiana, India, himself a Brahman and an F. T. S., went to the great Bharat Dharma Mandala held at Delhi in November, 1893, by the orthodox Brahman pundits, and laid before them the letter referred to. They discussed it and the T. S., and he reports that they passed resolutions to help the T. S., and showed they were satisfied that the Society is not a Buddhist propaganda. They then separated for their homes, to carry the letter and their own ideas thereon to the remotest corner of orthodox India. This result will of itself justify the letter. Western readers will the better understand when they know that this Mandala is a great orthodox Brahmanical gathering. They will see that the T. S. cannot afford to shut its eyes to the fact that some millions of Hindus do not use English, in which so much of our literature is written, and that it might be well if we could in some way spread our work among them.

The vernacular work of Bellary members is in line with this. It was brought up at last Indian Convention, but so far as the T.S. is concerned it is now in the hands of a committee. Bros. Jagannathiah and Swaminathiah hope to be successful in the Bellary work. Bro. Laheri also will work to the same end, and many Americans are willing to help with needed money. It would be perfectly competent for the American Section to raise funds for a work that might result in awakening a great current in India, leading to a revival of interest among Hindus themselves, to a looking up of MSS. both paper and palm leaf, to that change in India herself which must come so as to supplement fully the Western activity and devotion.

Brahmans are poor. They are disheartened. No one helps them. Old MSS. lie rotting away. Despair is around many a Brahman who formerly had pupils whom he fed, for now he cannot feed himself. Western glitter of invention and materialistic thought has drawn off the young, and some hand must be stretched out to help until the willing ones there are able to help themselves. Such help will be given, and even the letter to Brahmans has aroused a hope in the breast of many a man in India. Any one wishing to aid in the matter can address the General Secretary American Section, or Bro. R. B. K. Laheri, Ludhiana, Punjab, India.

A CHILD WHO LIVED BEFORE.

LITTLE EDITH is a beautiful child, merry and loving, and possessed of a thoughtfulness far beyond her years. At the time that the following account came to me, she was only six years old.

As in the case of Antonina, her ordinary childish mood is sometimes exchanged for one of a different character, in which she gives utterance to thoughts which her elders do not understand. None of her family know anything of Theosophy, and are apt to be alarmed, as well as puzzled, at the child's propensity to "romance". Her grandmother vouches for the truth of what follows, having written down the words as they were spoken.

When Edith was asked why she persisted in calling her mother "Mamma Grace," she replied, "Why, don't you know? She isn't the only mamma I ever had. I have been here a great many times before, and have had different mammas. But I was told I didn't have to come back to this planet any more."

"Who told you, Edith?"

"Why, Twin-Soul, of course! When Twin-Soul knows a thing, it is just the same as my knowing it."

"Who is Twin-Soul? Is it a boy or a girl?"

With an utterly disgusted expression (no wonder!) the child replied, "Oh, I can't make you understand. Twin-Soul is the other me of me, and it isn't a boy or a girl either, but just as if you were to say—well, 'George-Caroline,' right quick, together, and that is as near as I can tell you. Twin-Soul knows all about Venus. The people there, but they are not really people, you know, like we are, only I don't know what else to call them, are beautiful and shiny. You can see right through them, and they never say only what they mean! They don't live in houses, and there isn't anything black there. We wouldn't know what it meant, because there isn't any such thing."

Walking with her mother, they met a man with an ugly, sinister expression, and the child, shaking her head sadly, looked up and said, "I am afraid that man will have to come back a great many times, mamma Grace, before he gets that look out of his face."

Being shown some pigs one day she gave a little shudder and said, "Well, that puts me in mind of Limbus, and I don't like Limbus."

Of course she was immediately importuned to tell what she meant by "Limbus," and she answered that it was the place where there were "just shapes of things, animals and everything else you can think of, some of them, oh! just horrible! I was there once and saw it all, but I never want to go again."

Edith is very dainty about her food; never touches meat, and lives principally upon bread and milk and fruit. One night at tea there were hot rolls upon the table, but no other bread. When the meal was about half over the hostess suddenly looked around and said to the waitress:

"You had better bring some bread."

Little Edith broke into a merry laugh, and shaking her small forefinger at Mrs. L——, said, "Thought is one, Auntie! I was wishing for that bread!"

It would be interesting to watch such a child expand in surroundings congenial to her nature, and among people whose quick sympathy and intelligent comprehension would assist instead of hampering the child in expressing her inmost thoughts. But

Karma has decreed otherwise, and we can but hope that in the coming years "Twin-Soul" will never seem less to little Edith than the "other me of me."

SOMETHING FOR CHILDREN.

THERE is an old apple tree in my yard with branches that come so close to the ground that any little boy can climb into it without any trouble. It is stripped of its leaves now and looks quite bare. But in June, just before it is time for the apples to get ripe, you will find that the tree is full of leaves and foliage. If you hunt in the grass under the apple tree you will find little apples that have already turned red and look good enough to eat; but if you turn them over, you will find a little hole in each apple. Of course you know what made those holes—worms. These little red apples once hung up there with the green ones, but they would not wait to grow. They left their mamma branch and came down here into the world to seek their fortune. They wanted to grow big in a hurry. But pretty soon along came the worms that are waiting for just this kind of apples. The worms crawled into their little hearts, and now they are bitter and fit for nothing. They are bad apples. But those green apples up on the tree are going to stay there and grow slow and true. That is the only way to be a good sweet apple, and that is the only way to get to be a good man or woman. The boy who smokes or chews or swears to appear like a man is opening his heart to the worm of evil habit that will make his life bitter, like those worthless red apples. Whenever we get in a hurry for our legs to touch the floor from the rocking chair, let us remember these apples that were in a hurry to reach the ground.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A CHILD ON REINCARNATION.

Dear Mr. Judge:—

This is a true story and may be useful. I have a daughter now just five years old, whom I have taught and brought up myself and to whom no one has spoken of reincarnation or of former lives. She has always insisted that she lived before. One day she and I were walking over a stretch of prairie, and she was skipping and running about as we went. Coming back to my side she took my hand, and here is what she said:

"Mamma, ideas come into my head like this— I see two mammas; I see you and I see another one just like you. I say to myself, 'No, that cannot be; this is my mamma and I hold her hand. I see the other one in my mind, and she is just the same. How can that be?'"

"What put that idea into your head?", and she replied:

"Nothing put it there. Ideas like that come into my head. I was not thinking about anything when I saw you and another just like you walking at your side."

At other times she said, "I have lived a long, long time ago when I was a grown up lady, knew everything, and travelled all over the world, long before I was born a baby this time."

I may say that I have not taught the child any of the conventional notions of religion, nor have I repressed her with fears of hell or other degrading things, but at the same time she has not been hearing any conversation on re-incarnation or any matter like it, and has had no ideas from others on which she might weave a structure from imagination. I regard it as possibly a recollection of some other life definitely.

SYDNEY, December 21st, 1894.

THE EDITOR PATH:

Dear Sir:—Since last report work has been progressing steadily in Sydney and the membership increasing both of League and Branch.

The former has just completed a series of twelve Sunday evening lectures, given by Brothers Willans, Peell, Gulliver, and Martyn to fair audiences.

The fortnightly debates have been kept up and are well attended. We hope to commence the new year with larger rooms for which we are now in treaty.

Brother Chappell, late of San Francisco, has left us after twelve months' useful membership for Christchurch, New Zealand.

Yours fraternally,

F. H. MARTYN.

LITERARY NOTES.

JANUARY THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XXII" is of H.P.B.'s social life in New York after the first interest in the T.S. had subsided and the Founders were left as almost its sole representatives. Col. Olcott intimates that the present series of reminiscences is nearly ended, but that a second is possible, to cover removal to India and the experiences there. If the second is, as it may well be, the peer of the earlier part of the first, Theosophists will clamor for its immediate commencement. "Sepharial" contributes "The Horoscope of Annie Besant", which includes a prediction that she will die in 1907. Some details are singularly accurate, not all; and it may be that she will escape death in that year as she already has danger from water and from "large quadrupeds". "Violets at the Neck and Three Bars" is a strange psychological story, apparently true and certainly very well told. Mrs. Besant gives a paper on "Spirituality", practical, tender, and glowing. Prof. Manilal N. Divedi in a learned discussion of "The Doctrine of Maya" combats the theory advanced by a writer in November Theosophist. In the Supplement is a full report of the proceedings at the eighteenth Anniversary of the T.S. The number of living Branches is 322.—[A.F.]

JANUARY LUCIFER, if a trifle heavy, contains some excellent matter. Mrs. Besant's lecture on the Indian steamer upon "India, her Past and her Future" was fortunately taken down on the spot, and the first half is given here. It may be that the infatuation for India among some Theosophists tends to repel by its immoderation the remainder, but all must be charmed and thrilled by such an exponent. Dr. Hartmann's "Esoteric Teaching", besides its intrinsic worth, is welcome because of its warm words for H.P.B. Mr. Mead's "True Self-Reliance" is largely of Upanishadic excerpts, and therefore not overly intelligible. Even that sturdy believer in the doctrine that a passage must have sound meaning if written in Sanscrit some thousands of years ago is staggered at the following and shakes his head a little sadly: "Whereas, should a man make were it but a stomach within It, then fear arises for him. This is ever a terror for him who knows and ponders upon it". Clearly the only safety from such terror is for the prudent among us to refrain from endowing "It" with any trace of digestive apparatus, and resolutely to withstand every temptation to either know or ponder thereupon. In "Practical Proof of Reëmbodiment" Mr. John M. Pryse, whose personal attractiveness is now being supplemented by literary work, gives several remarkable cases of clear reincarnation; and in "The Unconscious Tendency of Modern Thought in the Direction of Theosophy" J.P.H. illustrates his theme. The reviews are of course good; they always are; but have a somewhat subdued strain, less exhilarating than when the reviewer's sprightliness is "on tap", so to speak.—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI, No. 13, by S. G. P. Coryn, learnedly treats "The Zodiac", and at the close gives some most interesting figures showing the exact proportion, in total precessional years of the equinox, of the four Yugas, as well as certain concordances of astronomical facts connected with these precessional years. It is excellently well written.—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI, No. 15, is upon "Christian Rosenkruz and the Rosicrucians" by W. Wynn Westcott. The author, speaking of the Fama Fraternitatis, says: "Certainly no book that has been printed within the last fifty years has created one tithe of the flutter, in the world of the learned, that was caused by this thirty-three page Latin pamphlet, published in Germany in 1614". Then follow an account of Rosenkruz and the discovery of his remains in the vault in 1584, a sketch of the book, and the rules of the Fraternity. Mr. Westcott speaks of the present English Society of Rosicrucians as a Masonic body, studying the old Rosicrucian books and their connection with Masonry, and warns against the supposition that its members claim either secret wisdom or magical arts, but so phrases the warning as not at all to repudiate the actual possession of both. The paper closes with an analogy between the original promulgation of Rosicrucianism and the establishment of the T.S. and the E.S. Thomas Taylor's "Platonic Philosopher's Creed" is the other paper in this issue of Siftings.—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI, No. 16, contains "Man and his Creators" by Charlotte E. Woods, and "Epidemics from the Theosophical Standpoint", the latter a reprint of a good, though inadequate, article from the Theosophist. But the former is not good. It is a mere abstract from the Secret Doctrine, and of that unreflecting, unintelligent type which swallows words as if ideas and reproduces them still undigested. It is not surprising that a writer who says that "man is in his entirety the Universe itself" should on the same page speak of a river as "journeying towards its source".—[A.F.]

THE BUDDHIST RAY is published in California and misnamed. It certainly violates the laws of Buddha and Buddhism, in that its columns are filled with diatribes against those it dislikes, including such a famous Buddhist as Col. Olcott, President T.S. Buddhists should not abuse and vilify those of other faiths, and surely not their coreligionists. Dharmapala is a real Buddhist, a member of the T.S., and yet this Californian pewter Buddhist abuses most roundly in an article full of lying statements the Society Dharmapala supports and the woman Blavatsky—now dead—whom he reverences. Certainly Buddha's prophecy of old that his religion would be corrupted and then counterfeited is being fulfilled in California. Who is this sui disant Buddhist editor anyway?

THE AUSTRAL THEOSOPHIST has appeared, the January number being its opening. The cover is carefully designed with effective and significant symbolism, all of which is fully explained in the editorial. "What Theosophy offers" gives a raison d'être for the magazine: Mrs. Besant depicts the Parliament of Religions and also in "A Word of Greeting" describes in the sweetest spirit and the wisest terms what is the true policy of a Theosophical periodical; a very bad picture of Mrs. I. C. Oakley accompanies a good sketch of her; a paper read by Mr. James Smith before the Victorian Theosophic League treats of "A Plurality of Existences"; "War in Olympus" by H.P.B. is reprinted from the Theosophist; Mrs. Oakley tells of "Theosophy at the World's Fair". Doubtless local Theosophical items will multiply as the magazine settles to work. It has an enormous and a rich field in Australasia, and words of greeting—no less sincere though less eloquent than Mrs. Besant's—go to it from its far-off co-laborers in Madras, London, and New York. There are sixteen pages, and the subscription price in Australasia is six shillings. The office is at 117 Collins street, Melbourne. Australia.

MODERN MYSTICS AND MODERN MAGIC, by Arthur Lillie, contains short accounts of Swedenborg, Boehme, Madame Guyon, and the Illuminati, the rest of the book being a minute transcript of Stainton Moses' spiritualistic experiences, with a little about Madame Blavatsky. It is not absolutely worthless, for some of its biographical facts are otherwise, and it may not always be as inaccurate as in the date given for the founding of the Theosophical Society. But it is jerky, disconnected, rambling, with no apparent purpose, and seems more like an incoherent jumble of whatever came into the the writer's thought than a serious treatise by one who either knew facts or had any use for them. It reads at times like the remarks of Mr. F.'s Aunt in Little Dorrit. Of course the misconceptions of Theosophy may be only from ignorance or carelessness, but the general quality of the book suggests a hurried effort to get something on the market, not for instruction or fame or even profit—since the book can hardly sell, but for relief from feverish impulse to write, no matter what or how.—[A.F.]

OCULT SCIENCE IN MEDICINE, Franz Hartmann, M. D. Dr. Hartmann has selected a grand topic, one of measureless importance at this epoch of re-awakening faith in the realities of the unseen. Yet justice forces the admission that his treatment is little more than repetition of the thought that knowledge on unmaterial planes is essential to a true physician and that a true physician must be spiritually enlightened. Valuable ideas appear here and there, the purport of the work is entirely correct, the various analyses are good, and each position is sustained by a quotation from Paracelsus, but nowhere is clear explicit explication given or a subject firmly dissected. Unlike the pains-taking, close thought of Germans, it is French in its talk around and about a subject. Whenever is expected real statement of what Occult Science is, and how it should be used in Medicine, and what specific changes are to be made in practice, and wherein the present curriculum is to be enlarged, and where right methods are to be found, any attempt to expound is disclaimed. So that the book is really little more than a series of observations upon the importance of spiritually-minded physicians; very sound, very healthful, worthy of universal welcome, but not satisfying the appetite whetted by the title. Page 75 has not been carefully written, for one of the grades of "Fideles (Adepts)" is said to be "Dunces, pretenders, and frauds"! "The Physician of the Future" gave opportunity for a splendid concluding chapter, but only an opportunity. Still, whatever the inadequacy of Dr. Hartmann's work, it sounds out vigorously the essential truths of Theosophy, insisting on Karma and Reincarnation, the power of Thought, the reality of the supersensual world, the pervading action of Spirit, and the constitution of Nature as expressing the wisdom of its Divine Original.—[A.F.]

THE STORY OF THE NEW GOSPEL OF INTERPRETATION, Edward Maitland. Belief that one has been selected, trained, enlightened, commissioned to voice a direct message from the Supreme Being to humanity seems of necessity improbable and very likely a delusion; nor has acceptance of the New Gospel been so large as to verify the purpose claimed. Yet the belief and the mission are not impossible, and certainly the strange experiences narrated, coupled with the singular purity, spirituality, and devotion of the two colaborers, Mrs. Kingsford and Mr. Maitland, demonstrate more than sincerity, even if not conclusive as to teaching. The teaching was that religion was thereafter to be interpreted by judgment and intuition, woman embodying the latter and hence being the crown of humanity, and it came by revelations mostly in sleep and trance, Daniel and St. John being the "controlling angels". The spirits of departed relations also appeared visibly and spoke audibly, and the "Gods themselves" sometimes indulged in "playfulness". It sounds odd to hear that Hermes objected to hot foods and drinks as the worst abuse of heaven's good gifts; some interpretations of Biblical incidents seem fanciful rather than rational; and the calm certainty that the two writers had received in plenitude truth never previously beheld save as through a glass, darkly, appears too strong; but these things do not annul, perhaps hardly impair, the reverence and piety and spiritual insight patent through the work. Reincarnation came to be believed in as an integral part of human evolution, and some admirable elucidations of it are given. There is an excellent distinction between Occultism and Mysticism, and the Theosophical Society is generously commended,—though Theosophists will scarcely grant that The Perfect Way "forced the hands of the Masters" and brought about a relaxation of secrecy, nor that the author of Isis Unveiled knew nothing of either Reincarnation or Karma. Even the excellent reasons given by Jesus (p. 154-5) why the highest Initiates are not always reborn as women may not wholly cover the ground. Still, allowing for some extreme positions, the book is remarkable. If it does not convert the world it can elevate it, for it depicts two elevated souls, souls worthy to receive truth and to transmit it.—[A.F.]

SELECTIONS FROM BUDDHA is a neat little book of fifty-two pages, prefaced with a statement that the extracts are from the Life of Buddha translated from Sanskrit into Chinese A.D. 420, and thence into English under supervision of Max Müller. The passages are of a high moral and spiritual tone, but do not express any specially strong thought or rise above very moderate intellectual level. Candidly, they are commonplace. One rather wonders to find Buddha saying that "fear of birth, old age, disease, and death led him to disobey and disregard the extreme kindness of his royal father". A much higher idea of his mental and religious outfit can be gotten from The Light of Asia. Does "Samadhi" mean "faith"?—[A.F.]

WHAT IS COMMON TO CHRISTIANITY AND THEOSOPHY was the topic discussed in the Aryan Branch on January 9th, and the PATH has determined to publish in pamphlet form the papers then read. They are by Alexander Fullerton, Leon Landsberg, Harrie Steele Budd, and William Q. Judge, with some notes by Joseph H. Fussell. Due notice of issue will be given.

Mirror of the Movement.

THE THEOSOPHICAL CENTRE in the eastern portion of New York City, which had been lying dormant for some time, has started up with renewed activity. A room has been rented for Friday evenings at Liberty Hall, East Houston Street. On the first Friday in every month a regular lecture is held. The other Friday evenings are devoted to discussions on such Theosophical subjects as the members and visitors show the most interest in.

MR. BURCHAM HARDING arrived in Pittsburg January 28, and addressed the Branch on "Theosophy". Wednesday evening, January 31st, he spoke on "Music and Theosophy". Saturday afternoon, February 3d, Mr. Harding gave a general address at a dinner tendered him by the Duquesne Club. Sunday evening he lectured in the branch rooms on the "Practical Ethics of Theosophy". Tuesday evening he gave a lecture in Braddock, Pa., subject: "How Theosophy solves the Problems of Life". Wednesday evening, February 7th, he took part in the discussion at the Branch on "Spiritual Alchemy" and also started a movement to form a class in the Branch to study Mr. Judge's Ocean of Theosophy. Friday afternoon he addressed the Woman's Club of Pittsburgh on Theosophy and organized a class among the members to study the Ocean of Theosophy. Saturday evening, February 10th, Mr. Harding gave a parlor talk in Idlewood, Pa., and organized a class for study of Ocean of Theosophy. Sunday evening, February 11, he delivered a lecture in the branch rooms on "Theosophy and the Bible". This is all of the public work done, but does not include talks with members, encouragement of all kinds, and general help in every direction. We shall ask very soon for the loan of Miss Stabler. I see she has returned, and she is our god-mother, you know. Sincerely yours, SOPHIA A. MACMILLAN, Secretary.

CLAUDE FALLS WRIGHT lectured at Aryan Society on Sunday, January 14, on "The Thinking Man". The same evening he left for Boston. On Monday and Tuesday he attended meetings of members there, and on Wednesday the 17th lectured before the Cambridge Branch on "Occultism". Thursday he left for Chicago to take temporarily the place of Mrs. Thirds, Secretary of the Central States Committee, who was forced to go to the country to recruit her health. On Sunday, January 21, he lectured in the rooms of the Chicago Branch on "The Theosophical Movement". On Wednesday he attended the Branch meeting. Saturday, January 27th, he attended the Bhagavad-Gita class. Sunday, January 28th, he lectured at the North Side League on "H.P.

B. and the Masters". Monday, January 29th, he held a large meeting of Theosophists to propose some changes in methods of work and the like. Wednesday, January 31st, he attended and spoke at the regular Branch meeting. Thursday, Feb. 1st, he attended a meeting of the Englewood branch. An attack of Tonsillitis then prevented Bro. Wright's lecturing until February 14th, when he discussed before the Chicago Branch "The Real Basis of Astrology". Thursday, Feb. 15th, he attended the Englewood branch meeting. Saturday evening February 17th, he organized an elocution class in the rooms of the Society, and on Sunday, February 18th, he lectured publicly on "Symbolism".

ARYAN T.S. Sunday evening lectures in February were: 4th, The Spirit of the Ages, Joseph H. Fussell; 11th, Cycles, William Q. Judge; 18th, Esoteric Islam, Mahomet Alex. R. Webb; 25th, Significance of Dreams, Miss K. Hillard.

BROOKLYN T.S. had Sunday evening lectures in February: 4th, Cycles, Wm. Q. Judge; 11th, Witchcraft, Leon Landsberg; 18th, The Spirit of the Age, Alex. Fullerton; 25th, The Spirit of the Ages, Joseph H. Fussell.

MUSKEGON T.S. has issued an excellent Syllabus of Discussions from January to May, coupled with a brief statement of the purposes of the T.S. for general distribution. Open meetings are held Wednesday evenings.

SIoux FALLS T.S., Sioux Falls, South Dakota, was chartered February 10th, with eight members. It ranks eighty-third on the American roll.

"H.P.B." T.S., New York City, had Sunday evening lectures in February: 4th, Wheel of the Law, Miss Anna M. Stabler; 11th, The Spirit of the Age, Alexander Fullerton; 18th, The Spirit of the Ages, Joseph H. Fussell; 25th, Cycles, William Q. Judge.

THE SIoux FALLS T.S., chartered only last month, has already established a Circulating Theosophical Library of fifty-seven books and issued a neatly printed card of rules and a card of application. A public meeting is held each Tuesday evening, whereat the attendance is good and the interest manifest. The hall can seat about fifty, and has usually from twenty-five to twenty-seven present. The free reading room is open every evening. The branch has organized by the election as President of Dr. Egbert George, and as Secretary of Mr. Harlan P. Pettigrew. Is not the West grand!

PORTLAND, MAINE, has been privileged with a visit and lectures from the former Secretary of the Cambridge T.S., Miss Marguerite L. Guild, who found the town ripe for Theosophy, a previous visiting Theosophist having spread the doctrine and excited interest. A Branch is already contemplated.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

BLAVATSKY HALL, Los Angeles, had Sunday evening lectures in February: 4th, The Eye and the Heart Doctrine, Mrs. L. E. Giese; 11th, The Ministry of Pain, Mrs. H. A. Gibson; 18th, The Rise and Fall of Continents, Dr. G. F. Mohn; 25th, States of Consciousness, F. Neubauer.

SEATTLE T.S. had Sunday evening lectures in February: 4th, Duty to the Body, Dr. H. T. Turner; 11th, Rise and Fall of Nations, Thomas A. Barnes; 18th, "That" that Reincarnates, A Student; 25th, The Races, Third, Fourth and Fifth, Mrs. Anna L. Blodgett.

WILLAMETTE T.S., Portland, Oregon, had Sunday evening lectures in February: 4th, Why we ought to be Brothers, Mrs. L. D. Durkee; 11th, Results of Theosophy, A. R. Read; 18th, The Social Question, Mrs. A. R. Read; 25th, Woman from a Theosophical Standpoint, A. R. Read.

THE PACIFIC COAST LECTURER visited Sanger, Calif., on Jan. 19th, and, though a "revival of religion" was going on, had every seat at his lecture occupied and a number of callers the next day. Books were ordered and a long account of the lecture was given in the local Herald. In Porterville two lectures were delivered in the City Hall, a reception given the lecturer, and quiz classes held. Here too a "revival" was going on, and a minister spoke of Dr. Griffiths as an "agent of the Devil". The Devil seems to have selected his agent well, for the Dr's labors resulted in a new Branch with eighteen members.

PORTERVILLE T. S., Porterville, Calif., was chartered Feb. 13th, and ranks eighty fourth on the American roll. The President-elect is Bro. Elum C. Miles, Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy, and the Secretary-elect Mrs. Nellie M. Baker. The ground had been well and zealously prepared by Bro. Miles before Dr. Griffiths's lectures.

LOS ANGELES T.S. has been doing good work, especially in lectures, the distribution of leaflets, and the circulation of Library books. The Sunday evening lectures continue large and productive of interest, numerous questions, sometimes between twenty and thirty, being handed in at the close. The Friday evening Discussion Class seems especially beneficial; from it the seven new members have come. It is quite informal, and every one is free to ask questions, and is quite at home. The Key to Theosophy is text-book.

THE PUGET SOUND LEAGUE OF THEOSOPHICAL WORKERS is very thoroughly organized, and its report for 1893 is most honorable. It procured the delivery of seventy eight lectures on fifty four topics to 1494 hearers in twelve towns, besides missionizing five others, and had many articles admitted to the press. Victoria, B. C., is seeking a suitable hall for public meetings.

GOLDEN GATE LODGE has adopted the course of holding closed Branch meetings for better study and for bringing forward new and younger speakers to relieve the over-worked elders. Past T.S. work begins to tell and demands increase of trained workers. The Mid-Winter Fair, which will run until July 5th, has an auxiliary known as the "Mid-Winter Fair Congress", including a Congress of Religions, and the Pacific Coast Committee has applied for dates at which to present Theosophy. The two subjects mentioned are "The basic truths underlying all religions, these being identical" and "These truths proclaiming the Brotherhood of Man as a universal law of Nature". They will include the sub-divisions of Theosophic doctrine. The Secretary of the Congress, an important official at the Chicago Parliament, said of the application that Theosophy should be an important feature of the Congress and that he would do all in his power to make it so. Probably April 19th and 20th will be granted. The greatest satisfaction exists among Theosophists on the Coast over the decision of the Executive Committee to hold the April Convention in San Francisco.

NARADA T.S. keeps up its Sunday lectures, those in February being upon Elementals; what are they? by Mrs. Anna L. Blodgett; Who is responsible for Humanity, F. L. Wiersmuller; Theosophy vs. Christianity, George Sheffield; Hypnotic and Mesmeric Forces, Jesse L. Greenbaum.

OLYMPIA, Wash., had three lectures in February: Theosophical View of Spiritualism, Mrs. Fannie A. Sheffield; Theosophy, Mrs. Hattie E. Ogden; Spirit and Matter, Frank I. Blodgett.

ANOTHER RELIGIOUS PARLIAMENT.

The Mid-Winter Fair at San Francisco is an echo of the World's Fair and has a Religious Parliament added to it, of which Rev. A. C. Hirst, D.D. is President. Discussions will be had on papers, and each paper is limited to thirty minutes. It is to last from April 16th to 21st, thus being very close to our convention. The Committee of the Parliament includes, we are informed, Dr. Anderson of the T.S. Branch there, and to the T.S. has been assigned a session on April 17th for the discussion of the following :

- (a) Points of Agreement in All Religions, and
- (b) The Belief in Reincarnation.

This arrangement, while not so good as the one we worked under in Chicago, is better than none, and as the Parliament is a small one it may be considered a good deal in proportion. If the meetings pass off without any hitch we shall thus be able to make a double presentation of the Theosophical movement.

NEW BOSTON HEADQUARTERS.

The New England Theosophical Corporation has procured 24 Mount Vernon street, Boston, for a general New England Headquarters, the managing directors being prominent in the Boston, Cambridge, and Malden branches. They gave their house-warming on the 17th, invitations being sent in every direction and William Q. Judge, the General Secretary, coming on from New York. There was first a lecture by request on the 16th to 150 students of Harvard College by Mr. Judge on the subject of "The Underlying Basis of Religions". This was in a chapel on the campus. On the 17th a reception was held at the headquarters, which was crowded, Mr. Judge and the Presidents of the Boston, Malden, and Cambridge branches receiving the visitors. There was music and singing and addresses. After that there was a supper, and everybody was delighted with the whole affair, many of them remaining very late for Theosophical conversation. On the 18th Mr. Judge lectured again at half-past three in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, to about three hundred persons, many being Cambridge professors. Prof. James of Harvard College was present and others. The Cambridge president, Miss Guild, then entertained a number of visitors from Boston, and after tea all returned to the headquarters where Mr. Judge lectured again to about two hundred persons who filled the audience room of the headquarters. The subject of the lecture in both places was "The Masters of Wisdom". The headquarters was then declared formally opened. At 12 o'clock, when Brother Judge returned to New York, the last visitors departed. It was a very successful house-warming and has created a great deal of interest.

The new headquarters is very large, commodious, and well-arranged. The meeting hall is on the second floor, and with the large corridor and library will seat almost three hundred people. It is decorated in a very agreeable style, and being in a quiet street is delightful for meetings. There is no doubt that the establishment of this headquarters, embracing as it does the whole of New England, will do much to strengthen the movement in those states, and being in the hands of earnest and devoted workers will without doubt be carried on successfully. The headquarters will also sell literature and distribute pamphlets, as well as attempting to furnish when possible lecturers for other districts. All Theosophists are welcome and should not fail to visit the headquarters when in Boston.

THE NEXT T.S. CONVENTION, AMERICAN SECTION.

As announced in February PATH, the Eighth Annual Convention of the American Section will meet at San Francisco on Sunday, April 22d, and Monday the 23d. The hour of assembling will be 10 a.m.

The places are as follows. Sunday and Monday morning at Red Men's Hall, 320 Post street. At Golden Gate Hall, 625 Sutter street, one session each evening of Sunday and Monday. The capacity of Golden Gate Hall is one thousand. Other meetings will probably be at the Headquarters, 1504 Market street.

Delegates should report at the latest on the 21st at Headquarters; if not able to arrive until Sunday morning they should notify the General Secretary in advance by letter to 1504 Market street. A delegate from the European Section in the person of Bro. Ernest T. Hargrove will be present and bring the addresses and messages from that Section.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE,
General Secretary.

EUROPE.

THE NORTH OF ENGLAND FEDERATION of the T.S. held its quarterly meeting at Manchester on February 3d. The General Secretary attended at the request of members and took the chair. Plans for future work were discussed and past activities were reviewed. Great harmony prevailed at all the meetings, and every sign was shown of a steady resolve for progress during the coming quarter-year.

BLAVATSKY LODGE, LONDON, contains to hold well attended public meetings. Mrs. Cooper-Oakley, speaking on The Change that Men call Death, and Miss Anna Stabler with The Wheel of the Law as her subject, both attracted especially good audiences. Amongst lectures to come are the following: Dr. A. Keightley on Instruments of Karma; the Hon. O.S. Cuffe on Individuality and Personality; G.R.S. Mead on the The Crystallization of the Mind; Mrs. A. Keightley on The Ethics of Occultism.

A Conversazione was held by the Lodge on February 6th, which was generally considered a great success. About one hundred guests, mostly members, were present. The Hall was charmingly decorated for the occasion with Indian draperies and offered a strange contrast to its usually somewhat bleak appearance.

The President, Mrs. Annie Besant, recently wrote a pamphlet which the Lodge published as an introduction to the study of Theosophy. This will be distributed gratis to all who attend the meetings, the expense falling upon the Lodge Treasury. This has been done so that no one might leave a meeting ignorant of general Theosophical tenets. It was thought that a lecture on Parabrahm, for instance, to both members and visitors, would leave the latter but little wiser as to Reincarnation, Karma, and other elementary teachings, and that the distribution of such a pamphlet would get over the difficulty. Other Lodges are purchasing it for the same purpose.

SWISS THEOSOPHISTS are making slow headway. At Zürich Brother Julius Sponheimer takes charge of a weekly meeting for study at which the attendance averages fifteen. Spiritualists predominate, and the Eastern teachings are received with scant favor. Pamphlets have been translated into German and circulated so far as very limited means permit.

THE SCOTTISH LODGE, Edinburgh, has just finished its course of lectures on the Atonement. This doctrine was studied from the standpoint of various creeds, a Roman Catholic priest being the last to put forward his interpretation of this world-wide and little understood teaching. The subject for discussion during next course is to be The Nature and Constitution of the Ego.

A NEW THEOSOPHICAL MAGAZINE has been started by members in Barcelona. It is to be published monthly in Spanish, and the first number promises well for its future usefulness. Well-printed and turned out in a thoroughly business-like form, it will be within the reach of many for whom the Madrid paper, Sophia, proves too expensive. It is called Antahkarana.

ENGLISH WEEKLY NEWSPAPERS are to receive increased attention as agents for the dissemination of Theosophy owing to the efforts of Bro. H. Kitchin of Leeds. Articles on subjects likely to attract attention will be sent to various weekly newspapers through his hands. The daily press have not as yet shown themselves willing to insert anything but controversial matter in the shape of letters to the editor. H.

INDIA.

MRS. ANNIE BESANT'S INDIAN TOUR.

A crowd awaited Mrs. Besant on the Colombo pier from 2 to 8 p.m. on November 9th, the steamer being late, and she graciously postponed disembarking till morning in order to gratify it on reassembling. A triumphal arch had been erected at the T.S. Hall and at the Girls' School, and there were speeches and songs at each. At Kandy there was a torchlight procession and temple dancers, and the next day a presentation of prizes at the school. A huge audience at Colombo attended the lecture, and at the stations en route to Galle the school children brought flowers. Lectures, addresses, incessant streams of visitors, processions, a conference with the High Priest Sumangala, the laying the foundation of a new College and Girls' House on land in Colombo presented by Mr. Peter d'Abrew. There are now seventy-seven schools controlled by the T.S. in Ceylon.

On the 16th Mrs. Besant landed at Tuticorin in India and was enwreathed with flowers. The first speech was made at a railway station when starting for Tinnevely. Travel and lecturing, perpetual interviews and discussions with Brahmins, visits to temples, reverent attention from priests and potentates, crowded audiences marked her progress. Sometimes the lecture was at 7:30 in the morning. Col. Olcott had prearranged all details of travel with the utmost thoughtfulness and sagacity. Very heavy rains at times interfered with movements, but apparently not with audiences. One day the Colonel lectured to a thousand boys, and after a speech from Mrs. Besant there was formed an "Aryan League" to defend native religion and customs. At Tanjore the Maharane attended a lecture in the Palace, received Mrs. Besant and the Countess behind a curtain of cloth of gold, and put upon them wreaths and shawls. A significant change in India is that some of the delegates to Convention desired to bring their wives! The lecture on "Adepts" made special impression. At Coimbatore the party, walked in procession from the station to the bungalow, wreathed with flowers and with tom-toms beating in front. The Branch there has had three hundred meetings during the year and twenty-five public lectures. At Mysore the lecture was from a decorated platform, one of the sacred bulls on guard at each side, and at Bellary Mrs. Besant was approached with an address printed in gilt letters, her disinterested labors for the spiritual good of humanity being characterized as "highly noble and simply indescribable". At Bangalore the Government furnished a meeting-place and closed the public offices early, the Prime Minister came from Mysore, and three thousand people attended. Women came everywhere to interview Mrs. Besant and ask explanation of their observances, etc., and attended her lectures, and the wives of some Fellows have joined the T.S.! At Madura the High Priest greeted her as a reincarnation of Saraswati, quoting and applying a venerable tradition. At Rajahmundry there was a torchlight procession from the river to the bungalow, houses and even trees covered with people and an almost wild excitement prevailing. At the middle of the route all had to dismount from the palanquins and hear an address.

Mrs. Besant spoke repeatedly at the Adyar Anniversary, and afterwards began her northward tour, the same enthusiasm rolling around her upon the route.

CEYLON LETTER

Before this reaches you in the far West, most readers of the PATH may have heard of the visit of Annie Besant and the Countess Wachtmeister to the East. They came to Ceylon during the early part of November and were the guests of Mrs. Marie M. Higgins. The most important event connected with the visit of Mrs. Besant to Ceylon was the ceremony of her laying the foundation stone of the Home for Singhalese Girls on a piece of land donated for the purpose by Mr. Peter de Abrew. Mrs. Higgins with her school girls and a fairly good gathering of ladies and gentlemen, including the wife of the Director of Public Instruction of Ceylon, Mrs. Cull, were present at the Ceremony. A special hymn composed for the occasion by Mrs. Higgins was sung by her girls, and Mrs. Besant laid the stone and spoke a few words invoking the blessings of the Masters for our work. The girls led by Mrs. Higgins and Mrs. Besant then laid each a pretty flower on the stone, and the ceremony was ended. A photograph was taken at the time, which has turned out to be a splendid picture.

Every endeavor is now being made to build the Home. It is to be called the "Annie Besant School and H.P.B. Home". The site is in an admirable locality charmingly situated in the midst of the Bungalows of the élite of Colombo. Now that the ground has been secured, we have only to erect thereon the permanent buildings to start a steady center of Theosophical activities in Ceylon, and we need the help of our friends. Mrs. Higgins or Mr. Peter de Abrew will gratefully accept any contributions in aid of the work.

Adjoining the site where Mrs. Besant laid the foundation stone are the grounds belonging to Mr. de Abrew: hereon a temporary building made of mud walls, palm-leaved roof, and floor is now being put up for the Home. Here Mrs. Higgins, her girls, and her assistant teaching staff and workers will live until the permanent building is put up, and continue their very useful work in the Island. You Western readers can form no idea of the ignorance and illiteracy of the people around us, both among men and women. Of course the status of the latter is deplorable. Crime in Ceylon is growing, and, if I mistake not, it has been proved by government statistics that Ceylon, comparatively speaking, has the largest criminal population of the world! Yes! there is much truth in the "spicy breezes" of Ceylon, and that "only man is vile".

THE XVIII ANNIVERSARY IN INDIA.

On the 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th of December, 1893, at the T.S. Headquarters the yearly meeting of the Indian Section was held. Since the change was made respecting General Conventions of the T.S., the Indian meetings are in fact the anniversaries of the Indian Section. They are properly taken advantage of by the President of the T.S. to present to the whole Society, by subsequent publication of his addresses, the reports made to him by the various Sections and the general accounts of the Society. It is not a legislative meeting of the T.S., and hence no legislation is passed by it. The Indian Section meets at the time and legislates for itself, as the other Sections do for their districts. Bertram Keightley appears as General Secretary of that Section, as he was reelected, though still compelled to be absent in England by reason of the state of health of a relative.

The meeting was notable from the presence of our great orator, worker, friend, and example, Annie Besant, now known to all the Theosophists of the world. Her presence made the meeting one to be remembered by all who were there. She was incessantly occupied, speaking publicly or conversing with members. She represented America as its special delegate, and the General Secretary of this Section has had the honor of having his report to the President read by herself to the meeting. An account of her influence is needless, since we all know that for her to speak is for her hearers to be spell-bound; for not only does eloquence flow from her lips, but truth and sincerity, devotion and spirituality, surround her like an aureole.

In closing his remarks the President said: "I mean to abandon the last lingering thought of retirement and to stop at my post until removed by the hand of death. Annabai (Annie Besant) will in time become to me what H.P.B. was". All will be glad to thus know that he is now firmly determined to abide by the resolution written by William Q. Judge and passed by the American Section in 1892, not to retire nor think of retiring. He then in ending says, "Disciples of the same Master, devoted to the same cause, and now friends who know and trust each other, we may" (he and Annie), "I hope and pray, henceforth resemble in this movement the Aryan god who is dual when looked at from two aspects, but when properly understood is one and indivisible". This is high honor to Annie, as the arguments of Old Diary Leaves make H.P.B. a psychic and medium, which Annie is not. As such a sentiment never was uttered by the President about H.P.B., the hoped for comparison elevates Annie to a much higher place in his esteem than ever was held by H.P.B.

A Vernacular Sub-Section has been mooted and is duly mentioned by the President. In connection with this Bros. Jagannathiah and Swaminathiah of Bellary are spoken of with due praise. Of this work our old friend E. T. Sturdy will be secretary. This will be a great help to the Indian work. Countess Wachtmeister settles in India to make a new centre, and Miss Müller does the same. Countess Wachtmeister will probably be at Allahabad and Miss Müller at Bombay. These should be very strong adjuncts to the work.

The defalcation by the late Gopalacharlu is spoken of and lamented. But we cannot agree that caution exercised over those who have large sums of money in control is not a safeguard. Hereafter all money will be in Col. Olcott's name, and regular auditors were appointed at his request to act all the year and periodically look over cash and accounts.

Growth of the T.S. is shown by a table giving 352 branches up to 1893. Total number of live branches is fixed at 322 on December 27th. New American and others would have to be added. Books of the year are twenty-three in number. Donations to the defalcation reimbursement fund are given as 4,722 rupees, 12 annas. The sum taken was 8,649 rupees, 5 annas, thus leaving a deficit of 3,926 rupees, 8 annas. This will soon be covered. Another large remittance was sent from America too late for the report.

Donations and fees from America for the year are roughly 6444.5.11 rupees or \$1991.92. Total donations and receipts excluding medal and permanent Funds are 17,080.10.13 rupees or \$5277.89, of which 11,000 rupees were usable in the work. The American amount includes 1037.14.2 rupees to the defalcation fund. Thus this Section has given out of the whole total 37¼ per cent, and toward the reimbursement of the defalcation it gave over  $\frac{1}{8}$ , not counting last remittance.

All the reports made from America, Europe, Buddhist work, and others are very encouraging and show the whole movement to be in an excellent condition. Finally the President announces that he has, after due consultation with the American, European, and Indian General Secretaries who with him compose the council of the T.S., revised the General Constitution, making in respect to the term of office of the President the rule of seven years "in the belief that a satisfactory incumbent will be indefinitely reelected, while an unsatisfactory one should not be immovably fixed in office". This rule has no application to Col. Olcott, who is president for life.

WORLD'S FAIR THEOSOPHICAL CONGRESS FUND.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTAL ACCOUNT.

Surplus reported in February PATH,	$ 80.91
Additional sales of reports, to January 31st,	50.60
Apparent surplus,	$167.51
Expenses of postage, etc., to be deducted when reports are all sold.

USE OF THE SURPLUS.

In February PATH I announced that the surplus would be divided according to the wish of the three Sections. As the Theosophical Meeting at the Midwinter Fair at San Francisco will involve the payment of travel of at least one delegate from the Atlantic Coast or the Middle States, I shall apply the surplus to that purpose, which is in line with the object of the original fund. Of this, notice has been sent to the President, Col. Olcott, in India.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE,

NEW YORK, February 15th, 1894.

THE SUPPORT OF THE T.S.

Our thanks are specially due to A.M.S., Somerville, Mass., this month for almost the entire increase in the fund that can be reported. Some months ago a small group began holding meetings there, and one result is an increase of five members in one of our classes. If all will do as well, the ultimate success of our undertaking will be assured.

I am informed by a correspondent in the east that there are many members of the T.S., even Secretaries of Branches, who know nothing about the Fund, or even of its existence. Will every pledger see to it that no Fellow of his acquaintance remains in ignorance? We want the aid of everyone who desires to help.

My report for the month is as follows:

New pledgers in the ten cents per month class:—A.P., F.W., A.C., B.H., H.W. Total per year, $6.00.

New pledger in the twenty-five cents per month class:—H. J. B. Total per year, $3.00.

Total subscribers previously reported, 78. Pledgers dropped since last report, 2. Pledgers added since last report, 6. Present total, 82. Total value of fund previously reported, $861.85. Amount pledged by new subscribers, $9.00. Gross value of Fund to date, $870.85. Amount to be deducted on account of withdrawals, $10. Net value of Fund to date, $860.85. Decrease since last report, $1.00. I don't want it to occur again!

Meeting held at
No 46 Irving Place

on Wednesday evening, September 8th. 1875.

In consequence of a proposal of Col. Henry S. Olcott, that a society be formed for the study and elucidation of Occultism, the Catalpa<sup>re</sup>, the ladies and gentlemen then and there present resolved themselves into a meeting, and, upon motion of Mr. W. Q. Judge it was Resolved, that Col. H. S. Olcott take the chair.

Upon motion it was also

Resolved, that Mr. W. Q. Judge, act as secretary.

The Chair then called for the names of those persons present, who would agree to found and belong to a Society such as had been mentioned. The following persons handed their names to the Secretary:

Col. Olcott, Wm. H. P. Mavorahy, Chas. Sotheran,
Dr. Chas. E. Simmons, H. D. Manacheris, C. C. Mansey of London, W. L. Olden, G. H. Felt, D. E. deKare, Dr. Britten, Wm. E. H. Britten, Henry J. Newton, John
Honor Cott, J. H. Cott, W. Q. Judge, Wm. Davis

Upon motion of Herbert D. Manacheris, it was Resolved, that a committee of three be appointed by the chair, to draft a constitution and by-laws, and to report the same at the next meeting.

Upon motion it was

Resolved, that the chair be added to the committee.

The Chair then appointed Messrs. H. J. Newton, H. M. Stevens, and C. Sotheran to be sub-committee.

Upon motion it was

Resolved, that we now adjourn until Monday
Sept. 13th, at the same place, 8 P. M.

H. S. Olcott Chairman.
William Q. Judge Secretary.

HISTORIC THEOSOPHICAL LEAVES.

FIRST LEAF.<sup>1</sup>

From the Minute Book of the Theosophical Society the leaves here used are taken. The first is the very first page in the handwriting of Bro. John Storer Cobb, now in the city of Boston, U.S., done by him at the time from the notes in pencil taken during the meeting. A plate has been made of it by photographic process, thus giving a fac-simile, but slightly reduced in size so as to fit the PATH. There is a very small error to be noted. The proceedings were in fact thus: the persons named being present, Bro. William Q. Judge rose and assumed the place of Chairman and at once proposed Col. Olcott as permanent Chairman, which motion was carried as noted. The error is in not giving Bro. Judge as the chairman for the first few moments. This meeting was held at the rooms of H.P.B. in Irving Place, New York. As Col. Olcott has passed beyond this point in his "Old Diary Leaves", it is thought these leaves will add to the historical interest of his narrative.

SECOND LEAF.

The next leaf selected from the same book is of the meeting of September 18th, 1875, ten days having elapsed while the Committee on Name was at work. This minute shows the selection of our present name. It reads as follows:

MEETING HELD AT 46 IRVING PLACE ON MONDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 18th, 1875.

Mr. George H. Felt continued from the previous meeting, September 8th, the interesting description of his discoveries on the Cabala, which were illustrated by a number of colored diagrams. After a discussion thereon, matters in reference to the proposed Society were made the order of the day.

Col. H. S. Olcott presided and Mr. Charles Sotheran acted as Secretary.

The Committee on Preamble and By-Laws reported progress, and Mr. D. E. de Lara read a paper which he had been requested to write for the Committee.

At the suggestion of the Committee it was upon motion

RESOLVED, that the name of the Society be "The Theosophical Society".

Upon motion it was

RESOLVED, that a committee be appointed to select suitable rooms for the meetings of the Society and report at the next meeting.

The chair appointed the Rev. J. H. Wiggin and Mr. Charles Sotheran, and upon motion the chair was added.

Several persons then gave in their names, or were proposed for membership, and upon motion it was

RESOLVED, that these names be added to the list of founders.

Upon motion it was

RESOLVED, that we now adjourn, subject to the call of the chair.

H. S. OLCOTT, Chairman.

JOHN STORER COBB for

C. SOTHERAN, Secretary.

THIRD LEAF.

After two meetings held October 16 and 30, the one at which the President delivered his inaugural address was held at the rooms selected at 64 Madison Avenue. This minute is on page seven of the book. The rooms are those occupied for some time by the Aryan Theosophical Society, and are known as Mott Memorial Hall, a medical library and meeting place. While delivering the address Col. Olcott stood at the right side of the platform that is south of it, and H. P. B. sat among the hearers on the north side of the room. These little particulars will interest historians and lovers of particularity. The record is as follows:

MEETING HELD AT No. 64 MADISON AVENUE, ON WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 17th, 1875.

The meeting was called to order at 8.15 P. M. Henry S. Olcott, President in the chair

The minutes of the previous meeting were read and approved; and the Rev. George H. Hepworth and Mrs. Charles Sotheran were nominated for fellowship.

Letters from Vice-President George H. Felt and Mr. D. E. de Lara expressing regret at their absence from the meeting were then read, after which the president delivered his Inaugural Address.

At the conclusion of which it was MOVED by Treasurer Newton that a vote of thanks be presented to the president for his able address, and that the address be printed.

MOVED by T. F. Thomas as an amendment, that the address be stereotyped and five hundred copies be printed for immediate distribution.

This amendment being accepted by Treasurer Newton, the resolution as amended was put to the meeting and carried unanimously.

Upon motion it was resolved that we now adjourn.

H. S. OLCOTT, President.

J. STORER COBB, Recording Secretary.

REINCARNATION OF ANIMALS.

VERY little has been said on the question whether or not the theory of Reincarnation applies to animals in the same way as to man. Doubtless if Brahman members well acquainted with Sanscrit works on the general subject were to publish their views, we should at least have a large mass of material for thought and find many clues to the matter in the Hindu theories and allegories. Even Hindu folk-lore would suggest much. Under all popular "superstitions" a large element of truth can be found hidden away when the vulgar notion is examined in the light of the Wisdom-Religion. A good instance of this on the material plane is to be found in the new treatment proposed for small-pox. The old superstition was that all patients with that disease must be treated and kept in darkness. But the practise was given up by modern doctors. Recently, however, some one had the usual "flash" and decided that perhaps the chemical rays of the sun had something to do with the matter, and began to try red glass for all windows where small-pox patients were. Success was reported, the theory being that the disease was one where the chemical rays injured the skin and health just as they do in ordinary sunburn. Here we see, if the new plan be found right, that an old superstition was based on a law of nature. In the same way the folk-lore of such an ancient people as the Hindu deserves scrutiny with the object of discovering the buried truth. If they are possessed of such notions regarding the fate of animals, careful analysis might give valuable suggestion.

Looking at the question in the light of Theosophical theories, we see that a wide distinction exists between man and animals. Man reincarnates as man because he has got to the top of the present scale of evolution. He cannot go back, for Manas is too much developed. He has a Devachan because he is a conscious thinker. Animals cannot have Manas so much developed, and so cannot be self-conscious in the sense that man is. Besides all this, the animal kingdom, being lower, has the impulse still to rise to higher forms. But here we have the distinct statement by the Adepts through H. P. B. that while possibly animals may rise higher in their own kingdom they cannot in this evolution rise to the human stage, as we have reached the middle or turning-point in the fourth round. On this point H. P. B. has, in the second volume of the Secret Doctrine (first ed.) at p. 196, a foot note as follows:

In calling the animal "soulless" it is not depriving the beast, from the humblest to the highest species, of a "soul", but only of a conscious surviving Ego-soul, i. e., that principle which survives after a man and reincarnates in a like man.

The animal has an astral body that survives the physical form for a short period; but its (animal) Monad does not reincarnate in the same, but in a higher species, and has no "Devachan" of course. It has the seeds of all the human principles in itself; but they are latent.

Here the distinction above adverted to is made. It is due to the Ego-Soul, that is, to Manas with Buddhi and Atma. Those principles being latent in the animal, and the door to the human kingdom being closed, they may rise to higher species but not to the man stage. Of course also it is not meant that no dog or other animal ever reincarnates as dog, but that the monad has tendency to rise to a higher species, whatever that be, whenever it has passed beyond the necessity for further experience as "dog". Under the position the author assumes it would be natural to suppose that the astral form of the animal did not last long, as she says, and hence that astral appearances or apparitions of animals were not common. Such is the fact. I have heard of a few, but very few, cases where a favorite animal made an apparitional appearance after death, but even the prolific field of spiritualism has not many instances of the kind. And those who have learned about the astral world know that human beings assume in that world the form of animal or other things which they in character most resemble, and that this sort of apparition is not confined to the dead but is more common among the living. It is by such signs that clairvoyants know the very life and thought of the person before them. It was under the operation of this law that Swedenborg saw so many curious things in his time.

The objection based on the immense number of animals both alive and dead as calling for a supply of monads in that stage can be met in this way. While it is stated that no more animal monads can enter on the man-stage, it is not said nor inferred that the incoming supply of monads for the animal kingdom has stopped. They may still be coming in from other worlds for evolution among the animals of this globe. There is nothing impossible in it, and it will supply the answer to the question, Where do the new animal monads come from, supposing that all the present ones have exhausted the whole number of higher species possible here? It is quite possible also that the animal monads may be carried on to other members of the earth-chain in advance of man for the purpose of necessary development, and this would lessen the number of their appearances here. For what keeps man here so long is that the power of his thought is so great as to make a Devachan for all lasting some fifteen centuries—with exceptions—and for a number who desire “heaven” a Devachan of enormous length. The animals, however, being devoid of developed Manas, have no Devachan and must be forced onwards to the next planet in the chain. This would be consistent and useful, as it gives them a chance for development in readiness for the time when the monads of that kingdom shall begin to rise to a new human kingdom. They will have lost nothing, but, on the contrary, will be the gainers.

NECESSITY OF ILLUSION IN DEVACHAN.<sup>1</sup>

SO much is said in Theosophical literature of the evils of illusion, and so many are the warnings against its influence, that most Theosophists are sensitive to the very word. Particularly is there felt a hardship at the apparent unreality of Devachan. After thirty, fifty, seventy years of subjection to all the mistakes, misconceptions, beguilements of an illusionary existence, it does seem grievous that the centuries of Devachanic life should be but a continuance of them, it to be succeeded by another period of deceptive earth-experience, and the series of alternate illusions to extend indefinitely. And yet the anomaly may be explained, even justified.

But before such attempt, one should observe our arbitrary reversal of the terms "real" and "unreal". So accustomed are we to attribute reality to physical objects which may be seen and handled and examined, and to consider as visionary the contents of the super-physical world, that that only has become veritable to us which is material. And yet this it is which changes hourly, which is in perpetual state of flux, which cannot have fixedness or continuity; while the truly enduring, that which passes on undecayed through time, is the Mind, the Soul, the Spiritual Being. "The things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal".

But in this discussion one must use the terms in their ordinary sense, and, so doing, the subject divides itself into two propositions: 1st, that illusion is inevitable in Devachan, a requirement to its functions, inseparable from its nature; 2d, that illusion is a necessity to the progress of the Soul therein.

There are three considerations which go to prove the former of these propositions. The first is that the soul is as yet unfitted for the sphere of pure realities. It is, indeed, freed from the lower quaternary, and as Atma-Buddhi-Manas has passed the Devachanic portal. But it is fresh from earth-life; its interests and conceptions, however purged from lower quality and now the rarefied extract of highest experiences, are still colored from its late career; Manas is saturated with recent thought and habit. How impossible to translate the yet unfinished being to a region for which it is not fitted and the contents of which it is yet unable to appropriate! There is a homely proverb of "a fish out of water". The fish dwells in a dense medium, extracting from it by its gills the finer element—air—which pervades the water, thus maintaining its life. But place it entirely in that finer element and life becomes impossible because of that fineness; the fish gasps and struggles and dies. And so the soul, long accustomed to extract its nutriment of thought from the surrounding matter of terrestrial life, could not maintain itself as yet in a world of pure reality, but would succumb from the very perfection of its environment.

In the second place, there must persist an element of illusion so long as any trace of matter inheres in an organism. Imagine the spiritual realm and the material realm as at opposite ends of a prolonged line. As a spiritual being leaves its home and follows down that line, it reaches a point where the first faint aroma of matter is perceived. At once begins a slight illusionary tendency. As the being approaches more and more nearly the material realm, denser and denser grows the matter, and stronger and stronger the illusion; so that at the extremity of the line reality is farthest from perception and mistake rules. Reverse the process. The being leaves the material for the spiritual. As it does so and as the atmosphere rarefies, little by little illusionary proclivities drop away, the vision clears, the actual comes steadily into view. Yet not till the last trace of material association has been overpassed does illusion sink wholly to the rear. But in Devachan this is ungained. Higher Manas has still the aroma, the memory, the interests of its late embodiment in flesh, and with them must retain that illusion which pertains to the material sphere.

In the third place, we must remember the function of Devachan. It is two-fold, and one part is Happiness. But happiness is an individual thing, and consists to each man in the realization of his own ideal. There must be as many varieties of Devachan as there are varieties of Devachanees, each finding there the highest of his aspirations and hopes. Yet to all there is this common element,—that they are subjective conditions of the soul, with no corresponding objective reality, yet none the less actual, none the less certain. A man is a philosopher, a student, a scientist. The attainment of truth is his delight, and the means to which alone he is accustomed and of which he can conceive are books and scientific treatises and philosophical apparatus. His dream is of a future world where research is vastly facilitated, where the newest discoveries are spread broad-cast, where apparatus exists so delicate and fine that ours appears but the clumsiest of contrivance. And yet is it possible in the supersensuous world that libraries and printing presses and experimental tools are to be as here? Is a disembodied soul, removed from the gross and the tangible, to continue handling and reading and testing? Impossible. But in the mind within, those processes may go on, and with all the reality of an actual experience may continue their educative function till their need has been overpassed. Take the artist, he whose soul is instinct with visions of beauty in form and color and suggestiveness. He looks for a land where transcendent glories flush the spirit, where light never seen on earthly seas and shores fills with measureless delight. Yet in Devachan there can be no Alpine sunrise, no picture gallery, no canvas or marble whereon he can work out his inspiration. Is he to be disappointed, or is the fullest of all possible satiations to expand his inner nature in a subjective, but a real, experience? Take the musician Harmony and melody and perfect expression make his very life. Yet he knows their inadequacy to portray all that the soul can sense, and so he anticipates in heaven a feast unattained, unattainable here. There are to be the richest orchestrations, the noblest symphonies, the most glorious operas, the most entrancing voices and instruments, every elevated taste finding its amplest gratification. But are there opera-houses, orchestras, trained singers in Devachan? Or are those supernal joys in the soul within, in some strange way provided by beneficent Nature,—an illusion, if you please, because without a counterpart in fact, yet the reality of reality to him who is their subject.

The profoundest of all human emotions is Affection. Broken, disappointed, severed often here, it gazes onward to a land where sorrow is unknown and partings never to be feared. The mother leaves her child, the wife her husband, the friend his friend, calmed with the assurance that it is but for a time, and then will be the joy of an endless reunion. More than anything else is this conception of heaven; and you might fill the future world with every possible joy to intellect and soul, enrich it with the lavishness of a Divine treasury, yet all would be vain if the one desire was absent, all a desolation if the heart was chilled, unfed. If the beloved was away, heaven would be no heaven to the inmate. And yet see how impossible is such presence in any literal sense. If to the happiness of a Devachanee the actual existence there of the loved one is essential, then the child must accompany the departing mother, the husband the wife, the friend the friend. Would it be just that these should be cut off before their time, that they should be unwillingly deprived of their right to life merely that another might be made happy? But more than this. Every beloved has his beloveds, each has others dear and cherished; so that if they too are to be happy their loved ones must go with them; and thus the circle widens, widens without the possibility of stop. What follows? The death of a single individual would depopulate the world.

And so we see that illusion is a necessity to Devachan, that it cannot but exist, that the bliss of the soul is interior, not a reflection from objective surroundings.

Turn now to the second proposition: Illusion is a necessity to the progress of the soul in Devachan. Here again there are three considerations. The first is as to that progress itself, progress being the twin of happiness in the two-fold function. It would be a grievous mistake to suppose that the long centuries of Devachanic rest are but an idle dream, the soul making no advance, learning no new truth, a stationary thing in a universe of evolu tion, emerging from Devachan precisely as it entered it. H. P. B. distinctly states the contrary. And, indeed, it would be but reasonable to expect that in a world from which gross matter and its influences are excluded, a world finer than this, closer to reality, more in touch with eternal truth, there must be avenues to learning, facilities for progress, which we cannot now divine. Clogs from flesh and blood are removed. Prejudices, antipathies, limitations have vanished with the relinquished personality. New and larger methods, regions, pursuits open to the unfolding nature. And yet there is a condition to this finer state. It is that all obstruction though pain shall be effaced. How often in this present world an indigestion has made impossible a thought, a fever has paralyzed an aspiration, a head-ache has conquered a prayer! True, all physical evils are absent from Devachan because the body is; yet internal griefs are as fatal to progress as are external, and so from that progressing state must be banished every sorrow and memory and foreboding and regret which could arrest the Ego's march. But this, as we have seen, is not consistent with fact; it is an illusion, however indispensable to our needs.

Another consideration is that man is to round in his career the whole circle of experience, and so no segment of it can be omitted. At eras in his earth-pilgrimage he has tasted unqualified misery: he must now taste its antithesis,—unqualified happiness. Yet this, as has been shown, is impossible through literal presence of conditions: they must be supplied by an illusionary belief.

And a third consideration is that "Nature does nothing by leaps". As a human soul evolves slowly up to that stature which lifts it above all deception or mistake and fits it for the realm of absolute reality, it parts from its illusions but gradually and by degrees. The great Law which pervades the rest of the Universe is not absent from Devachan. The Ego enters it as a pilgrim on his pilgrimage, not as a victor on his goal. And yet we may well believe that as centuries pass on and the changed existence modifies the character and its modes, there may come a truer view of all its inner life, a closer touch with real things. Illusion may steadily be mitigated as it is outgrown, direct percipience of fact taking steadily the place of imagination as a guide. And so when the Devachanic interlude is over, the Ego may return for its new incarnation with clearer views of truth, a less clouded sense of spiritual verities, a firmer hold on ultimate reality.

Thus we see, then, not only that there can be no Devachan without illusion, but that the very progress in Devachan is conditioned upon that illusion, and that the illusion must continue till its function has been fulfilled. When a man has become a Master, when he perceives not as through a glass darkly but face to face, illusion has no longer power over him, Devachan has become an impossibility, he is done with it forevermore.

I think that these truths should correct our attitude to Devachan. We should not look upon it as a deceptive state continuing the evils against which we vainly struggle here, but as a needful, an unavoidable experience wherein are found compensation for all the bitternesses encountered outside of it, a happiness adapted to the weary pilgrim, a gradual emancipation from the evils of illusion itself. There need not be suspicion of it, a protest against its wisdom, a saddened resignation to the inevitable. May there not be even a thankfulness for it? In the many hours of sorrow here, when hopes dearest to the heart are prostrated in the dust and the very life-blood of the spirit seems to ebb despairingly away, it is something to remember that these sacred desires are only postponed, not blasted, and that not a worthy wish or thought or purpose shall be permanently vain. All will revive in that sun-lit realm, and there in copious fulness delight the soul once desolated and forlorn. Infinite Wisdom and Infinite Love have framed a scene where each best hope of heart and mind shall bloom into a glorious fruitage.

It is said of the poet Burns that there was one passage in the Bible which he could never read without emotion: "And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes". Well, in a sense this is true of Devachan. The pathway of humanity as it goes onward to its heights is over many a broken heart, many a desolated life, many an extinguished hope, and it passes through many a starless night. And yet there are breaks, long breaks whereon not a shadow throws its chill, but where life and light and cheer are without a drawback. Those portals are open to every noble thought and desire and aspiration, and all accompany the pilgrim as he steps into the sunbeams, but they are rigorously barred to every pain or grief or disappointment. There sorrow finds its end; the very causes of sorrow are obliterated; and not a tear shall ever be wiped away, for none shall ever form.

THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY AND REFORMS.

A CONVERSATION.

ZEALOUS THEOSOPHIST. Don't you think the Theosophical Society ought to take some definite stand on questions of reform?

Constitutional Theosophist. What put that into your head? Are you a Nationalist or a Single Taxer?

Z. T. I was reading that "Chat on the Roof" in February Theosophist, where one of the chatters says: "I believe the T.S. must sooner or later adopt a definite attitude toward this question of reform", and although he speaks in reference to Hindu social problems, still it is just as important here as there, while the circumstances are different. The "chat" did not in any way settle the point, but left it all up in the clouds of talk. But we ought to do something.

C. T. Evidently the conversation published is an expression of a desire to get a prominent Theosophist like Mrs. Besant to throw herself on the side of some social question there, forgetting that it is not one or two persons who make up our movement and that our Constitution rules in such matters and not persons. If you mean that the Society should as an organization take "a definite stand" such as seems called for in that "chat," I cannot agree with you.

Z. T. Do you mean that you are opposed to social or other reforms?

C. T. No, I do not. Whatever reforms are needed—and there are many—they should be taken up by individuals or the State, but that is a very different thing from asking the Theosophical Society to adopt a definite attitude either way. It has been proposed that the T.S. should formally approve of hypnotic suggestion as a means of curing drunkenness, lying, and stealing. Why not have us go in for that as well as social reforms? Those vices have a great deal to do with social difficulties.

Z. T. Well, why not? Take definite corporate action, and then members will have something tangible to talk of and to work for.

C. T. A few members, you mean; the rest would leave the Society. Divisions would arise and sides be taken. But the proposal is contrary to our Constitution, it is against the very reason for our existence, it nullifies our organic law, it is contrary to the spirit of the Society. The Constitution wisely prohibits the adoption of such definite attitudes. This applies to every doctrine, to all schemes, save the doctrine of Universal Brotherhood, the one idea on which men of all religions will agree. Other doctrines and plans have supporters and opponents; they have no majority; but Universal Brotherhood has a constant and growing majority of supporters. One would have supposed that this "Chat on the Roof" of the building where was reposing the recently revised Constitution of the T.S., certified and published, should have led to some of the chatters adverting to this fundamental point before the conversation was printed. That revision puts the matter in strong terms, thus:

The society does not interfere with caste rules or other social observances, nor with politics, and any such interference in its name is a breach of the Constitution.

And immediate expulsion is the penalty fixed for violation of this rule.

Z. T. Then you place social questions and reforms under the same ban as religious doctrines and creeds, in so far as definite corporate action by the T.S. goes?

C. T. Most certainly. Why, man, reflect a moment. Is it not true that H. P. Blavatsky, H. S. Olcott, and William Q. Judge have always since 1875 proclaimed their personal belief in the Mahatmas or Masters as facts and ideals?

Z. T. Yes, they have; and of course had a perfect right to do so, as they never said it was a T.S. belief.

C. T. Well, have they not persistently said that this belief, regarded by many as vital, has no place in our Constitution and cannot be—must not be—erected into a T.S. dogma either directly or inferentially? It stands precisely with social reforms so far as "definite attitude" is concerned. But, curiously enough, there are those who loudly object to the expression of personal beliefs by such as have firm ones regarding Mahatmas, while at the same time the objectors would heedlessly violate the Constitution by having us adopt some definite attitude toward a passing question of social reform.

Z. T. I think I begin to see that in zealotry for getting into the gaze of the world I had almost forgotten that we are a free Society, wholly unattached, founded on toleration, neutrally situated between all contentions, and drawing our support from men considered as souls and not from any sectarian or separatist feeling. That must be why you did not encourage or discourage nationalism, but opposed the endorsement of it by the T. S.

C. T. Precisely. Had we endorsed that social movement, where should we be now? Opposed by every man and woman who is not a nationalist. But at the same time recollect that many members of the T.S. were prominent in the starting of that movement when it began in Boston. Similarly with questions in India. Were the T.S. involved with widow-remarriage, it would be violently opposed by a large body of men who found their opposition to such marriages on the religious books of the land. We might as well be asked to endorse and support Moslemism against purely theological Hinduism. A good man can live under any form of government or social order. What we should strive to do is to increase that toleration for every one which alone will open up men's minds to the truth.

Z. T. Do you know of any striking instance in our history to illustrate these points?

C. T. Yes. In the Indian Headquarters once, while H. P. B. was there, a prominent Hindu asked her to get the opinion of her Masters on a question relating to widow-remarriage or that of child-marriage. The opinion was authoritatively refused, although there was an opportunity to enlist many prominent Hindus interested in the question. Had the distinct opinion been given, we should now have to be fighting for it or against it as a dogma. Happily we are free, and supporters and opponents alike of both sides are yet in our ranks.

Z. T. But what definitely is the proper function and attitude of the T.S. in and to social and other reforms?

C. T. Its attitude should be neutral as to any form or method, but not neutral as to the general doctrines of justice and Universal Brotherhood. The latter doctrine supports all applications of justice; it is sufficiently declared in the Constitution; there is no need for further declarations. The function of the T.S. is to give its members aspiration to high ideals; to furnish a free, tolerant platform where all men may assemble if they wish. The bigot—social or theological—who asserts that no one else is right violates in himself the principle of toleration, and has no place on our platform because his nature is intolerant; hence he will either leave the T.S. if he cannot ruin it, or he will be gradually altered by the silent but powerful influence of the toleration, even for his bigotry, which surrounds him in our ranks. Toleration, then, is our watchword, for it is one effect and one expression of brotherhood; that will bring unity in diversity, and with diverse elements held in one bond our strength would be invincible.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

AMONG the "Friends" whose faces the PAIR has been presenting to its readers few, if any, have a greater claim to a prominent place than "Jasper Niemand". To most an unknown but dear friend, dear because of the heart-touching help and light which for many have come from the writings bearing this signature—a nom-de-plume as all must have known. The personality thus veiled hitherto is that of one personally very dear to many an earnest worker in the T.S.: that of Mrs. Archibald Keightley, more widely known perhaps in the ranks of the T.S. under the name of Mrs. J. Campbell Ver-Planck.

Her maiden name in full was Julia Wharton Lewis Campbell, daughter of the Hon. James H. Campbell, a prominent Pennsylvania lawyer. Her father's was a highly distinguished career. He commanded his regiment during the war; served as member of the U.S. Congress for several terms; held two diplomatic commissions under President Lincoln as U.S. Minister to Sweden and Norway, and subsequently to Bogotá in South America. Her mother was Juliet Lewis, daughter of Chief Justice Ellis Lewis of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, a writer of verse possessing great poetical charm and value.

Mrs. Keightley's childhood was chiefly passed among the Pennsylvania mountains, and later on the continent of Europe, where she was educated and entered the Society of foreign courts at the early age of sixteen. Even then she had already developed the literary talent for which the members of both branches of her family had been noted, and had displayed for generations in the occupations of their leisure hours. Her early writings consisted of translations from the poems of the present and late Kings of Sweden, in original verse, tales and descriptions published in Harper's Magazine, the Galaxy, and other periodicals, under her own name as well as the nom-de-plume of "Esperance". That the work itself was of fine quality is shown by the fact that full market rates were always gladly paid for it; while the deeper tendencies in the writer's nature are seen in the fact that the spur to exertion lay in the desire to give for the helping of others somewhat she had herself earned, and not merely the superfluity of that wealth which the accident of birth—or Karma?—had placed at her command. The child is truly the father of the man—or woman; and how happy must she have been when feeling so early that she could already, by her own efforts, do something to lessen the misery of others?

*Jasper Niemand.

Miss Julia W. L. Campbell (as she then was) married in 1871 Mr. Philip W. VerPlanck of New York; and six years later, in the course of a single year, she lost her husband and both sons suddenly by a most dramatic series of reverses—including dangers and losses of many kinds. Long and terrible illness followed these sudden blows.

During her recovery Mrs. VerPlanck wrote her two successful plays, "The Puritan Maid" and "Sealed Instructions", the latter having had a marked success during two seasons at the Madison Square Theatre, New York, as well as throughout the country.

To turn from the outer to the inner life. By long established family custom, Mrs. VerPlanck belonged to the Episcopal Church—"The Church of England"—but she found no spiritual life there. Indeed, she had ceased to seek for any such life, content apparently with the ideals of literature and art, in a happy domestic and social circle where leisure and refined conditions permitted the cultivation of personal gifts. Yet an interior want now and then made itself felt.

One day, however, quite by chance as it were, when lunching with her close friend, Mrs. Anna Lynch Botta, the name of Madame Blavatsky was mentioned, and mentioned as that of an exposed fraud. From thence to Theosophy was but a step; Mrs. VerPlanck had never heard of either, and Mrs. Botta, whose circle comprised almost every distinguished member of society at home and abroad (that well-known circle unique in American life), invited her friend to accompany her to hear Mr. Arthur Gebhard speak on Theosophy to Mrs. Ole Bull, Mrs. Celia Thaxter, and others in the drawing room of a friend. The impression made upon Mrs. VerPlanck was so deep that she joined the T.S. within two weeks, and thenceforward began her unceasing work for Theosophy.

Living with her parents at a distance from New York she wrote for the PATH under the names of "Julius", "August Waldensee", "J", and later on as "Jasper Niemand", as well as unsigned articles, and also corresponded with T.S. enquirers. In those days writers were so few in the Society that they had to take several names, and often one would write up the notes or finish the articles of another.

In answer to some enquirers as to the "Jasper Niemand" writings, Mrs. Keightley writes: "When I began to write articles along these lines, H.P.B. sent me a pen which I always used. The articles were and are always written in full objective consciousness, but at these times there is a feeling of inspiration, of greater mental freedom. The Letters that have helped me were received at my Pennsylvania home. They were written for me and for Dr. Keightley—and for the use of others later on—by Mr. W. Q. Judge, at the express wish of H. P. Blavatsky. The letter which is the source of this request, and which conveys assurance of Mr. Judge's qualifications for the office of instructor, purported to be written through Madame Blavatsky (it begins 'Says Master'), and is one of those so ably described by Col. H. S. Olcott in the Theosophist for July, 1893, where he says that communications from high occult sources received through H.P.B. always resembled her handwriting".

This modification of H.P.B.'s handwriting is decidedly interesting in the above-mentioned letter, whose data amply justify the manner in which "Z" is spoken of in Niemand's preface. Moreover, H.P.B. spoke of her friend Mr. Judge as the "exile", and Annie Besant wrote later on, "You are indeed fortunate in having W.Q.J. as Chief. Now that H.P.B. has gone, it is the Americans who have as immediate leader the greatest of the exiles".<sup>1</sup>

It is to be hoped that the Editor of the PATH, a journal so indissolubly connected with the Theosophical writings of the subject of this sketch, will not from personal hesitation exclude from its pages information which is really a moderate statement on behalf of "Jasper Niemand" in reply to questions coming from all parts of the world. The statement would have been made earlier, were it not for a wish, on Jasper Niemand's part, to continue helpful private correspondence carried on with many persons who addressed under the protection of her impersonality.

After the departure of H.P.B., Mrs. VerPlanck now and again joined the New York staff of workers as a reinforcement during Mr. Judge's prolonged absences. During one of these periods she met Annie Besant at the Boston Convention of 1891, and there began a friendship destined to evolve as link after link was formed in the chain-mutual of work. Then also was formed the T.S. League of Workers, afterwards inaugurated in Europe.

Mrs. VerPlanck continued to live with her parents in Pennsylvania until the autumn of 1891, when she married Dr. Archibald Keightley of Old Hall, Westmoreland. After a year's residence in New York they were called to England by the health of Dr. Keightley's mother.

<sup>1</sup> The technical meaning of these titles, "Greatest of the Exiles" and "Friend of all Creatures", as employed in the East, is totally unknown in the West; the latter being a phrase that has more than once been applied, half in jest, to W.Q.J. by his intimates on account of his often enforced doctrine of "accepting all men and all things"—providing they work for Theosophy.—B.K.

During Annie Besant's absence in India, Mrs. Keightley has temporarily taken up a part of her work at the London Headquarters, and in consequence has been residing there for several months.

And here this sketch ends for the present. It is not for me to say more, nor to dwell upon the respect and affection which its subject has gained in her new sphere of duty. But I know that I voice the earnest wish of all in expressing the hope that many years of equally fruitful and valuable work for our beloved Cause still lie before her.

BERTRAM KEIGHTLEY.

CONVERSATIONS ON OCCULTISM WITH H.P.B.

IN 1875, '76, '77, and '78 my intimacy with H.H.B. gave me many opportunities for conversing with her on what we then called "Magic". These useful, and for me very wonderful, occasions came about late at night, and sometimes during the day. I was then in the habit of calling on her in the day-time whenever I could get away from my office. Many times I stayed in her flat for the purpose of hearing as much and seeing as much as I could. Later on, in 1884, I spent many weeks with her in the Rue Notre Dame des Champs in Paris, sitting beside her day after day and evening after evening; later still, in 1888, being with her in London, at Holland Park, I had a few more opportunities. Some of what she said I publish here for the good of those who can benefit by her words. Certainly no greater practical occultist is known to this century: from that point of view what she said will have a certain useful weight with some.

ON DEVACHAN.

This term was not in use at this time. The conversation was about steps on the Path and returning here again. In answer to a question:

"Yes, you have been here and at this before. You were born with this tendency, and in other lives have met these persons [supposed Adept influences], and they are here to see you for that reason."

Later, when definite terms had come into use, the question raised was whether or not all stayed 1500 years in Devachan.

"Well, Judge, you must know well that under the philosophy we don't all stay there so long. It varies with the character of each. A thoroughly material thinker will emerge sooner than one who is a spiritual philosopher and good. Besides, recollect that all workers for the Lodge, no matter of what degree, are helped out of Devachan if they themselves permit it. Your own idea which you have stated, that 1500 years had not elapsed since you went into Devachan, is correct, and that I tell is what Master himself tells me. So there you are."

PRECIPITATIONS BY MASTERS.

In reply to a question on this she said :

"If you think Master is going to be always precipitating things, you mistake. Yes, He can do it. But most of the precipitations are by chelas who would seem to you almost Masters. I see His orders, and the thoughts and words He wishes used, and I precipitate them in that form ; so does * * * and one or two more."

"Well, what of Their handwritings?"

"Anything you write is your handwriting, but it is not your personal handwriting, generally used and first learned if you assume or adopt some form. Now you know that Masters' handwritings, peculiar and personal to Themselves, are foreign both as to sound and form—Indian sorts, in fact. So They adopted a form in English, and in that form I precipitate Their messages at Their direction. Why B—— almost caught me one day and nearly made a mess of it by shocking me. The message has to be seen in the astral light in fac-simile, and through that astral matrix I precipitate the whole of it. It's different, though, if Master sends me the paper and the message already done. That's why I call these things 'psychological tricks'. The sign of an objective wonder seemed to be required, although a moment's thought will show it is not proof of anything but occult ability. Many a medium has had precipitations before my miserable self was heard of. But blessed is the one who wants no sign. You have seen plenty of these things. Why do you want to ask me? Can't you use your brain and intuition? I've sampled almost the whole possible range of wonders for you. Let them use their brains and intuition with the known facts and the theories given."

IF WHITE MAGICIANS ACT, WHAT THEN?

"Look here ; here's a man who wants to know why the Masters don't interpose at once and save his business. They don't seem to remember what it means for a Master to use occult force. If you explode gunpowder to split a rock you may knock down a house. There is a law that if a White Magician uses his occult power an equal amount of power may be used by the Black one. Chemists invent powders for explosives and wicked men may use them. You force yourself into Master's presence and you take the consequences of the immense forces around him playing on yourself. If you are weak in character anywhere, the Black ones will use the disturbance by directing the forces engendered to that spot and may compass your ruin. It is so always. Pass the boundary that hedges in the occult realm, and quick forces, new ones, dreadful ones, must be met. Then if you are not strong you may become a wreck for that life. This is the danger. This is one reason why Masters do not appear and do not act directly very often, but nearly always by intermediate degrees. What do you say,—'the dual forces in nature'? Precisely, that's just it ; and Theosophists should remember it."

DO MASTERS PUNISH.

"Now I'm not going to tell you all about this. They are just ; They embody the Law and Compassion. Do not for an instant imagine that Masters are going to come down on you for your failures and wrongs, if any. Karma looks out for this. Masters' ethics are the highest. From the standpoint of your question They do not punish. Have I not told you that, much as detractors have cast mud at Them, never will the Masters impose punishment. I cannot see why such a question comes up. Karma will do all the punishing that is necessary."

ABOUT ELEMENTALS.

"It's a long time ago now that I told you this part would not be explained. But I can tell you some things. This one that you and Olcott used to call * * * can't see you unless I let him. Now I will impress you upon it or him so that like a photograph he will remember so far. But you can't make it obey you until you know how to get the force directed. I'll send him to you and let him make a bell."

[In a few days after this the proposed sign was given at a distance from her, and a little bell was sounded in the air when I was talking with a person not interested in Theosophy, and when I was three miles away from H.P.B. On next seeing her she asked if * * * had been over and sounded the bell, mentioning the exact day and time.]

“This one has no form in particular, but is more like a revolving mass of air. But it is, all the same, quite definite, as you know from what he has done. There are some classes with forms of their own. The general division into fiery, airy, earthy, and watery is pretty correct, but it will not cover all the classes. There is not a single thing going on about us, no matter what, that elementals are not concerned in, because they constitute a necessary part of nature, just as important as the nerve currents in your body. Why in storms you should see them how they move about. Don't you remember what you told me about that lady * * * who saw them change and move about at that opera? It was due to her tendencies and the general idea underlying the opera.” [It was the opera of Tristan and Isolde, by Wagner.—J.] “In that case, as Isolde is Irish, the whole idea under it aroused a class of elementals peculiar to that island and its traditions. That's a queer place, Judge, that Ireland. It is packed full of a singular class of elementals; and, by Jove! I see they even have emigrated in quite large numbers. Sometimes one quite by accident rouses up some ancient system, say from Egypt; that is the explanation of that singular astral noise which you said reminded you of a sistrum being shaken; it was really objective. But, my dear fellow, do you think I will give you a patent elemental extractor?—not yet. Bulwer Lytton wrote very wisely, for him, on this subject”.

[Riding over in Central Park, New York.] “It is very interesting here. I see a great number of Indians, and also their elementals, just as real as you seem to be. They do not see us; they are all spooks. But look here, Judge, don't confound the magnetism escaping through your skin with the gentle taps of supposed elementals who want a cigarette.”

[In W. 34th street, New York. The first time she spoke to me of elementals particularly, I having asked her about Spiritualism.—J.]

“It is nearly all done by elementals. Now I can make them tap anywhere you like in this room. Select any place you wish.” [I pointed to a hard plaster wall-space free from objects.] “Now ask what you like that can be answered by taps.”

Q. What is my age? Taps: the correct number.

Q. How many in my house? Taps: right.

Q. How many months have I been in the city? Taps: correct.

Q. What number of minutes past the hour by my watch? Taps: right.

Q. How many keys on my ring? Taps: correct.

H.P.B. "Oh bosh! Let it stop. You won't get any more, for I have cut it off. Try your best. They have no sense; they got it all out of your own head, even the keys, for you know inside how many keys are on the ring, though you don't remember; but anyhow I could see into your pocket and count the number, and then that tapper would give the right reply. There's something better than all that magic nonsense."

SHE PRECIPITATES IN LONDON.

In 1888 I was in London and wanted a paper, with about four sentences written on it in purple ink, which I had left in America. I came down to her room where B. Keightley was, and, not saying anything, sat down opposite H.P.B. I thought: "If only she would get me back somehow a copy of that paper." She smiled at me, rose, went into her room, came out at once, and in a moment handed me a piece of paper, passing it right in front of Keightley. To my amazement it was a duplicate of my paper, a facsimile. I then asked her how she got it, and she replied: "I saw it in your head and the rest was easy. You thought it very clearly. You know it can be done; and it was needed." This was all done in about the time it takes to read these descriptive sentences.

THE FIRE-SELF.<sup>1</sup>

I HUNG from the horns of the moon and the name of the Fire-Self was whispered to me.

(The Fire-Self, the Sage, the Instructor,<sup>2</sup> whose awakener is the memory of man.)

The name of the Fire-Self was whispered from afar; I dropped from the moon<sup>3</sup> the better to hear; dropped, though the moon grew big with desire to detain me.<sup>4</sup>

Into the darkness I fell;<sup>1</sup> icy the rushing breath that bore me to the mouth of the cavern deep and small, the abode whence the Fire-Self springs.<sup>2</sup>

(Forth leaps the Fire-Glory,<sup>3</sup> the one, devouring the man who awaits It.)

That Self came not forth: by many a name I called It.

Called till the echoes were silent,<sup>4</sup> replete with sound and the rejection thereof.

Not a god whose name could conjure it up, the Fire-Self, whispered by the memory of Man.

Memory, when I questioned, upbraided me, saying:

"Is not Fire the devourer of all; of men, gods, powers, even of the worlds in space:

"How has It dealt with the moon, the mother-world from which we fell:

' Has not her light paled before It; how then callest thou upon It by a name:

"Are we not one, I, thou, and It: namest thou That-Which-Is by a sound?.

"I alone am its forerunner. I, Thought, in the stillness reflect It. Hold forth to Itself Its own image, thyself; abandoner of gods and of names."

(So hotly burned memory within me; memory, the servant of the flaming one.)

"Come", I cried; "Come forth, Myself; I alone can receive and maintain Thee".

Thought blazed up as a sudden torch, blazed long, discovering the darkness.

Thrice at the mouth of the cave I called; the third time that Self sprang upon me.

The Fire-Self blazed throughout my being: the man lay in dust and ashes.

In vain the moon poured her chill rays upon his body; the Fire-Self licked them up as it ran: a new man leaped from the scintillant river.

A man without form, without name; a fiery spark in the blazing ocean. In effulgent brightness They walked the skies together. They looked upon the Unutterable.

Said the Flame to the spark : "Let us forth into the Beyond". They knew the omnipotent Darkn ess; together They became one with That. Together they issued forth from That; the Fire and the Spark as one Self, calmed and quenched with Knowledge.

At the mouth of the cave They parted. (They who can never be dissevered. They who can never be dissociated. Rulers in two worlds are They, each in his own, linked by a tense and living cord of Thought, the cord silvered<sup>1</sup> by the conquered moon, the gift giver.)

"Ere They parted, the Fire restored to the man-spark his form: man returned to the Fire-Self a part of Its Knowledge.

"Give me", I cried, "Thy chief secret at parting; let it go with me into the land without substance, where form is the only wisdom".

It fled, but I fled after; I laid my soul against Its fiery vesture.

"Unto me be it given to know Thee as Thou art. Give me Thy name that I may call Thee again; in Thee is my only real Life; a god<sup>2</sup> am I, now I know It".

The Fire-Self upreared, a gigantic pillar: the Devourer of worlds rose before me.<sup>3</sup> The Flame found a voice that was soundless,<sup>4</sup> mightier than the uproar of waters.

"If thou wouldst be Self of Myself, answer me this," said that voice.

"When is the Fire-Self greater than great? Speak aright and abide with Me forever."

"It is greatest when It leads Its sparks forth into the Silence and becomes the One Wisdom", I answered.

The Fire-Self receded, thrusting me forth as spent lava is spued from the volcano.

"Greatest am I"—spake the Glory, remonstrant, "when Man, the spark struck from myself, spends my Wisdom in the service of his fellows".

"Better is it", said the Fire-Self, "to give the heart knowledge to the hungry and the thirsty, than to over-run with Me the azure

"But when thou bringest back the Memory thereof, when thou spendest that Life for thy fellows, That thou art to which I shall return; thou art thyself the goal called 'Great Compassion': to reach that goal I spend myself upon the worlds in space. Great is Wisdom, but greater is the use thereof. Be thou my outrunner; attain that Consciousness and the use thereof for Me. Call upon me then and I obey thee: My doors open only when the heart of man beats against them, calling in the name of its fellow man".

DHYANAM--MEDITATION.

DHYANAM is from the root Dhya; it means want of motion and one-pointedness. The main point is to free the mind from the power of the senses, and with the light fixed "to raise a current of thought" to the exclusion of all other matters. The particular time and place, the particular Asana or posture, and the particular Dik (direction North or East), enjoined in our Shastras are aids, but not indispensably necessary. Dhyanam is divided in the Yoga Shastra into three parts; the preliminary is called Dharana, then comes Dhyanam proper, and then Samadhi, the last having many subdivisions needless to enumerate here. The subject of meditation should be either one's own spirit or Atma (the Higher Self) or a Prateeka. Prateeka generally means a Higher Being, a Deva or a Rishee. Of all the Asanas, Padmasana is the best, being the easiest; lying down brings on sleep, while standing tires the body; the meditator should therefore sit. The time and place should be so selected as to be free from all external disturbances (such as the rats, the gnats, the high-wind, etc.), and the practice should be regularly followed till death. The best seat is that which consists of a mat of Kusa grass, with a piece of deerskin spread over it and a piece of silk at the top. The reason for such a seat is not given; perhaps the seat was found by experience to aid concentration.

Withdraw the senses from the objects to which they are attached, say our Shastras, live a pure life both internal and external, then practice meditation daily, regularly, and with zeal, and then a change will come over you when your Karma would no longer be able to bind you, when the true nature of Atma will be understood by you, when you shall be free in the true sense of the term.

Who can be called happy without peace of mind? And what peace of mind can there be without Yoga? Tossed by the waves of this sensuous existence, mistaking the mirage for a cool stream of clear water, the thirsty pilgrim runs after worldly enjoyment to find disappointment and death at last; again and again, birth after birth, the lesson is taught until the traveller, weary with his wanderings, looks upward and beholds the effulgent light of Gnanam. Then his Karma ceases to bind him, his third eye turns Karma into ashes, in its last effort to conquer him, and the awakened Shiva is again united to the Goddess of Wisdom, Durga, the Path of Sorrow.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ON "OCEAN OF THEOSOPHY."

LIFE AND DEATH.

SIR: Will you kindly explain a little more fully what you mean by the following passage in the Ocean of Theosophy, p. 36: "So in sleep we are again absorbing and not resisting the Life Energy; when we wake we are throwing it off. But as it exists around us like an ocean in which we swim, our power to throw it off is necessarily limited. Just when we wake we are in equilibrium as to our organs and life; when we fall asleep we are yet more full of life than in the morning. It has exhausted us; it finally kills the body".

If we are throwing off the life energy during the day, how is it that we are more full of life in the evening than in the morning? STUDENT.

Manchester, England.

As said above, our power to throw off the life force accumulated is limited. From this limitation it results that we come to a point when our resistance grows less, just as in the entire life-span a year comes when we begin to go down the hill of life. As it lessens we are drawing near to the hour when the need of sleep will arise. Sleep is that condition of the body needed for procuring the equilibrium between jiva and the body. Equilibrium is about established when we wake, and then the organs begin to resist the further influx of life and to throw off some of what we have taken in. Life constantly presses us just as the electric fluid tries to fill the object placed in the electric field; we cannot resist this pressure every day beyond a certain number of hours, and we fall asleep because Life has disturbed the equilibrium. Resting in sleep, that equilibrium is again established, to be again overcome the next day, or, rather, in the next period of activity. This constant struggle being kept up for years, the bodily organs are not able to stand the wear and tear, and hence the body dies. Thus Life destroys the body. Construe the words "throwing it off" as meaning resisting it, and you will dispel the slight confusion arising in a book written so quickly as this one.

ON KARMA.

SIR: 1. On p. 97 of Ocean you refer to the treatment of the Red Indians by the Americans, and seem to take for granted that the Indians did not merit such treatment. 2. Again, you say those Indians will be reborn in conquering peoples. If so, would not this process of retaliation go on constantly? 3. Animals seem to suffer and enjoy. If absolute justice rules, how do you account for their case? E.L.

Ans. 1. I fully agree that if people go on retaliating or hurting each other, evils will never cease and there will be an endless series of hates. But I do not take it for granted that the Indians did not merit in the eye of Karma as a law what they received. But man is not that law. His duty is compassion. The Americans as a higher race should have treated the Indians kindly instead of robbing and murdering them. Inevitably they will on their next rebirth follow out that practice and influence. But if we know Karma as the law, then we must act in the line of compassion and slowly but surely destroy the hate that exists, replacing it by love. We are not conscious agents of Karma. If we assume that position we assume to judge and execute, and may refuse to take up the good Karma of helping another who has offended. It is just the constant retaliation of men educated under such laws as the Mosaic or any like it, which has created a civilization of retaliation, of selfishness, and egotistical individualism. No. 2 is included in this reply. 3. Animals have Karma, or consequence of act, but they have not man's responsibility. While they seem to suffer and enjoy, it is all without any self-consciousness, and hence is less in itself and less lasting in effect. Their karma is bound up with man, and he is the responsible one and will have to bear the responsibility, although they feel the burden directly. All of the foregoing is, of course, my own opinion.

LITERARY NOTES.

FEBRUARY THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XXIII." narrates many astonishing phenomena by H.P.B., each inexplicable otherwise than as by occult power. Then, too, the old loving, tender, reverent tone to his friend and teacher marks the author's style. "A Chat on the Roof" revives the capital idea of several years ago, though by an inferior hand, and not commendable in so far as it aims to goad Mrs. Besant into Indian politics and social movements. "Evolution and Ethics", by Richard Harte, is a very able review of Prof. Huxley's lecture. Most acute in thought, lucid in style, delightful in composition, it is in every respect a gem, and naturally evokes acclamation at the welcome return of the writer to the field of Theosophical literature. Mysterious foot-notes to an article on "Corals" darkly hint at a species of Mahatma unknown as yet to Theosophists, and at the ignorance of F.T.S. as to the true linga s'ariram. Mr. W. R. Old's paper on "The Solar System" is fine and full of fact, one of the elements making this Theosophist an exceptionally able issue. Miss Müller has bought for the use of the Bombay Branch a spacious building, and the report of Mrs. Besant's tour shows boundless enthusiasm of the natives and vast attention by the press.—[A.F.]

FEBRUARY LUCIFER is remarkable for the great number of short articles and for its strong Oriental flavor. Of the "Watch Tower's" eight pages, over seven and a half are on Eastern sacred books and the like, and there is a general Sanscrit and Vedantic revel. "Some False Concepts of Occultism" is a sound warning against confounding Occultism with Occult Arts, though marred by the "I" which appears in nearly every sentence. "The Model at Finch's" is very neatly, graphically done. "Some Popular Misconceptions of Theosophy" states most truly the public attitude to Theosophy and makes healthful suggestions. The editor of Lucifer announces a serial to be called "The Veil of Maya", and the possession of mss. and one thousand unpublished letters by Eliphas Lévi. They are being translated! At the rate of two per month, Lucifer would thus have an outfit for forty-two years; but if Mrs. Besant's otherwise welcome return in April should proclaim the discovery of a few new Upanishads or Puranas, the Reign of the Unintelligible may even be prolonged. But let us not add to the consternation created by the editor.—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI, No. 17, contains "Occultism Past and Present" by "P.W.B.", and "Free Will" by Wm. Main. The former is an excellent paper, very clear, instructive, and interesting, as full as space permitted, besides being reverent, rational, and temperate. No wonder Siftings reprinted "Free Will" from the New Californian, for a more able and felicitous treatment has perhaps never appeared. The illustrations from military life and from polarization are singularly apt, but all the thought is of that solid yet perspicuous character which makes Mr. Main's papers so coveted by editors and so admired by readers.—[A.F.]

A BRIEF SKETCH OF THE ZOROASTRIAN RELIGION AND CUSTOMS, by E. S. Dadabhai Bharuchâ, was written by request for the Chicago Parliament of Religions, and is erudite, copious, precise, and interesting. It denies that Ahri-man is the opponent of Ahura Mazda, and explains the growth of that conception, Zoroaster having taught a pure monotheism. A large Appendix gives additional facts as to literature and ceremonies, and the whole work is replete with carefully arranged facts. The time of Zoroaster is believed to be not later than the 12th century B.C. A very full Index is provided.—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VI, No. 18, contains "Theosophy the True Basis of True Socialism", R. B. Holt; "In the Shadow of the Gods", Thomas Williams; "The Ethical Aspect of Theosophy not the Only Aspect", H. T. Edge. The first is good. It is sensible, fair, and temperate, discriminating intelligently, and clear-headedly pointing out the effect of nostrums and the necessary cure of social ills in abrogation of selfishness. Perhaps the capacity of workmen to conduct great enterprises requiring more than manual skill is over-rated. The second has a taking title, but not much else, contents being familiar and a trifle flat. The third makes a good suggestion, good enough to be worked out more fully than the two pages Siftings allowed.—[A.F.]

THE NORTHERN THEOSOPHIST for March has singularly delightful "Editor's Remarks", all in a bright, fresh, rational, wholesome, practical spirit which fits him for a larger chair in a very much larger town.—[A.F.]

A MODERN LOVE STORY, by Harriet E. Orcutt, is of a noble woman who hesitated to marry an equally noble man because her theosophical convictions would be antagonized by his theological ones. All in fact turned out well, and there is unusually much of common sense and truth in the conversations, besides no little power in the incidents and descriptions. The book is another illustration of how Theosophy is leavening literature, and it would be well if all literature represented Theosophy as intelligently and sympathetically as this.—[A.F.]

LE JOUR of Paris, January 26th, minutely describes Sarah Bernhardt's triumph in Izeyl, a philosophic and religious drama drawn from the life of Buddha. The Prince Siddartha repulses the love of the courtesan Izeyl and becomes a hermit under advice from a Yogi. To the dying Izeyl the now Master avows that he had madly loved her, and that after all his struggles he could still wish to be only a man and with her. She recalls to him his holy mission, gives him a first and only kiss, and dies in the ecstasy of an eternal love. It is all very French, but it shows what advance the thought of Buddha is making in Paris, one of the least Buddhistic places on earth. And in Paris it of course exhibits itself promptly in the theatre!—[A.F.]

THE STANDARD DICTIONARY, Funk & Wagnalls, N.Y.C., appointed and announced Mr. William Q. Judge as its specialist on Theosophical words. This means, of course that Theosophy is now too important a subject to be left to tyros. The Dictionary is to be in two large volumes, one of which has been issued.

THE GREAT ASSEMBLY OF THE BHARAT DHARMA MAHA MANDAL has denounced some eighteen popular words as erroneous, and forbidden their use in its publications. One of them is "Pantheism". This is a sad blow to the forbidden-word school of English Theosophists. Still, the word "Religion" is also tabooed, so that the campaign seems general. Light of the East, which states the above, becomes somewhat hysterical over the presence of Hindus at the Parliament of Religions, and thinks foul scorn of such visitors. What queer "Light"!—[A.F.]

Mirror of the Movement.

ARYAN, T.S. had Sunday evening lectures in March: Of course God lives, H. Alfred Freeman; Reincarnation, Wm. Q. Judge; Theosophy in Every-day Life, Dr. Edward G. Day; Laws of Hypnotic Phenomena, Miss Katharine Hillard.

BROOKLYN T.S. had Sunday evening lectures in March: Health, Physical, Mental, and Spiritual, Dr. E. G. Day; Of course God lives, H. A. Freeman; The Truth about Ghosts, Jas. H. Connelly; Soul and Spirit, Donald Nicholson.

CENTRAL AMERICAN T.S., Bluefields, Nicaragua, Central America, was chartered on March 13th with five charter-members, and is the eighty-sixth Branch on the American roll. It is due to the labors of a former member of the Vyasa Branch in New Orleans.

RAMAYANA T.S. of Chicago has by unanimous vote of its members surrendered its charter and dissolved, its members becoming members-at-large. This reduces the American Branches to eighty-five. Earnest work for Theosophy, and for Theosophy distinctively, is the prescription for long life to Branches of the T.S.

PORTLAND T.S., Portland, Maine, has elected as President Mr. George E. Thompson, and as Secretary Mr. Velta Merrill, 16 Deering street.

MR. BURCHAM HARDING has visited Washington, D.C., Baltimore, and Philadelphia, and is now engaged on a tour through Connecticut and Rhode Island. The Washington Branch has recommenced Sunday lectures, two members on each evening to treat the leading subjects in a popular and conversational way. At Baltimore considerable additions have been made to the numbers, and an extra class for study begun. Philadelphia Branch has adopted for class study the subjects and references outlined in the Correspondence Class. It would be well if this were more generally followed, as consecutive and regular work is thus attained,

IN THE CHICAGO BRANCH the work increases with every month. Mrs. Mercie M. Thirds, whose daily presence at the Headquarters has been so missed during her illness, has returned from her rest in the South. Mr. Claude Falls Wright has returned to New York. His visit of six weeks with the Branch was marked by an added interest in the work in several directions. To his suggestion is due the organization of the new class for the practice of elocution and extemporaneous speaking, the object of this study being to train students in the power of readily addressing an audience upon Theosophy. The conversazione of February was well attended. In the past two months the following lectures upon Theosophy have been given by members of the "Lecture Bureau": Mr. Geo. E. Wright, "India" and "Karma and Free-will"; Miss Eva Gates, "The Modern Alchemist" and "Problems of Modern Life"; Mr. R. D. A. Wade, "Man" and "Karma"; and Miss Leonine Leonard, "Theosophy and Modern Civilization".

PORTLAND T.S., Portland, Maine, was chartered on February 27th, with 7 charter-members. It is the eighty-fifth Branch on the American roll.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

WILLAMETTE T.S., Portland, Oregon, had Sunday evening lectures in March: The Scientific Basis of Religion, J. H. Scotford; The Cause of Dis- content. Mrs. L. D. Durkee; Reincarnation, Mrs. A. R. Read; Karma, A. R. Read.

SEATTLE T.S. had Sunday lectures in March: Ethics and Theosophy, E. O. Schwagerl; Inquiry into the Nature of Idolatry, Thos. A. Barnes; Spirit and Matter, F. I. Blodgett; The Masters, T. L. Weiersmuller.

IN OREGON Bros. C. H. van der Linden, A. Schutz, and Jno. H. Lüsberg propose to take up a number of acres of land, five thousand if they can get fifty members to join them, in an Indian reservation about to be opened up, so that, as they say, "colonization by those of kindred spiritual inclinations" may give opportunity for "concentration and contemplation of the Higher Ego". Each settler can take 160 acres. We do not offer endorsement or condemnation of this, but notice it at request of the members named, who will give information to inquirers.

HONOLULU, HAWAIIAN ISLANDS, is showing marks of no small interest in Theosophy. Mr. A. Marques, a valued member-at-large, besides circulating pamphlets and books, has established a Theosophical Library, open to students three afternoons weekly. Mrs. T. R. Foster, F.T.S., liberally contributing. This led to such diffused interest that an "A,B,C." class was formed, 35 asking for membership. It is to meet one evening each week. The newspapers gave it very ample notice, as also an account of the Library and an appeal for additional books. There are now 90. When the froth is blown off and the class settles into abiding solidity, a Branch is expected to be formed. The opening address by Mr. Marques was cordially received: it has been taken by the General Secretary as a Branch Paper and will soon be issued.

NARADA T.S, Tacoma, had Sunday lectures in March: Dreams, Mrs. Belle T. Crosby; Reincarnation and its Critics, Mrs. Ida S. Wright; Colors & Sound, Mrs. Fannie A. Sheffield; Spirit and Matter, F. I. Blodgett.

OLYMPIA T.S. March Sunday lectures were: Karma and Reincarnation, 3 Branch members; Ethics and Theosophy, E. O. Schwägerl; Theosophy, Branch members; "That" that Reincarnates, Jesse L. Greenbaum.

"A NUMBER OF THE INMATES of the State's Prison at San Quentin, Calif, are interested in and studying Theosophy, literature having been sent them by the Coast Committee and others, and a class was formed. In February one of them died suddenly from heart disease. A petition to the Governor for his pardon had shortly before been started by friends, but, when he heard of it, he requested that the matter be dropped, on the ground that during his imprisonment he had heard of and accepted Theosophy, and intended to devote the rest of his term to bringing it before his class, thinking it good Karma to have that opportunity which would be lost through a pardon. His purpose was to serve out his term and after release to continue the same work among prisoners and ex-convicts. A few days later he was found dead in his cell. What an answer to the question, 'What does Theosophy do for the poor and down-trodden?' Pardon meant to this man freedom and restoration to citizenship; confinement meant more than words can describe of suffering, toil, and ignominy. Yet he chose the latter for the good he could do. Was not this renunciation? The warden notified the Coast Committee of his death, and Bros. Rambo and Griffiths were delegated to go over and conduct the funeral services. Bro. Rambo read from the Bhagavad Gita and the Light of Asia, Bro. Griffiths made a short address, and the Prison Chaplain gave the benediction. Then from the chapel the coffin was carried to the prison graveyard."

THE PACIFIC COAST LECTURER spoke upon "Theosophy and Heredity" to a large audience at the S.F.T.S. public meeting on Feb. 18th.

VISALIA, CALIF., was visited January 29th, and a general lecture on Theosophy given. Two lectures were given to large and interested audiences at Selma, Calif., February 1st and 2d. Selma is known as a church town. Rev. J. R. Kirkpatrick took occasion to say to Dr. Griffiths when introduced to him that "Theosophy was a blight upon society", and another minister affirmed his belief that "Theosophy was a dangerous thing", yet large audiences attended the lectures. Other ministers and many church members also attended.

A number of the latter expressed themselves as having been instructed. A Quiz meeting was held, attended by some of the best people of the town, and intense interest manifested.

FRESNO BRANCH T.S. was organized by Dr. Griffiths February 6th, with nine charter members. This Branch is the result of previous work done in that city by Mr. Judge, Mrs. Beane, and others. A general lecture was given at Merced, Calif., February 10th by the Pacific Coast Committee's lecturer to a fair audience. Lectures were given March 2d and 7th in Calistoga and St. Helena, Calif., to interested audiences. Informal meetings were also held and classes for study formed and T.S. books ordered.

INDIA.

GYAN MARGA T.S. of Fategarh has sent the following resolution to New York. "Resolved, that the best thanks of this Branch be conveyed to Brother William Q. Judge, Chairman of the Congress of the T.S. at the World's Fair, for his disinterested and noble efforts in having the Theosophical Society represented at the Parliament of Religions with such marked success. The Branch is also thankful to the American Section for presentation of a copy of the proceedings." The Congress was a success because the entire body of members in the world tried to make it so, and these thanks go to all who worked in the matter.

VERNACULAR WORK at Bellary. We have again to notice the work of Brothers Jagannathiah and Swaminatha at this place. They proceed under great difficulties, but with hope undiminished. Americans cannot imagine the trouble involved, because the whole scheme of life is so different and villagers have such peculiar ways; besides that roads are not good and travel is by rough ox-carts. In January three villages were visited and preaching given on Theosophy and symbolism, Hinduism, morality, and the like. The villages ratified their promises to give grain. They are about six miles from Bellary; preaching has to be done at night by the light of torches, and the preachers return sometimes at midnight to the city. Both these young men have also to work in an office for their own living from 9:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. Villagers do not get ready to listen until 11 p.m. sometimes, but they are attentive and serious. And as this work is only at Bellary, one place in the vast expanse of India, the task for the whole land is very great; but even one little bit of work done counts for much. Other work will doubtless be accomplished on similar lines to those used by the great Sankaracharya; the future will show whether such can be done or not.

THEOSOPHISTS at Nanpoora, Surat, India, have organized the "H.P.B. Theosophical Propaganda Society" and issued an appeal for help. They most warmly commend the good done by the T.S., especially in reviving Indian faith and spirituality, and wish to extend its influence by new publications and by assistance to any good Theosophical work. Their scheme is to accumulate 25,000 rupees and to use the interest thereon in the work; but there may well be doubt as to the wisdom—perhaps even the possibility—of such a fund. Far more is accomplished by using money as it comes in. But surely this spontaneous uprising of native interest in Theosophical propaganda is a cheering sign, and the cooperation of such a society with the new Vernacular Section must be very important.

ASTROLOGICAL INSTITUTE at Bellary. Mr. Bangalore Suryanarain Row has the project on hand of establishing such an Institute for the purpose of systematising the science and its practice, and is now trying to get the funds for the work. His plan is, if possible, to have a real Observatory, professors, and all that would look like a revival of the star-gazing days of the ancient Chaldeans. Calculations would be verified, predictions revised, methods improved, and everything done to make astrology rise from the company of charlatans who now in the West have given it a bad name. Mr. Row will also give predictions to inquirers, and those desiring to know more should address him at Bellary, India.

EUROPE.

NORTH OF ENGLAND FEDERATION, T.S., held its third conference under the chairmanship of G. R. S. Mead. The meeting was entirely Theosophical, and only schemes of work, past, present, and future, were discussed. It was among other things decided to start a Secret Doctrine class, similar to that already proved successful in America.

SWEDEN has increased its membership by thirty-three since the beginning of the year. Its latest activity has been the establishing of a publishing office in Gothenburg, the chief commercial center in Sweden. This will be taken charge of by two members there, one of whom is a bookseller & the other a publisher by trade. It should thus be worked on a proper business basis. The Helsingfors Centre now has over twenty members on its roll. Both Finnish and Swedish are spoken, but this seems to cause no barrier to either propaganda or study.

HOLLAND shows a steady record of propagandist work. The Hague, Helder, Zaandam, and Arnhem have been in turn lectured to by those indefatigable workers Mme. Mealman and Bro. Friche. The press is no longer actively hostile, and reports of all lectures are inserted. The Amsterdam Lodge holds regular and well-attended meetings.

MRS. COOPER-OAKLEY visited Margate on February 8th, and gave a very successful lecture there which has already borne such good fruit that a Lodge has been established.

WALES has been slow in accepting Theosophy up till a very recent period. Now it seems to be waking up to the fact that Theosophy must at least be listened to, for a lecture delivered by Bro. William Kingsland under the auspices of the Llandndno Literary and Scientific Society, of which he is Vice-President, proved a greater success than any other lecture hitherto delivered in that town. A Lodge will probably be before long chartered there.

MRS. ANNIE BESANT has already had St. James's Great Hall taken for a lecture she will give on April 20th. As considerable newspaper correspondence has arisen out of her tour in India, this lecture should be largely attended and prove as big a success as previous lectures given there by her. The subject chosen is India and Theosophy.

BOW CLUB, founded by H. P. Blavatsky, entertained some 180 poor children with a Christmas Tree on January 26th, of which mention was made in a previous "Mirror". The surplus clothes, toys, etc., were recently distributed to fifty-five small children, other things being sent to the Poplar Workhouse.

AUSTRALIA.

THE SYDNEY THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY is now located in a large, well-lighted room overlooking Wynward Square and capable of seating between 150 and 200 people. We moved to the new premises at the close of the old year, and all the League lectures of 1894 have been delivered in the new rooms and were as follows: Mahâtmas and Adepts, T. W. Willans; Theosophy and Spiritualism, T. H. Martyn. The Branch holds open meetings every Sunday, when the Ocean of Theosophy is read and discussed. Both lectures and meetings are far better attended than they were last year, and there is a slight increase of members to the Branch. A "question evening" alternates with the fortnightly lectures, when slips of paper are handed round to the audience to write their questions on, which are then handed in to the chairman, read, and discussed. The other activities to be recorded are a League elocution class fortnightly, the continuance of the S.D. class, and the children's class. The "leaflet distribution fund" has enabled us to print 10,000 leaflets for distribution on the topics of "Karma" and "Reincarnation", a reprint from London leaflets Nos. 2 and 3. We have issued also a syllabus of lectures and printed new forms of admission to the Society and Lodge.

NOTICE RESPECTING SANGAMITTA GIRLS' SCHOOL.

Through some unfortunate complications, not yet understood here, Mrs. Higgins has retired from all connection with the Sangamitta Girls' School and devoted herself wholly to the "Annie Besant School and H.P.B. Home", the corner-stone whereof was lately laid by Mrs. Besant. The funds of the former institution are tied up by the refusal of an official to sign cheques, although the money was collected by Mrs. Higgins. Friends interested in the cause of female education in Ceylon are advised of these facts in order that their contributions may be distinctly stated as for the latter enterprise, that of which Mrs. Higgins, aided by Mr. Peter d'Abrew, is in charge. None for the former should be now sent to care of PATH.

THE SUPPORT OF THE T.S.

"Business" has not been at all lively at 247 Green street during the past month, I am sorry to say. I have enough faith in the good will of our Fellows, however, to feel certain that only the hard times are to blame.

This month completes a year since the inception of the Fund idea, and I expect to celebrate our anniversary by publishing a complete report showing total receipts from each pledger to date. All who know themselves to be in arrears should pay up, as I want to make the best possible showing.

Following is my report for the month past :

New subscriber in the fifty cents per month class : R.A.B. Total per year, $6.00.

Total subscribers previously reported, 82. Added since last report, 1. Present total, 83. Total value of fund previously reported, $860.85. Amount pledged by new subscribers, $6.00. Amount added by increase of one pledger from $1.00 to $2.00 per month, $12.00. Net total to date, $878.85.

General Secretary.

EIGHTH CONVENTION, AMERICAN SECTION.

Convention will assemble April 22d, Sunday, and continue till adjournment. First session will be at Red Men's Hall, 320 Post street, San Francisco; sessions also at Golden Gate Hall, 625 Sutter street, and at 1504 Market street. Brother Ernest T. Hargrove will represent the European Section. The General Secretary will leave New York April 5th with Bro. Hargrove and others, and meet Dr. J. D. Buck next day, proceeding to Los Angeles and San Diego, Cal., for a day's stop at each place, so as to attend the Parliament in San Francisco. Many interesting papers and addresses are expected. The programme will be made up too late for insertion in this issue, but May PATH will contain a full report.

UNITED YET INDEPENDENT.

IN coöperative work, as in every other problem before students of occultism, there are two extremes to be avoided and one right course to be maintained; two evils opposed to one good; a pair of opposites reconciled by a unity; and in coöperative work, as in other problems, many make the mistake of avoiding the more obviously wrong extreme merely to fall into the other extreme which is less obviously wrong. A body of workers should neither repel one another nor lean on one another. The former maxim is so obvious that no one fails to recognize its truth and to strive to act in accordance with it; but there are many who, in doing so, rush to the opposite pole of weak reliance on others. Workers should cling to the cause, not to each other; for if they cling to each other, the failure of an individual will be disastrous for the whole; while, if each one clings to the cause, each one must be torn away separately ere the whole fabric can be destroyed. The pillars of a temple do not lean up against one another, neither do they counteract each other; each stands firmly on its own base and is independent of the support of the others, yet all unite in the common object of supporting the dome. We must be as the pillars of a temple, helping one another, yet independent and each on his own base. The destruction of one or two does not seriously impair the building, for the others still stand firm.

In unity is strength, and though we must be united in a common object, yet we must not lose the advantage arising from our individual unity. A body of workers all mutually dependent constitutes a single united centre of force; but if, while maintaining their unity of purpose, they retained their independence of individual action, they would be more powerful, for they would constitute a number of separate centres synthesized by one great centre—a number of unities forming one cardinal unity. When many members of a body are self-reliant, their self-reliance synthesises itself into a great power and stability, and the total force is much greater than it would be if they all leaned up against one another. It is a law of nature that a number of logoi or individualities should constitute collectively a single superior logos or individuality. Our Egos, though each acts independently, all emanate from a single central logos, of which they are only parts, but whose quality of egoism each reflects. Our bodily organs, though each has a separate function, all unite to form the whole man. They do not thwart each other, nor absorb one another's functions, nor combine to do the work of one. We should be like the rays of the sun, which hoot in all directions and yet are but fulfilling the separate details of a single organized plan. It is upon this very diversity of course that depends the successful carrying out of that plan; for were all the rays to shoot in the same direction the sun as a luminary would be a failure. This illustration also serves to show us how two people pursuing opposite courses can yet subserve a common end; for to every ray there is another that shoots in the precisely opposite direction.

Why should we try to persuade our friends over to our own views, or grieve because they differ from us in details? Would we have all workers do the same work, all climbers ascend the same path, all occultists follow the same ray of truth? Light has many hues and the sun has many planets; and though there is a maxim to the effect that those not yet qualified to be suns may remain for the present humble planets, no reason is given why we should all be the same planet. A general, in conducting a campaign, assigns to each division of his army a particular portion of the work he wishes carried out; a master-printer assigns to each operative his due share of the work in hand, one setting the type, another reading the proofs, and so on. Each subdivision does its own work without interfering with the work of others, and through this simultaneous carrying out of many dissimilar details the whole plan, for which all alike coöperate, is successfully accomplished.

Though most of us recognize this principle in matters of external work, there are many who fail to carry its application into more interior departments of our work; it applies equally well to methods of thought and ways of looking at the questions that affect our moral life. One student may, through the exigencies of his own nature, be impressed most strongly by the value of fiery energy, while another may pin his faith to the principle of "power through repose": if these two should try to convert one another, they would be merely wasting time and labor, and the work of both would be hindered. Each should do what is best for himself, and leave the other to follow what is best for him. We are all necessarily impressed with different aspects of the great problem, and must therefore all work on different tacks, but, while recognizing our own method as the best so far as we ourselves are concerned, we must frankly acknowledge the equal importance (to the general body) of our brother's plan.

Many are the paradoxes that present themselves to the student of occultism, and among them this is not the least important—to work in perfect harmony with our colleagues, and at the same time to work as if upon our own individual effort depended the whole enterprise. To realize this we must be united yet independent.

THE RED RAJPUTS.

BROTHER Charles Johnston, F.T.S., formerly of the Dublin Lodge in Ireland, is a member of the Royal Academy of Science and retired from the British Civil Service of India. His interest in Indian questions of religion, philosophy, and ethnology is very great, and as his linguistic accomplishments are extensive, his studies in that field are of value. The Imperial and Asiatic Quarterly Review for October, 1893, has an article by him under the above title which Theosophists will do well to read if they can procure it.

Starting with the assertion of De Quatrefages that there are four principal color groups in the human family, of white, yellow, red, and black races, he adds this from the Mahabharata:

The color of the Brahmans is white; of the Kshatriyas red, of the Vaishyas yellow, of the Shudras black.

While Col. Tod has given much of what is called the history of the Rajputs, Johnston shows that although we have been in contact with Rajputana for over a hundred years, there as yet exists no material for an exact study of its ethnology; while the latter as an exact science is very young and was for a long time hampered by the old Mosaic traditions about Shem, Ham, and Japhet. He holds that the Rajputs are red in color, and also makes good argument on the point that in ancient times they as Kshatriyas or warriors were above the Brahmans so far as mystical and spiritual knowledge went. Quoting the Brihadaranyaka Upanishad thus, "This knowledge has never before dwelt in any Brahman", he goes to point out that Krishna, the great King and Sage, was a Kshatriya, while next comes Buddha, admitted by the Hindus to be an Avatar, who was also a Kshatriya, all being held by him to be Rajputs. Krishna traced his doctrine from the Kshatriya Manu through a line of Rajarshis or Rajanya sages. This is in the Bhagavad Gita, where the last personage named in the line is Ikshvaku, of whose race was Buddha. Hence he ascribes the spirit of the Upanishads and of Buddhism to the mystical genius of the Rajanya race. The well-known characteristic of the Brahmans of not having missionaries should be remembered at this point. The reformers they have had have been mostly among themselves, as, for instance, the great Brahman Shankaracharya. If Johnston's argument be right, then it is a very remarkable fact that the Gayatri, or that holy verse which is the "mother of the Vedas", repeated every morning by thousands of Brahmans as they bathe in the Ganges, was composed by a Kshatriya and not by a Brahman. On this we have in the Upanishads these words: "The Brahman sat at the foot of the Kshatriya". This upholds the spiritual dignity of the Rajanyas, who are the Kshatriyas and the Red Rajputs. And, as he shows, to this time the Ranas of Mewar "unite spiritual with royal authority and officiate as high priests in the temple of the guardian deity of their race". We should not forget, either, that it is recorded respecting the proceedings after the death and cremation of the body of Buddha that the Moriyas of Pippalivana, saying that Buddha was of their soldier caste, took away the embers to erect a cairn over them.<sup>1</sup> And the name to be applied to these is lohita, or red, which is also the name of the planet Mars, the fighter.

Johnston's ethnological deduction is as follows: "That the Kshatriyas of ancient India are identical in ethnic characteristics with the Rajputs of to-day". The Red Rajputs are the descendants of the solar race, a race of kings, of mystical men who not only could learn of mystic occultism but could also fight and rule, which is contrary to the regulation for the Brahman.

If we turn now to the Secret Doctrine, vol. 1, p. 405, there is most interesting and suggestive matter on this head, with names also, given doubtless with a purpose not divulged. She says:

Two persons, Devapi of the race of Kuru, and Mauru (Mora) of the family of Ikshvaku . . . continue alive throughout the Four Ages, residing at . . . . Kalapa. They will return hither in the beginning of the Krita Age . . . . Mara (Moru), the son of Shigra, through the power of devotion (Yoga) is still living . . . . and will be the restorer of the Kshatriya race of the Solar Dynasty.

Max Müller, it is said, translates Moru as Morya, of the Morya dynasty, evidently of the same race or family as those who came and took the embers from the cremation of Buddha. To take the embers, when read under the rules of Indian symbolism, is very much like "taking the essence of spiritual culture after all the rest is burned or purged away". Another valuable article to read in connection with this is the Moryas and Koothoomi in Five Years of Theosophy, 483. All students of these extremely interesting points are indebted to Brother Johnston for his paper, all too short as it was.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

TOOKERAM TATYA is a Hindu, a member of the Indian Section of the T.S., one of the most earnest and devoted workers we have anywhere. He was born in Bombay in 1836, and belongs to a sub-section of the Shudra caste known as the Bhandari class. Members who have read the Oriental Department papers will remember how the Indian castes are divided into many, the original four being much multiplied; as, for instance, the Brahman having now eighty-four divisions. Tookeram's parents came from the west coast of India, near Ratnagiri. At seven his mother died and at ten his father. After that they were all reduced to poverty through the family property being squandered by a relative. He was adopted by his cousin's wife at the age of thirteen, who supported herself and Tookeram by work. At a mission school he was taught the vernacular, and afterwards at an English school he went as far as the Third Reader. There, as he paid more attention to the Bible lessons, the missionaries thought he would make a Christian, and so allowed him a monthly stipend of two rupees. This is a common practice of these people. They treated Tookeram kindly, so that he began to look with favor on Christianity and was on the point of joining that faith. But here was the turning point of his life.

At an auction room he met by accident an English gentleman who had been a teacher in a mission school in Bombay, but had resigned because the things he taught were against his conscience and had taken a government position. The missionaries persecuted him for this change and considerably marred his prospects. He had many private talks with Tookeram, telling him that his Christian views were a delusion and that if he "embraced Christianity his condition would be something worse than that of a despised dog, and that once he received baptism he would not even get a crumb from their table; they would show him every attention and kindness as long as he did not become a Christian". This shocked Tookeram and caused him to pause, as the kind friend read him freethought articles and various things about the Pentateuch. The missionaries then began to revile Tookeram and withdrew all help, leaving him destitute. But the kind friend got him a position in a municipal office. He then joined various Hindu societies for reform, but left them. One was the Paramahaousa Sabha, which went to pieces through treachery of a member, and another was Prarthana Samaj of Bombay. The latter was a prayer society, but as Tookeram got agnostic views he left it.

A few years later, while watching the death of his adopted mother, he began speculating as to what it was that left her body. This led to retrospection and to wondering where his destiny would take him. In this state of mind Tookeram continued until he happened to read the Theosophist and see that H.P.B. and Col. Olcott were in India. He read the same things as he had been pondering on, and conceived a desire to see them. With an introduction from his friend, Mr. Martin Wood of the Times of India, he visited them, Mr. Wood asking them not to "let Tookeram too deep in the mysteries of the T.S. for fear he might be drawn off from the local politics, in which he had a large share, having already obtained the city municipal franchise".

He visited H.P.B. and Col. Olcott every Sunday, and the closer intimacy formed with them during these frequent visits having disclosed to him nothing that would corroborate the sinister reports then current there regarding them, he determined to know more about them, and this he thought could best be done by joining the T.S. Becoming a member of the Society in Bombay, his relations with them became more and more intimate, he advanced them money under articles, and watched their conduct in the Wymbridge-Bates quarrel, Damodhar and his father's quarrel, etc. His convictions of their innocence and spiritual mission were confirmed.

The two founders left Bombay with great disappointment, seeing that the Theosophical Society could not prosper there; the reason for taking this step was, Tookeram thought, that they had placed themselves in wrong hands. They had unfortunately chosen for co-workers Harichandra Chintaman and Mooljee Thakersey, and others; the former had lost their reputation and position from adverse fortune, and many still clung to the belief that H.P.B. and Olcott were foreign spies (Russian and American). For this reason no respectable, educated persons would join the Society.

When the founders decided to make Madras the Headquarters of the movement, H.P.B. feared that the Bombay Branch would die out after they had left the place, and desiring to prevent so disastrous a result taking place, she asked Tookeram to keep up at least a semblance of the Branch by hanging a sign board at the door of his office, even though no members should assemble for a meeting. He did this because he was determined to do all possible to prevent the movement from being hopelessly ruined in Bombay. Shortly afterward the members hired a room in the Fort and removed the Branch from Crow's Nest (H. P. B.'s residence here) to the room, and have been ever since holding meetings in the Fort; they have thus succeeded in making the Branch one of the most active in the country.

He was in the Committee to enquire into the allegations made by the Coulombs and the Missionaries at Madras regarding the Mahâtmas and the shrine, and was thoroughly convinced that Madame Coulomb, in acting the part she did, was actuated by base selfish motives and had entered into conspiracy with the Madras missionaries to ruin the Theosophical movement. Tookeram was also present in Madras when Mr. Hodgson had called there to make personal investigations, "and found that he did not at all act with impartiality".

When Bombay Branch was established in the Fort, Tookeram opened, at his own expense, a charitable dispensary called The Theosophical Homœopathic Charitable Dispensary, in which he has been dispensing medicines, effecting mesmeric cures on a very large number of patients suffering from incurable diseases of all sorts. This dispensary has made a name, and has now about 12,000 rupees given as donations by patients and charitably disposed persons in recognition of the usefulness of the institution.

In course of time, as Theosophy was more widely known and a general interest aroused in the public mind to know something about Indian ancient scriptures, Tookeram conceived the idea of setting up a Theosophical publication business, long before a similar idea was decided upon and worked in Europe and America, with the sole object of popularising among the reading public a taste for reading easily procurable works on those ancient philosophies and religions. He has thus been able to publish the Vedas and other great works on ancient philosophy, metaphysics, yoga, the Upanishads with English translations, besides many other works in vernacular by the greatest Sadhus and Adepts.

Tookeram has still other ideas of promoting the Theosophical movement in India, and hopes in course of time to be able to carry them into effect. We trust he will have complete success.

CHRISTIAN FATHERS ON REINCARNATION.

OUR brother George R. S. Mead, the General Secretary of the European Section T.S., has held that whether or not Origen, the greatest of the Fathers, believed in reincarnation, the Christian Church never formally anathematized the doctrine. If this position is sound there will yet be an opportunity for the Roman Church to declare the doctrine by holding that the anathema pronounced was against a species of incarnation or of metempsychosis not very clearly defined except as a preëxistence of the soul as opposed to a special creation for each new body. This declaration can only be made by placing the future lives of the soul on some other planet after leaving this one. That would be reincarnation, but not as we understand it.

The issue of Lucifer for February has valuable contributions under "Notes and Queries" on this subject, and from that I extract something. Beausobre says:

It is a very ancient and general belief that souls are pure and heavenly substances which exist before their bodies and come down from heaven to clothe and animate them. * * I only quote it to show that his nation (Jews) believed for a long time back in the preexistence of souls. * * All the most learned Greek fathers held this opinion, and a considerable portion of the Latin fathers followed them herein. * * It has been held by several Christian philosophers. It was received into the Church until the fourth century without being obnoxious to the charge of heresy.

Beausobre, however, calls the belief an "error". It would be interesting to know whether it is not the fact that at about the fourth century the monks and bishops were ignorant men who would be more likely to take up a narrow dogma necessary for preservation of their power than to hold the broader and grander one of preexistence. Origen died about A.D. 254. He was so great and learned that even in his lifetime other men forged his name to their own writings. But while he was still living uneducated monks were flocking into the ranks of the priesthood. They obtained enough strength to compel Jerome to turn against Origen, although previously holding similar views. It was not learning, then, nor spiritual knowledge that brought about the subsequent condemnation of Origen, but rather bigotry and unspiritual ignorance. Origen distinctly held as a fundamental idea "the original and indestructible unity of God and all spiritual essences". This is precisely the doctrine of the Isovasya Upanishad, which says:

When to a man who understands, the Self has become all things, what sorrow, what trouble can there be to him who once beheld that unity?

Franck's Kabale is referred to in these answers as saying that Origen taught transmigration as a necessary doctrine for the explaining of the vicissitudes of life and the inequalities of birth. But the next quotation throws doubt again into the question, closing, however, thus:

When the soul comes into the world it leaves the body which had been necessary to it in the mother's womb, it leaves, I repeat, the body which covered it, and puts on another body fit for the life we lead on earth. * * But as we do not believe in metempsychosis, nor that the soul can ever be debased so as to enter into the bodies of brute animals.

There are several ways of looking at this. It may be charged that some one interpolated the italicized words; or that Origen was referring to transmigrating back to animals; or, lastly, that he and his learned friends had a theory about incarnation and reincarnation not clearly given. My opinion is that he wrote as above simply as to retrograde rebirth, and that he held the very identical doctrine as to reincarnation found in Isis Unveiled and which caused it to be charged that H.P.B. did not know or teach reincarnation in 1877. Of course I cannot produce a quotation. But how could such a voluminous writer and deep thinker as Origen hold to the doctrines of unity with God, of the final restoration of all souls to pristine purity, and of preexistence, without also having a reincarnation doctrine? There are many indications and statements that there was an esoteric teaching on these subjects, just as it is evident that Jesus had his private teaching for the select disciples. For that reason Origen might teach præexistence but hold back the other. He says, according to Franck, that the question was not of metempsychosis according to Plato, "but of an entirely different theory which is of a far more elevated nature". It might have been this.

The soul, considered as spirit and not animal soul, is pure, of the essence of God, and desirous of immortality through a person; the person may fail and not be united to the soul; another and another person is selected; each one, if a failure in respect to union with the Self, passes into the sum of experience; but finally a personal birth is found wherein all former experiences are united and union gained. From thenceforward there is no more falling back, for immortality through a person has been attained. Prior to this great event the soul existed, and hence the doctrine of præexistence. For all of the personal births the soul was the God the Higher Self of each, the luminous one, the Augœides; Existing thus from all time, it might be the cause of rebirths but not itself be reincarnated, as it merely overshadowed each birth without being wholly in the flesh. Such a doctrine, extremely mystical and providing for each a personal God with a great possibility held out through reunion, could well be called by Origen "a different theory" from metempsychosis and "of more elevated character".

When once more the modern Christian Church admits that its founders believed in præexistence and that Jesus did not condemn reincarnation, a long step will have been taken toward uprooting many intolerant and illogical doctrines now held.

A STRANGER WITHIN THE GATES.

CHAPTER I.

WHEN Mr. Holcomb saw Dr. Riter start out on his round of evening visits he joined him. "Where are you going first?", he asked.

"Down to Mr. Lester's", the doctor answered.

"Then I will walk along with you. There's a piece of land down that way that I want to call your attention to. The thought occurred to me that perhaps you and I had better invest a few hundreds in it. Is Lester's boy going to pull through?"

"I see no reason why he shouldn't, though the fever has not run its course yet. He is rather a delicate child; he has a fair constitution, but not much vitality."

"My boy speaks of him as a good-natured little chap who takes to books and pets."

"Yes; he has a good mind and a good disposition. He is rather an unusually promising child."

"I suppose his father and mother will try to make a preacher of him—if he lives. It runs in the blood."

"It has run in the blood, as you say, but it may have run out. The time is coming, Mr. Holcomb, when there will be no preachers—using the word in the sense in which we use it now. The time is coming when men will look within for guidance in matters of religion."

"Undoubtedly; and I fancy when that time comes every man will be his own physician."

"I hope he will; there are signs in the air now that he who runs may read—if he runs with his eyes wide open."

"This is the property that I had reference to", said Mr. Holcomb, stopping before a dilapidated old house, half-concealed by trees. "The buildings are of no value, but the land will bring a good price some day. We can buy it for two thousand dollars. What do you think of investing a thousand in it?"

"It strikes me as a good bargain, and I will talk with you further about it to night, as I may have to go out of the city in the morning, and if we buy it at all we may as well do so immediately. But I must go on to Mr. Lester's now. I may not be detained five minutes; suppose you wait here for me, and we will walk down town together. I have an errand at the drug store before making my next call."

Mr. Holcomb assented, and Dr. Riter went on. He was not gone long, but when he returned the sky was growing dark and lights shone through the windows of the buildings along the street. While passing a saloon their attention was attracted by sounds of angry voices, scuffling, and the crash of glass. They stopped and looked through a window; in the middle of the room two men, bent on murder, faced each other like wild animals about to spring. One held a revolver, the other a knife. For an instant they stood there, leaning forward, intent, alert, calculating the moment for action—the knife flashed in the air, and the report of the revolver was heard. One fell to the floor with a bullet in his heart; the other, unhurt, laid his smoking revolver on the bar.

"That was a close shave", he said coolly. "Another second and that knife would have done me."

Following his professional instinct, Dr. Riter went inside and made a hasty examination of the body. The heart had ceased to beat and he told the by-standers that the man was dead.

A crowd had gathered, and comments on the affair were made without reserve. "That was a neat bit of work", said one.

"Caldwell was a tough and a bully, and it's a good thing for the community that he's gone where he can do no more harm", said another.

"That's a fact."

"He made the row in the first place", said the bartender, who had seen the beginning of the difficulty. "He wanted to fight, and he got what he deserved."

"The world is well rid of him."

"What are you men talking about?" Dr. Riter demanded. "How do any of you know that he can do no more harm?"

The respect in which Dr. Riter was held prevented any open derision of his question, but several men exchanged significant glances. One, however, attempted to justify what he had said: "Dead men don't handle guns or knives—at least not that I ever heard of."

"You are speaking according to your knowledge; you never heard of their ever handling guns or knives; that is well put in. But what lies behind the hand that fires the gun? Some one's mind supplies a motive. That is the real thing."

"You're too deep for me, doctor; I don't know what you are driving at."

"Do you think the soul of a man dies with his body?"

"No—no; I don't believe that."

"Very well; Caldwell had a soul, and according to your belief and mine it didn't die with his body, but it can't control it any longer because his body is dead. Don't you think it might like to instigate some other man to commit crime, now, or do you imagine it has become changed in the twinkling of an eye, from what it was, to pure goodness?"

"I don't know anything about it; I'm no spiritualist."

"Neither am I; but for all we know to the contrary Caldwell's power to do evil may be ten times as great as it was half an hour ago."

Mr. Holcomb and the doctor went out. "The man who said Caldwell had gone where he could do no more harm expressed the ideas of a great many people", Mr. Holcomb remarked. "You gave those people something to think about."

"If they were in the habit of thinking they would question what becomes of a soul intent on crime at the moment it is set free. But they haven't learned to think. What would any one of that crowd say if I were to take him into an insane asylum and explain to him the real meaning of what he saw? He would be of the opinion that I was quite as much of a lunatic as any one there. How many generations do you imagine must pass before the masses have become fairly enlightened as to the facts of nature?"

"About five, I should say."

CHAPTER II.

Willie Lester lost strength so fast that when the fever had run its course Dr. Riter doubted whether he could recover. For days he lay in a stupor of complete exhaustion; and when, at length, an increase of strength became perceptible, it was so very slight that weeks had passed before Dr. Riter could say that he was certainly recovering.

As his strength returned certain peculiarities became apparent; his moods changed constantly, but none of them were pleasant. He was irritable, reserved, watchful, suspicious, and he frequently indulged in violent fits of anger, for which neither his mother nor Dr. Riter could find a cause, and which he could not, or would not, explain. He no longer cared for books, pets, school-mates, or for anything which had formerly given him pleasure, but occupied himself in making feeble, but determined, efforts to kill the flies which occasionally came within his reach.

Dr. Riter observed the change with some anxiety. His constitution was shattered, and his mind was weak; that he would be an easy victim to any strong and persistent influence was certain, and that some evil thing, seeing his weakness, would attack him, was more than possible. In the doctor's opinion his changing moods indicated real danger; two individuals, he argued, contending for supremacy in one body, would produce a discord which would be manifested externally by moodiness and irritability. Unfortunately, Dr. Riter was working in the dark; all that he could do was to exert his own will against the intruder—if such there was—whom he was unable to see, and there was not a well developed clairvoyant in the city.

Going in very quietly one day, Dr. Riter heard him talking, with an expression of mingled fear and loathing: "Get away! get away, I say!"

"To whom are you talking, Willie?" the Doctor asked.

Willie started up, confused: "O, nothing—I don't know."

"But you were talking to some one who was here; I would like to know. Don't you think you had better tell me?"

Confused emotions flitted over his face,—fear, suspicion, and anger. "I tell you I don't know", he answered. "I wasn't talking. I wish folks wouldn't ask me so many questions."

"Some one annoys you", Dr. Riter continued; "I will tell him to go away and let you alone."

A strange expression came over Willie's face—a leer of triumph and defiance. It passed as quickly as it came, but its full significance was not lost on Dr. Riter. "It may be too late", he thought.

In another room he questioned Mrs. Lester, adroitly, so as not to alarm her: "I heard Willie talking to himself just now; does he often amuse himself in this way?"

"No, not now; he's getting over that."

"Do you mean that he has been in the habit of talking to himself?"

"Since he was ill he has talked and muttered to himself a good deal. Something annoys him, but he doesn't seem able to tell me what it is. He acts as though he was afraid of something. Have you noticed how moody he is? Sometimes he is like himself, and then, in a minute, he isn't like my Willie at all."

"I wish you would observe him closely, without allowing him to suspect that you are watching him, and tell me what you see. He doesn't like to answer my questions."

"I have noticed that; and it seems strange, because he used to like you, and to be pleased when you came."

"He may like me well enough now", said the doctor, giving Mrs. Lester a look of keen enquiry and speculation.

"Doctor", she said quickly, "I don't know precisely what you mean, but you mean a little more than you say. I feel it. And I have felt that something is wrong with Willie; I see now that you know there is—and you may as well tell me."

"I will tell you, but not this morning, because I have not time. To-morrow I will explain it to you—so far as I understand it myself. In the meantime, observe him and draw your own inferences."

"Five generations", Dr. Riter said to himself as he went out; "well, it may be, but people are waking up pretty fast. Here's Mrs. Lester; she has intuitions; last week I ran across a case of clairvoyance. And if some kind of a plague should remove all the cattle and sheep and pigs from the face of the earth, there would be a great deal more intuition and clairvoyance."

On his human side Dr. Riter regretted the tragedy which he believed was being enacted before his eyes, but on his scientific side he felt deeply interested in what he regarded as a tolerably clear illustration of a fact in nature; it was a case for observation and investigation, and for record in a certain private notebook. This notebook contained records of cases usually denominated "mental", which he had seen in many years of experience, and would, as he knew well, constitute sufficient proof in the minds of any court and jury that the writer was a lunatic—sane, perhaps, on all subjects but one, and on that one a monomaniac, a person who must not be permitted to tamper with precious lives. But as he had, in fact, a well-balanced mind, and was aware that he was moving along in the direction in which nature had fitted him to move, he did not impair his usefulness by leaving this interesting, but dangerous, book within reach of any hands but his own.

The next day he had a talk with Mrs. Lester. "We must build Willie up", he said, "build him up so that he will be strong enough to resist and crowd out this individuality which has begun to fasten itself upon him. He is weak and passive; he must become strong and positive. I am aware that it is easier to talk about bringing about this result than it is to accomplish it. Casting out devils is not an easy matter, I fancy. But we must try. Continue to give him a strengthening diet, but not a particle of meat, as that would tend to build up the animal within him—which is what we want to overcome. Keep him as much as possible in the fresh air, and occupy his mind in every way that you can think of; we must trust him to nature while he's asleep. We must make the conditions as unfavorable as possible to the will of the intruder. When he learns that he can no longer use Willie's brain and hands we must suppose he will seek some other victim, weakened by disease and without power of resistance. Meanwhile, watch him closely; some purpose or desire will become apparent if the obsessing influence increases; and, on the other hand, if Willie's power of resistance becomes stronger you will notice these strange moods less and less, and they will gradually disappear."

"In your judgment, are the chances for or against him?" Mrs. Lester asked.

"I am sorry to be obliged to say that in my judgment it is an even question ; we do not know who or what the obsessing force is, and therefore we cannot estimate its strength. I have no personal knowledge of any one who can assist us in this matter at all. I have seen instances in which those who were afflicted in this way threw off the influence and regained their normal mental condition ; and I have seen other instances in which they did not."

CHAPTER III

One afternoon in November, six months later, Dr. Riter and Mr. Holcomb went with a probable purchaser to look at the old house which stood on their land.

"We will let you have the old lumber cheap", Mr. Holcomb said as they walked along. "It is of no present use to us."

"I understand it's headquarters for some rough boys—the Lester boy and the crowd he draws around him. I was in the lot yesterday, trying to get a look at the inside of the house, but the doors were fastened and the windows were boarded up outside and covered with old papers inside, so I got only a glimpse here and there."

Dr. Riter and Mr. Holcomb looked at each other in surprise. "If the doors are fastened and the windows boarded up it must be the work of those boys."

"What is Lester's boy coming to, doctor? It looks to some people as though he's a proper subject for the reform school."

"He will land in prison or in an insane asylum before he is many years older. The reform school will do him no good. The fact is, we don't know what to do with just such cases as his. I have told Mr. Lester that Willie should be under strict authority. Moral suasion has no effect upon him, because he has lost his moral sense, but, and very naturally, his parents are unwilling to send him to strangers."

Two policemen and a boy rushed past them, and turning a corner disappeared from sight, and when they also turned the corner and approached the old house they perceived that something of an unusual nature had occurred, or was taking place there, and that the policemen whom they had seen were trying to break in one of the doors, while an excited crowd looked on.

"What is the matter?" Dr. Riter asked, addressing one of the officers.

"Some boys say that the Lester boy has killed a little chap in here—pounded him to pieces. They looked in through a crack somewhere. They're too excited to tell a straight story, but they must have seen something, for the boy that came for us was pretty near scared to death".

"The child may not be dead", said the doctor, "but we must lose no time. Here—one of you men who live near—go for an axe. We must get that door open."

"Mr. Lester must know of this; has any one gone to tell him?" Mr. Holcomb asked.

"Yes" a man in the crowd answered. "The boy seems to have a devil in him. He wants to torture and kill".

"He killed my dog last week", said a boy. "I guess he buried it in the cellar of that house. That's where he buries the cats and dogs that he kills."

"He tried to kill his little sister a while ago", exclaimed another.

The door was broken in at last, but it was not an easy matter to capture Willie Lester. He resisted the officers, striking furiously with an old ramrod at all who came near him, and being very quick and strong he succeeded in disabling several hands before he was finally overcome.

In one of the rooms the body of a child five or six years old was found, perfectly dead and horribly mutilated. While Dr. Riter was looking at it Mr. Lester came: "If I had taken your advice this would not have occurred", he said.

The body was carried out and laid on the ground. Demoniacal fury had been spent upon it; men turned away from the sickening sight, but Willie Lester's eyes did not shrink from it, as he was carried past by the officers, struggling, screaming, and biting with uncontrollable rage.

ANNIE GETCHELL GALE.

ZOROASTRIANISM.

RELIGION OF THE "FIRE WORSHIPERS".

THE managers of the Parliament of Religions of the World's Fair requested Mr. Narroji of London, a Parsee who is in Parliament, to advise as to the best means for having the Zoroastrian religion represented there, and they were directed to the Rahnumai Mazdayasnan Society of Bombay, which appointed their lecturer, Mr. Sheriarji D. Bharucha, to prepare an address. This he did, and it may be regarded as authoritative. The Society subsequently published the address, and these extracts are from it.<sup>1</sup>

TIME.

There are two expressions as to Time. The first is Time without bounds, or Eternity. The second is Time with a fixed period and therefore restricted to mean a cycle of time. The state of the Universe before the present cycle of time is not treated of in the books. But the end of the world is synchronous with the end of the present cycle when the last of Saoshyants will come. He will regenerate all; the souls in hell will be raised up and all souls will be brought unto bliss, for God's wish cannot be gainsayed. [Hence we see that the old cyclic doctrine is held and that final damnation is not possible. In some Persian books recurrent cycles are mentioned.]

CREATION.

Its object is to promote happiness. The doctrine of creating something out of nothing is not held, but it is taught that the material cause of the world was supplied by the efficient cause Himself. At first there was a spiritual series of creatures. [This resembles the system of Secret Doctrine.] After these came corporeal creations, the lower coming first, and then man last. In the course of this evolution the Saoshyants, who are saviors and teachers, come among men.

MAN'S CONSTITUTION.

Man is a compound of material and spiritual parts, thus :

Tanu	- - - - -	Body.
Ushtana	- - - - -	Life.
Urvan	} - - - - -	Soul. - - - - -	} Feminine.
Fravashi

To soul are ascribed mind, consciousness, and the like.

The soul having been furnished with every aid is expected to come out successful in its moral career and get reward. But if it fails no vicarious salvation can be asked, as that is unknown to the religion.

ETHICS.

As salvation depends on works, it is a peremptory duty to lead a holy life. The code is: Good word, good thought, good deed. All the very highest virtues are inculcated and described in the same way as in any modern system, and vices are emphatically denounced.

WORSHIP AND RITUAL.

Oral recitations of the Sacred Word, sometimes accompanied with ritual, form their worship. Every Parsee generally prays by himself [this is the religion of Jesus], but public worship by all is sometimes performed. Most of the ritual must be performed by the priests. The most necessary ritual is the prayer on untying and retying the sacred thread, called Kusti, round the waist on the sacred shirt called Sudra. [This thread is extremely like the Brahminical one]. Between seven and fifteen the child must be invested with Kusti and Sudra. The Sudra is a white linen shirt with a breast-piece in front. Kusti is a thread or tape made of seventy-two woolen threads, girded three times round the waist with four knots, two in front and two behind. It is worn day and night. It is made of lamb's wool. The ceremony of investiture is called Navrot, i. e., new or first worship, and is performed by one priest in presence of the audience. The materials, colors, knots, and numbers are all symbolical. Laymen cannot take part in the principal ritualistic performances, but can touch some of the accessory implements. [Herein is similarity to Roman Catholic ritual.] Animal sacrifices were once offered, but are not now.

PARSIS NOT FIRE-WORSHIPERS.

A fallacious notion that the Zoroastrians worship fire arose from their outward reverence for it as a great natural salutary agent. All their writers modern and ancient repudiate the notion, and Zoroaster enjoined the worship of the Supreme Being alone. Ferdosi says in the Shahnameh, a great epic,

Do not say that they were fire-worshippers ;
For they were worshippers of God the Holy.

It is extremely probable that Zoroaster found the people worshipping idols, as certain references point to that fact, and reformed them gently by suggesting that they salute as holy the fire, which is the best and highest symbol of the Divine. In the Sun it represents the source of all life on earth, and it would be the part of a wise man to direct people who lived among idolators to such a grand and pure symbol, certainly less open to objection than are the images of Jesus and Mary used in modern times by Christians.

DO MASTERS EXIST?<sup>1</sup>

AS far as my personal interest in the Theosophical studies is concerned, it matters little if these beings do exist or not. For, if the teaching satisfies my sense of truth, if the closest scrutiny fails to discover in it anything that revolts my reason, what does it matter from whence it comes? Is truth less worthy of our assimilation because we are not personally acquainted with its promulgator?

But the very plan, constitution, or policy of the Theosophical Society demands imperatively as its foundation rock the existence of those advanced beings in order to explain, without superstitious beliefs in supernatural revelations, this new outpouring of old forgotten truths which forms the bulk of its tenets. And if the men of our race and age are ever going to make of Theosophy a practical guide in their daily life and not a mere speculation, an intellectual fad, or a sort of system of mental gymnastics, they must first conceive the Masters as ideals to imitate, as men more advanced on the path of evolution than the best of us, nearer to perfection and freer from the many obstacles that our ignorance of the ultimate forces of nature opposes to the exercise of our will. This conception of what a Master must be should be devoid of superstition and mysticism.

It must not be supposed that they are super-human beings, who, being entrusted with special missions and endowed with supernatural powers, are capable of violating the eternal laws of Nature to suit their own caprice. They must not be considered as exceptions, but as natural products of normal evolution, carried to a point of which we did not dream before. They must be looked upon as men who through a long series of incarnations, by wilful and conscious efforts, whose motive has always been the good of others, and whose characteristic has always been self-sacrifice, have arrived at that state of perfection which would be the condition of a human being possessing at the same time mental qualities far superior to those of our greater savants, and heart qualities far beyond those of the greatest self-sacrificing heroes who honor the history of mankind. Who shall slander humanity by saying that such attainments are impossible in a long series of incarnations? Who shall deny that there are to-day many obscure men and women sacrificing themselves for the good of others, doing their full duty and even more than their strict duty, without discrimination, without fear, and without hope; and, on the other hand, that there are many ignored students, consuming their life in the thankless task of pushing a little further the barriers of ignorance which limit to-day every modern science? And why not believe that these men and women are progressing towards Adeptship, some treading now the path of Knowledge and others the path of Compassion? When a student, after having mastered all the secrets of Nature, not only on its material aspect but in what is called its occult side, shall become also a philanthropist capable of sacrificing himself, not for a particular set of people but for the whole of humanity, then a new Master will have evolved.

Let us see now if there are any proofs of the existence of such masters at the present time. I will divide these proofs in three classes: Logical deductions, actual sensible experiences of reliable witnesses, and direct psychical recognitions.

The most commonly used logical proof is that derived from evolution. If we admit that a stone becomes in the course of ages a plant, that this plant becomes an animal, and this animal a man, why shall we be conceited enough to think that men, such as we, are the ne-plus-ultra of terrestrial evolution? To all those who have studied, not read about, the sciences of chemistry, physics, astronomy, and physiology it is plain that our civilization has wrested from Nature many a valuable secret, but it is equally plain that we only know one aspect of Nature, the physical or grossly material, and that very imperfectly yet, since the ultimate laws upon which those sciences are based are far from being understood. Now we find in each one of those realms of human knowledge some of the greatest authorities, not the lesser lights, frankly admitting that when they reach the very bottom of academical orthodoxy in their favorite science they get glimpses of a rich realm far beyond, with new laws more universal and complete in their play than those of physical matter, with new forces far superior and more refined than those hitherto known, and new possibilities far surpassing the wildest conceptions of the most poetical dreamer. Therefore, is it not logical to admit that some men, removed from the hurried struggle for self-gratification of the occidental world, and hence having more time and more energy to devote to the purest investigations of science, communing with nature in its unspoiled grandeur and concentrating their efforts not on self-aggrandizement but on self-improvement,—is it not logical to admit that such men, under such conditions, must certainly have mastered these occult sciences of which even we are beginning to stammer the A, B, C, and that using those sciences practically, as we do those that we know, they are capable of producing effects which we do not understand any more than the Esquimaux at the Fair understand the modus operandi of the electric plant?

Another logical proof is that derived from the nature of the Theosophical teachings themselves. A doctrine that embraces the Divine Principle, Nature, and man, condensing in one harmonious whole the fragmentary knowledge of the Orient and the Occident, of the ancient sages and prophets, the mediæval philosophers and seers, the modern scientists and metaphysicians; that explains satisfactorily all the physical, psychical, and spiritual phenomena; that covers the triple ground of science, philosophy, and religion, not only without omissions and shortcomings but, on the contrary, filling the gaps that we had found in that triple realm of human knowledge and uniting the three in one, such a doctrine cannot be the invention of ordinary men, and much less the offspring of unscientific minds like those of Sinnett, Madame Blavatsky, and Col. Olcott. What else can it be? The revelation of a personal God, the inspiration of dead personalities, or the instruction of perfected living human beings, such as the Masters are. The first supposition is untenable because a personal God is an absurdity; the second is untenable also because death is no initiation and the fact of dying cannot by itself confer superior knowledge; therefore by the simple logical process of reductio ad absurdum the existence of the Masters is proven by the very nature of their teachings, just as a tree is recognised by its fruit.

But there are still more material proofs in the testimony of trustworthy witnesses. Without counting hundreds of Hindus to whom their existence is a simple matter of fact, we have the volunteer affirmations of Sinnett, Madame Blavatsky, Col. Olcott, Countess Wachtmeister, Annie Besant, William Q. Judge, and many others, some of whom have seen them several times even in their physical bodies, and one of whom (Olcott) has still a material tangible object given to him by a Master as a proof that he was not dreaming. Note that all these people are well known and trustworthy, that they have repeated their experiences and asserted the same thing for eighteen years, that they cannot possibly mistake, and that, therefore, they are either lying or telling the truth. Why should they lie? There is no material interest involved; they have nothing to gain by their assertions except the unenviable position of targets for every scoffer's ridicule.

In fact, their social standing would be rather ameliorated by a contrary assertion, for then they would appear as mighty reformers and not as mere instruments.

Is it possible that they lie for the sake of disowning the authorship of books which are in the hands of thousands of admiring readers? If such were the case it would be more wonderful than the existence of the Masters, and certainly there is no court of justice that would not render a favorable decision upon such testimony.

Unfortunately we have to deal not with frank deniers, but with reserved doubters, whose favorite argument is that the experience of others cannot be proof for them.

To these I will dedicate my last series of proofs, and I will say that the Masters have never refused to manifest their existence to those who place themselves in the proper conditions.

They do not show themselves promiscuously to curiosity seekers; they do not mix with the ordinary daily life of men, because they would have no object in doing so and no good would ever come out of it; but they do not hide themselves or try to monopolise the state of Adeptship by preventing others from reaching them. Quite the contrary; there are no obstacles outside of ourselves on the path that leads to them; there are no barred doors, no whimsical initiations; they have affirmed several times that they are ready to help those who seek to approach them with purity of motive by raising themselves up to them, that is to say, by following the same route which they formerly traversed.

There is such a thing as direct apprehension of a fact or a truth without any intervening process of reasoning and without any extraneous intervention. The occidental world is beginning to make its first blundering experiments in psychometry, mesmerism, clairvoyance, etc., and already there are sufficient scientific facts to formulate the opinion of a possible psychical intercourse between kindred souls without any physical or even astral manipulations. This faculty is not the property of any man or set of men. It is common to all, it is latent in all human beings, and the only obstacles to its developments are our own wrong habits and accumulated impulses in a more material direction.

As we are free agents, all that we have to do, if we want to remove the mist of our own manufacture which beclouds our higher perception, is to cultivate more our better and more elevated faculties and live less within the narrow limits of our personality.

Of course the process is a long one, not always achieved in one earthly life. Of course there are dangers to be encountered, but are there no dangers in physical trainings? How many would-be athletes have broken their necks? How many chemical experimenters have been diseased for life by poisonous fumes or maimed by unexpected explosions? How many electricians have been killed by the subtle current? These dangers arise mainly from precipitateness, lack of accuracy, and imperfect knowledge. Let us learn thoroughly, let us be accurate in every act and thought, let us progress with patient coolness, let us be unselfish in the sense of being always actively at work for the benefit of others, purifying our own lower planes so as to give no hold to those astral influences which have converted so many weak mediums and unprepared wonder-seekers into moral wrecks or silly maniacs, and I think that we shall naturally evolve, step by step, until our highest perceptions (call them intuitions if you will) shall be sufficiently open to permit to us a direct cognizance of the Masters' existence.

Bear in mind that they have reached their present high state of evolution mainly by active altruism and self-denial, that their only aim is to help humanity as a whole; therefore, if we imitate them as best we can, we will become in our humble way kindred with them, and then, and only then, shall we know their existence.

Let us wipe out the vapors of selfishness which dim the mirror of our higher consciousness, let us become willing and efficient co-operators in the Masters' altruistic work for the sake of humanity as a whole, let us do the work assigned to us by our Karma well and thoroughly, without hope of personal reward, and the Masters will reveal themselves to us, not by wonderful physical phenomena but by simple, direct communion through the highest planes of our being, those planes which are the true field of their activity.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS THAT HAVE HELPED ME.

DEAR PATH: Seeing in April issue the statement that the Letters compiled by Jasper Niemand were written by William Q. Judge, I would ask further: Were the Letters real, that is, not written for publication, and was each one written by the same person? Yours, READER.

Ans. The Letters were written by me in the regular course of correspondence with the persons to whom they were sent, and were not then intended for publication, nor did I even dream of subsequent publication. Each letter as found in the book was written by one person, that is to say, myself,

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE.

LITERARY NOTES.

MARCH THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XXIV" is of absorbing interest. It gives in full detail five marvellous instances of H. P. B.'s Adept power,—the securing a reply in Master's handwriting to a question by Col. Olcott; a precipitation in colored crayons of writings in other chirography than her own; the production of the famous picture on white satin of Stainton Moses's partial formation of his astral body—a most astonishing feat, feebly to be appreciated by any one who has not seen the picture, now at Adyar and framed; the precipitated portrait of the Indian Yogi; and the execution by Mr. Harisse of a portrait of Col. Olcott's Guru under a thought-transference from H. P. B. The two famous paintings of the Masters by Schmiechen under like influence are referred to, and we may well hope for a full account. An extraordinary incident as to Col. Olcott's beard is also described. All of these cases were in conditions taking them wholly out of the category of possible imposition. The narrative makes no mention of any other witness, but would be franker and stronger if the fact of such a witness was unhesitatingly avowed, no acceptable reason existing for reticence. Friends and disciples of H. P. B. rejoice over the recovered tenderness and reverence now manifesting in the "Leaves". Sepharial predicts woful effects upon India of an approaching eclipse, but omits the old-time antidote of tin pans and yells. As one reads the piteous doom impending over every class in India and China, and all because of a solar eclipse, one is almost reconciled to existence afar from Aryavarta and from belief in Astrology. There is not much else of moment in this Theosophist, except a grand letter from Mrs. Besant to the Indian papers disclaiming any part in politics or any other purpose than devotion to India's spiritual regeneration. Mr. E. T. Sturdy as Secretary of the new Vernacular Section announces the plan adopted for its workings, and the fact that one liberal friend has offered to double any subscriptions up to a total of 500 rupees which may be made before September.—[A.F.]

MARCH LUCIFER. C. J.'s "Indian Ideals" is warm and devout, with a tender sentiment beautiful and uplifting. "The Vision of Odhin", by B. K., has fine and eloquently expressed thought, all in the stern gloominess of the old Norse legends. The Laws of Manu, as quoted by Mr. Mead, and the Prophet Micah agree in the injunction to do justly, and though Mr. Mead in "Justice" appears to discountenance the attempt, considering "compassion the soul of justice", he ends after all by citing the "wise code" which says "Beware lest justice, being overthrown, overthrow thee and us all". And as this is from "ancient Aryavarta", it must be true. "The Veil of Maya", the promised serial, begins well, being graphically done and with much interest, though not as yet very original. Parts of "The Philosophy of the Vedanta" remind one of Mr. Puffer's "I am Brahm; Brahm is everything" in Dr. Hartmann's Talking Image of Urur, but it is entirely possible that Dr. Deussen may talk like Mr. Puffer and yet escape Mr. Puffer's fate. The first installment of the thousand unpublished letters of Eliphaz Levi consists of thirteen, but some are mercifully short. H. T. Edge's "Magical Equilibrium" gives a deeply practical truth, applied directly to some of those questions ever reappearing in Theosophical experience. It is an article worth many readings. Mr. Chas. Johnston in "Brotherhood and Brotherhoods" unites logic and wit in a most commendable questioning of the propriety of F.T.S. calling each other "Bro.", and Lucifer invites further discussion. It is hardly likely that anybody can answer him, however numerous may be the replies. [A.F.]

APRIL LUCIFER gives the first part of "Some Occult Indications in Ancient Astronomy", a clear and instructive article by S. Stuart. Mr. Mead's "Peace" is sweet and gracious in spirit, though perhaps more sentimental than accurate in its opinion that a sense of Unity makes criticism or condemnation impossible. What about the "malicious whisperers" whom we are warned not to imitate and who make peace difficult? Why shouldn't they be condemned, and we too, if doing things worthy of condemnation? And is not the warning itself a condemnation? It may be well to speak the truth only "in love", but it ought to be the truth, all the same. There are twelve pages of Eliphaz Lévi, but "The Veil of Maya" is beautifully and powerfully written, its interest absorbing. K. Prasanna Mukkerji's "Scraps from a Hindu Notebook" is of singular merit. It is a brief treatment of several problems in Karma, eminently rational and comprehensible, and the middle paragraph on page 159 states one of the most encouraging of all truths to Theosophists. Mr. Chas. Johnston's objection to the use of the word "Brother" is receiving excellent support: would that it were universal! Nobody has yet disagreed. The figure of Lucifer on the cover appears this month amid yellow instead of white rays, and his feet have been swathed in a bandage.—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VII, No. 1, is on "The Moral Aspect of Karma" by E. Adams. Although open to the criticisms that it jumps uncomfortably from topic to topic and that the treatment of each is at times too short for satisfaction, it is a paper of great merit, stating very much thought and giving the germs of more. The fable by Combe illustrating the folly of complaint against the action of the physical laws of Nature is admirable, though the argumentation in the second paragraph following is weak indeed.—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VII, No. 2, "An Hour in Borderland Occultism", by Herbert A. W. Coryn. This is perhaps the most remarkable pamphlet ever issued by the T.P.S. Hardly would it be possible to overstate its merit. Countless facts, packed closely in sentences every word of which is chosen with almost unerring instinct for its expressiveness, its accuracy, its force, make these twenty-eight pages a condensed extract of the vast knowledge they disclose; deep and careful thought takes out their innermost significance, fitting it faultlessly into its place in the philosophy portrayed; and a lofty spirit of pure devotion, warmed with love for humanity wherever found, gives a gracious dignity to the whole composition. So captivating is the combination of interesting matter and delightful style that the reader goes on raptly till the mind is forced to rest from the close attention needful to let no word or thought escape. Always is the diction elevated, rich; but at times, and preëminently on pages 11 and 12, it mounts to a thrilling eloquence. Particularly instructive is the explanation of the astral body in its relation to hypnotism (page 4), of curing bad habits (page 5), of the phases of mediumship (pages 18-24). Sometimes a delicate gleam of humor shows a different side of the writer, sometimes, as on page 19, line 28, a sharply-cut antithesis tells a whole story in a word, but all the pamphlet is fascinating, an extraordinary combination of learning, ability, taste, and skill. There are a few grammatical slips due probably to a printer, and these should be corrected in the many later editions which may well be needed. (The PATH, 15 cents.)—[A.F.]

A MODERN LOVE STORY, favorably noticed in April PATH, is published by Chas. H. Kerr & Co., Chicago: 50 cts. paper, $1.00 cloth. It may be ordered through PATH.

VOICE OF THE SILENCE. The new edition of this book is ready, and orders received have all been filled. In addition to the matter contained in former editions, the Stanzas of Dzyan have been added and a portrait of H.P.B. given. The size is the same as our editions of Bhagavad Gita and Patanjali's Yoga Aphorisms. The book is printed on wood-cut paper and bound in two styles; in morocco with gilt edges at $1.00, and in red leather with red edges at 75 cents.

MRS. ANNIE BESANT'S FIVE LECTURES before the Convention at Adyar in December were reported verbatim and corrected by the author with a preface for a pamphlet edition to be published by the Theosophist. The subjects are "The Building of the Cosmos", "Sound", "Fire", "Yoga", "Symbolism and Karma". The price, to be hereafter announced, will be between 50 and 75 cts.

THINGS COMMON TO CHRISTIANITY AND THEOSOPHY, the promised pamphlet containing papers read before the Aryan Branch at the discussion of that topic, is now in print. It is of forty pages, and gives the views of Alexander Fullerton, Harry S. Budd, Joseph H. Fussell, Leon Landsberg, and William Q. Judge. The circulation of some such exposition is particularly desirable at this epoch of Theosophical progress, as corrective of the idea that Theosophy is the enemy of Christ, Christians, and Christianity; and it should certainly tend to mollify orthodox bitterness towards Theosophists. Whether themselves Christians or not, they can usefully distribute it among Christian friends, and thus contribute to hasten the era of peace on earth and good-will among men. (THE PATH; 10 cts.)

PRINCIPIA NOVA ASTRONOMICA, by the learned Dr. Henry Pratt who has contributed erudite articles upon the Pentateuch to the Theosophist, contends for a new theory respecting the commensurable orbit of the sun, the cellular function of stars, and various terrestrial and cosmic phenomena which have been more or less accurately determined but have been denied interpretation in the light of large analogy and comparison. Beginning with a discussion of "Astronomical Paradoxes", Dr. Pratt states eighteen principles and the issue before him, and then in twenty-six Theorems and six Theories expounds his specific thought. Besides the fulness and cogency of the argumentative portions, Dr. Pratt gives copious illustrative diagrams, forty-four in number. (Williams & Norgate, 14 Henrietta street, Covent Garden, London).—[A. F.]

MODERN THEOSOPHY is the just-issued work by Claude Falls Wright, the well-known Theosophical lecturer and worker. Originally written for a N. Y. publishing house under the name Theosophy, a Popular Exposition but kept back by that house's assignment, it has been revised and enlarged, and is published by the N. E. Theosophical Corporation. It aims to give an accurate map, as well filled out as space permits, of the whole Theosophical system, the more important landmarks being portrayed in detail and the connection of all made clear. The author had the advantage of living three years with H. P. B., and, as on page 161, makes good use of truths learned in conversations with her. Some of the most recent utterances of scientists help to bring the work up to date. Mr. Wright's subdivisions are good, the thought in each is excellently worked-out, and many references and quotations give strength to his positions, but perhaps the great charm of the book is its easy flow, the style being so smooth and limpid, yet with a certain life very taking. No one topic can have the fuller treatment given in Esoteric Buddhism or Mrs. Besant's Manuals, but each has some specific contribution from the straight-forward thought and the graceful wording of the author, and the book must certainly have a mission in quarters as yet untouched by the others. It unhappily lacks an index. Not quite correct is it to say (page 108) that the Linga Sharira requires only a few months for disintegration, nor (page 113) that suicides and victims of accidental death are immediately reincarnated. The statement that H. P. B. offered herself as a leader to the Freemasons in 1875 needs some explicit proof, the impossibility of initiating a woman being patent. The concluding sentence of the whole book is very striking. (THE PATH; paper 50 cts., cloth $1.00.—[A. F.]

THE NORTHERN THEOSOPHIST for April illustrates again that singular aptness and sound sense which makes the "Editor's Remarks" such wholesome, refreshing reading.

ANSWERED QUERIES, the excellent little pamphlet by Miss F. M. G. Camp which was cordially noticed by the PATH some time ago, is in stock and for sale at 10 cts. Many are the questions which instantly form as a person first encounters Theosophy, and they need clear and rational response,—which they get here.—[A. F.]

DR. FRANZ HARTMANN'S NEW BOOK, The Mystical Aspect of the Teachings of Theophrastus Paracelsus, is to be printed and published at the expense of the city of Salzburg and under the patronage of the Austrian Government. It will be in German, but possibly a translation into English may be arranged.

THE REV. S. J. NEILL of Auckland, New Zealand, has been deposed from the ministry of the Presbyterian Church because of suspicion of heresy based mainly upon his membership in the Theosophical Society. Mr. Neill has published a pamphlet entitled The History of a Heresy Hunt, by the Hunted, giving the correspondence and the action by the Presbytery. It may be ordered from the PATH for 20 cents.

Mirror of the Movement.

BROOKLYN T.S. Sunday evening lectures in April were: The Origin of the Devil, Leon Landsberg; Consolations of Theosophy, Alexander Fullerton; "Old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new", A. W. Wadham; Problems of Life, H. T. Patterson; Nature, its Laws and Qualities, Jos. H. Fussell.

THE COUNTESS WACHTMEISTER and Mr. Ernest T. Hargrove, representing respectively the Indian and the European Section, arrived in New York by the Lucania on March 31st. The Countess became the guest of Mrs. Eliz. C. Mayer, and Mr. Hargrove of Mr. Alex. H. Spencer. On the following Tuesday both spoke at the regular meeting, the Countess giving an account of her late tour in India, and Mr. Hargrove discussing Theosophical topics. Great pleasure was given to the large audience by both addresses. On Thursday the 5th the General Secretary's party started for San Diego.

The Countess may possibly remain in this country some months, visiting and addressing the leading Branches. Although nothing is yet determined, it may be well for such Branches as desire a visit to communicate with her at the Headquarters in New York, whence letters will be forwarded. Her long and close intimacy with H.P.B. her intimate familiarity with Theosophical affairs and work, her utter consecration to the Cause, and her sweet and gracious personality, all unite to make acquaintance with her a privilege. She will open in the autumn an important Theosophical centre at Allahabad, India, whither the Headquarters of the Indian Section is to be removed from Adyar, and meantime purposes missionary work in the West. Remarkably fluent and easy in public speech, full of deeply interesting anecdote and fact, her visit to America may well be made no less delightful to F.T.S. than serviceable to her aim—the Society's good.

ARYAN T.S. Sunday evening lectures in April were: Does Science teach Immortality, Ellis B. Guild; Soul and Spirit, D. Nicholson; Christianity as a Factor in Human Evolution, Harry S. Budd; The Truth about Ghosts, Jas. H. Connelly; A Christian Theosophist, Alexander Fullerton.

IN FEBRUARY a number of the younger members of the Brooklyn T.S. formed a class for practice in public speaking. The class now numbers twenty and its weekly meetings are well attended. The method followed is as follows: The only regular officer is a Secretary, who looks after things generally. A chairman is appointed for each meeting, so that all the members may have practice in presiding. Subjects for discussion are chosen a week in advance, and the members prepare five-minute papers one week, and the next week the chairman calls for three-minute extempore speeches. The Secretary calls "time" at the expiration of three or five minutes as the case may be. Much interest is shown by the members, and the improvement is already noticeable. The animus of the class is expressed in Lord Bacon's aphorism: "Reading maketh the full man; writing, the accurate man; and speaking, the ready man". Only Fellows of the T.S. under thirty years of age are eligible for membership. The meetings are held every Monday evening at 140 Halsey street, Brooklyn.

As a result of the Young Folks' Practice Class in Brooklyn, another such class has just been started in New York by some members of the Aryan Branch. The first meeting was held April 16th.

SPRINGFIELD T.S., Springfield, Mass., has died at last. It was born in 1891, was feeble from the first because inert, and its demise, like its existence, has aroused no emotion. The number of American Charters was thus reduced on April 5 to eighty-six.

THE BRANCHES IN CHICAGO united in sending as their delegate to the Convention in San Francisco Mrs. Mercy M. Thirds. A "Press Bureau", which is the result of a suggestion from Brother Claude Falls Wright, has been recently formed within the Chicago Branch. It is for the purpose of securing as much recognition of Theosophy from the Press, in addition to notices of meetings, as possible. Mrs. Mary Robbins acts as Chairman. Mrs. Robbins has presented the Branch with a crayon portrait of Brother Gyanendra Chakravarti in his native costume. Several of the younger members of the Branch are interested in lecturing, and already are promising candidates for the "Lecture Bureau". The Bureau expects to be able in a few months to extend its field in every direction. During April the following lectures were given in Chicago by members of the Bureau: Theosophy and the Poor, Mrs. M. M. Thirds; Why I should Join the T.S. and The Light of the Spirit, Miss Eva F. Gates; Man Makes Himself and The Doublefaced Deity, Mr. R. D. A. Wade; and Mahatmas and Chelas and The Evolution of the Soul, by Miss Leoline Leonard.

SOMERVILLE T.S., Somerville, Mass., was chartered on March 29th with eleven Charter members. The President is Mr. Wm. H. Somersall, and the Secretary Miss Helen J. Wescott, 19 Boston st. The dissolution of the Springfield T.S. makes this the eighty-sixth Branch on the American roll.

BURCHAM HARDING during the past month has visited the branches at New Haven, New Britain, and Bridgeport in Connecticut, also Westerly and Providence in Rhode Island. At each place the work has been systematized and fresh vigor infused among the members. Great zeal is shown by New Britain branch, and for the greater convenience of some of its members classes for study have been started at Bristol and Meriden. At Hartford a public lecture was well attended, resulting in the formation of a class to meet at the studio of Mr. A. C. Fenety, a member of the Boston branch now residing in Hartford. Thanks to Miss F. E. Burr, F.T.S., the newspaper reports were full and helpful. On Easter Sunday Mr. Harding "preached" in the Universalist Church, New Britain, on "The Resurrection viewed Theosophically."

At Westerly the public meetings were well-attended, showing that in small (New England blue) towns a knowledge of Theosophy is desired. At Providence, by special request, a lecture was given before the "Philosophical Club" of the old established "Brown's University" under the presidency of Prof. Seth. This Baptist stronghold impressed itself as favorably impressed. At all the above places the outlook is encouraging. Members who have grasped the philosophy feel an unusual confidence in spite of anxiety caused by trade conditions, the new members assiduously working and the general public peering from a distance, feeling that Theosophy holds the key to solve their threatening troubles.

ANNIE BESANT T.S., Fort Wayne, Ind., notes growing attention to Theosophical topics and decreasing opposition to the movement. Its doctrines do not call forth the denunciation which even its terms did a short time ago, and even the pulpit is changing. The adoption of a syllabus has been most beneficial, and discussions are vigorously maintained.

CLAUDE FALLS WRIGHT attended meeting of the Englewood Branch Thursday, February 22d. On Saturday, February 24th, he attended Chicago Branch Bhagavad Gita class and debating class. Sunday the 25th, he lectured before Chicago branch on "Symbolism". Wednesday the 28th he attended that Branch's regular meeting and then addressed it. March 1st he attended regular meeting of the Englewood Branch, and on Saturday, March 3d, he again was present at the Chicago debating class. On Sunday, March 4th, he lectured before the Chicago Society on "H.P.B. and the Mahatmas", and then unveiled a new portrait of Madame Blavatsky by Mrs. Leonard. On Monday he attended a conversazione given by the Chicago Branch. The Wednesday following, March 8th, he left for New York. Tuesday, March 13th, he took part in the discussion at Aryan meeting on "Nemesis". Thursday, March 15th, he officiated at the funeral of Miss Marie Olsen, a Theosophist of New York City, attending also the cremation at Fresh Pond; the same evening he attended the regular Brooklyn Branch meeting. On Sunday evening, March 18th, he lectured on "H.P.B. and the Mahatmas" in the hall of the Harlem branch. The same night he left for Boston. On Wednesday, the 21st, Mr. Wright formed a Branch of the T.S. in Somerville, Mass. Thursday, the 22d, he lectured before Boston T.S. on "Occultism". Friday, the 23d, he addressed a meeting of persons interested at Lynn, Mass. Sunday afternoon, the 25th of March, he addressed Cambridge Branch on "Concentration". The same evening he lectured before the Malden Branch on "H.P.B. and the Mahatmas". Monday, March 26th, the Boston T.S. gave him a reception in its rooms; and on Wednesday, March 28th, the Cambridge Branch gave him a reception also in its rooms. On Thursday, the 29th of March, he lectured before Boston Branch on "Occult Development"; and on Friday, March 30th, he started an elocution class at the Rooms of the New England Headquarters. Sunday afternoon, April 1st, he answered questions at the Cambridge T.S., and the same evening lectured to a large meeting in Boston on "The Laws of Life". Monday, April 2d, he left for New York. On Friday, April 6th, he left New York for Macon, Ga. Saturday evening, April 7th, he met a few members in the Macon Branch rooms. On Sunday afternoon, 8th of April, he addressed 480 people in the Opera House, Macon, on "An Outline of Theosophy". Monday, 9th of April, he met a few members in the Society's rooms. "Hypnotism" was the topic of a lecture in Steinway Hall on Tuesday, 10th of April. On Wednesday he lectured at the same hall on "Reincarnation". Thursday, April 12th, he attended a meeting in the Cherry Street rooms. Friday he lectured at Steinway Hall on "Dreams". On the afternoon of Sunday, April 15th, he addressed an audience of seven hundred people in the Opera House on "The Theosophical Society", and on Monday evening, April 16th, he answered questions in the Society's rooms at Macon.

Mr. Wright has also attended many other private meetings and visited members personally. He now goes to Atlanta, Palatka, and New Orleans.

GEN. JAMES BINTLIFF'S Theosophical lecture at Monroe, Wis., was published in four installments by the local press and afterwards issued as a pamphlet by Bro. C. B. Churchill. The good work done by these gentlemen in conjunction with Bro. George A. Marshall of Darlington is of no small worth.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

FRESNO T.S., Fresno, Calif., was chartered on March 26th with nine members. The President is Mrs. Marie W. Culver, and the Secretary Dr. Laura A. Harris, 1835½ Mariposa street.

DR. GRIFFITHS lectured at Oakland, Calif., March 18th, upon Theosophy and Heredity. Every seat was taken. The lecture on the 22d was in Napa. On April 1st the doctor lectured in the State's Prison at San Quentin to five hundred prisoners, all that the chapel could hold. A quiz-class followed, and many expressed great satisfaction. This was the first of the lectures given there under the auspices of the Coast Committee, and will be followed by one on the first Sunday of each month. The same evening Dr. Griffiths lectured upon "The High Lights of Theosophy" before the San Francisco T.S., and on the 8th visited the Sacramento Branch, lecturing and holding a quiz meeting.

INDIA.

MRS. ANNIE BESANT'S INDIAN TOUR.

The statement in English newspapers that Mrs. Besant expressed political views in her Indian addresses, and in particular that she prophesied the delivery of India from "the foreign yoke", has been fully denied by published letters from herself, and the London papers show that the English and Indian governments totally exonerate her from this improbable charge. It is most interesting to know also that great enthusiasm for her was aroused among the Brahmins in Poona, the very ones who formerly looked upon the T.S. with indifference. On the last day of her lecture, there was spontaneously raised among the Brahmins within two hours a fund for a present to her of a rich shawl, a gold-embroidered saru, and a shela; the old president of the Sarvajnik-Sabha getting up and publicly thanking her for her lecture and garlanding her in the presence of the whole audience of four thousand. The applause was immense.

CEYLON LETTER.

It affords me very great pleasure to inform the readers of the PATH that the "Annie Besant School and H.P.B. Home for Girls" was formally opened by Mrs. Higgins in the Cinnamon Gardens on the 24th February. There was a large gathering of friends present on the occasion, and the function passed off very successfully. A photograph of the institution with the building was taken on the opening day. It may not be out of place to mention here that the institution is entirely connected with the Theosophical Society and has no connection whatever with any local organization. The present building of the institution is a temporary one built of mud walls with palm leaf roof and mud flooring. It has accommodation for thirty or forty girls, besides quarters for the principal and her assistant staff. Already the place is quite crowded by the girls of both the Home and the School, and we are receiving applications from very deserving girls for new admissions to the Home but have to refuse them just now. Both School and Home have a very useful career before them, and Mrs. Higgins deserves to be congratulated on the useful and successful work which she is carrying on in the institution. The temporary building is erected on the grounds adjoining the site where Mrs. Besant laid the foundation stone for the permanent building of the institution, and we are making every endeavor to construct it. The land is a gift to the Theosophical Society from Mr. Peter de Abrew.

 THE GENERAL SECRETARY'S TOUR.

April 10th. Reached Los Angeles at 7 p.m., were met by Dr. G. F. Mohn, J. Neubauer, and others, and went to Hollenbuck Hotel. Bros. Judge, Buck, and Hargrove went to Branch meeting at 8.15 o'clock and spoke on Theosophy and T.S. Work, the rest of the party being too tired to go.

April 11th. Messrs. Judge and Hargrove started early for San Diego, there being only two trains a day, and reached there at one o'clock p.m., were met by Mrs. Doolittle, Mr. Blackmer, and others, and proceeded to the Florence House, overlooking magnificent San Diego Bay and Pacific Ocean. After lunch, Messrs. Judge and Hargrove addressed a large Branch meeting and met all members until five o'clock. A public lecture was announced for the evening at Unity Church, where Messrs. Judge and Hargrove spoke upon The Aim of Life to a very fair audience. The members there are very active and the two branches being united better work is being done.

Countess Wachtmeister, Mrs. Judge, Mrs. Cape, and Dr. Buck arrived from Los Angeles at 8.30 p.m., all stopping at Florence Hotel.

April 12th. A special meeting was held at ten o'clock a.m., and a Branch meeting at three o'clock p.m., whereat Countess Wachtmeister gave reminiscences of H. P. Blavatsky. In the evening Dr. Buck addressed the Branch upon Theosophy and Theosophical Work. Party left San Diego on Friday morning for Los Angeles.

Countess Wachtmeister left the party at Riverside to help organize the new T.S. Branch there, and met many of the prominent persons of the town. Eleven members attended and a library was started. She reached Los Angeles on 14th and remained there until Tuesday to see enquirers and help the Branch, and then came on to the Convention.

William Q. Judge and party returned to Los Angeles on the 13th. The town was in the middle of a festa and was crowded with visitors. A lecture under the branch auspices was announced for the evening at Unity Church the subject being The Aim of Life by Dr. Buck, E. T. Hargrove, and William Q. Judge. A large audience was present. After the lecture many members came to see the visitors. April 13th, at two o'clock p.m., all started for San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. Judge are the guests of E. B. Rambo, Dr. Buck stays with Dr. Anderson, and E. T. Hargrove with Mr. Bunker.

On Sunday evening, the usual open meeting was held in Red Men's Hall at 8 p.m. Before this an hour was devoted to "interviews" with representatives of the local press. The party then proceeded to the Hall, where, besides the usual paper being read, short speeches were made by Bros. Judge, Buck, and Hargrove respectively. The General Secretary received an enthusiastic welcome, a very warm one being also extended to Dr. Buck, who was introduced to those present by Dr. Anderson as the "old war-horse of the T.S." During this meeting, at which some 250 people were present, a telegram was received from Los Angeles announcing that the Countess was speaking to a packed audience.

RELIGIOUS PARLIAMENT.

First session began at 2.30 p.m. on the 16th of April at Golden Gate Hall, San Francisco, Dr. Hirst in the chair. Bros. William Q. Judge and Dr. J. D. Buck were on the platform. The Chairman informed Bro. Judge before the meeting that he would ask for a short response at opening, but as two other speakers used up too much time this did not follow. A Hebrew rabbi and a Congregationalist preacher made the only responses. The hall was pretty full. It is a pleasant new hall in the centre of the city, and the T.S. meetings were held in the same place.

The evening for the Theosophical presentation saw a large crowd in attendance to listen to William Q. Judge and Dr. Buck. Rev. Dr. Hirst presided, and, strange to say, Mr. Coleman was on the platform. Bro. Judge was the first speaker on Points of Agreement in all Religions", with but half an hour to deal with the subject. When he was introduced the immense audience applauded tumultuously: it listened intently for the entire time and then again indulged in as much applause as before. The address made no attack on any one, but as Mr. Coleman had said some things against Hinduism in the afternoon, the speaker adverted to that religion and gave the other side. He repeated several magnificent verses from the Vedas, the Upanishads, and the Bhagavad-Gita, to which the people listened with held breath. Dr. Buck then followed on Reincarnation, and was accorded the same full and close attention to the end. It was a noticeable thing that numbers of the audience left after this, as the next speaker was on Swedenborgianism. Similarly to the Congress at Chicago, this one also was the success of all so far. The people seem to be anxious to hear what the Theosophist has to say. Theosophy has thus again been heard in the second Parliament of Religions, much to the discomfiture of the enemy who delight in thinking that the Society is dead or dying. Nothing can kill it but internal dissension, of which we have some just now in the persons of those who ought to be its preservers.

EIGHTH ANNUAL CONVENTION.

FIRST SESSION.

Convention assembled at Golden Gate Hall at 10. 20 a.m., when the General Secretary called it to order. The Hall was nearly full, about 200 members being present. After the call to order, Dr. J. A. Anderson of San Francisco T.S. was elected temporary chairman, and he organized the assembly, after which he suggested William Q. Judge as Secretary to the Convention, which was ordered, and then the permanent Chairman was elected by acclamation, being Dr. J.D.Buck. Dr. Buck took his seat at 10:42, greeted the Convention in a short speech, and proceeded to business. Foreign delegates were then received, the Countess C. Wachtmeister representing Indian Section and Mr. Ernest T. Hargrove standing for Europe. The General Secretary's and the Treasurer's Reports were then read amid deep attention.

Countess Wachtmeister then addressed the Convention on behalf of the Indian Section in quite a long speech, which gratified and instructed the Convention. She described the coming removal of Indian Section Headquarters from Adyar to Allahabad, which she said would practically get rid of Adyar, which was really useless in her opinion except for one week during Convention. She also proposed that America send William Q. Judge as General Secretary to India to next Anniversary. Applause greeted her remarks, and in reply to a question as to what she thought her proposal would lead to she said, "Well, to get rid of Adyar" (laughter).

A letter of fraternal greeting was read from B. Keightley as Indian General Secretary and ordered filed. Europe was then represented by Mr. E.T. Hargrove, who first presented a message by cable from the European Section, as follows:

LONDON, April, 21, 1894.

Convention please accept most hearty congratulations from European Section.

He then read the official greeting, and letters from Vienna, from Count von Leiningen, and from Sr. Xifré of Madrid. By this time the Hall was completely crowded, and the deepest and closest attention was manifested.

Committees were then appointed to audit, on resolutions and nominations. The following decisions were made by resolution.

(a) Allowing $200.00 out of the funds to the Pacific Coast Committee for sustentation of lecture work; (b) allowing William Q. Judge to employ a private secretary; (c) allowing the General Secretary to pay the expense of the private circular issued by William Q. Judge relating to the charges against him; (d) directing the printing in one cover of the General Constitution and the Constitution of this Section "for the use of members".

A resolution was then passed saying that this Section still holds to the opinion that the term of the succession to the Presidency should be for life.

The question of the suspension of the Vice President arose on Brother Judge's stating that the President had notified him of suspension, and this resolution was unanimously carried, all rising:

That this Convention, after careful deliberation, finds that such suspension of the Vice President is without the slightest warrant in the Constitution, and altogether transcends the discretionary powers given the President by the Constitution, and therefore null and void.

And this Section, in convention assembled, hereby expresses its unqualified protest against the said illegal action by the President of the Society, and can see no necessity for such action, and that even did the Constitution contain any provision for a suspension, it would have been wholly needless and unbrotherly, inasmuch as by the Constitution the Vice President has no duties or power save in case of the death, resignation, or accusation of the President.

Dr. Anderson then proposed to submit resolutions regarding the charges made against William Q. Judge of "misuse of Mahâtmas' names and handwriting" for committee consideration, but on motion they were passed by a rising vote. The substance of them is as follows:

Premising that Col. Olcott, Annie Besant, A. P. Sinnett, and others had at various times claimed to have heard from the alleged Mahâtmas, and that Col. Olcott by request had begun proceedings for an official inquiry by a Judicial Committee to try the question whether William Q. Judge had "misused the names and handwritings of the Mahâtmas", and that the Constitution provided freedom for all as to beliefs, and that no dogma of any kind could be officially recognized by the Society, and that Col. Olcott on the twenty-seventh of May, 1893, had by executive order expressly announced this, referring especially to ethical leaders and teachers and to bodies of teachers, the Convention

Resolved that the opinion of the Convention was that the President's action was uncalled for, unconstitutional, illegal, and improper; and that it cordially endorsed the interpretation of the rules in respect to this matter published by the General Secretaries of India and Europe in a circular, and in the private circular of William Q. Judge; and reaffirmed the right of all to believe or disbelieve in the Mahâtmas or Masters; and then thanked William Q. Judge for his work and expressed full belief and confidence in him.

A rider was then added to the foregoing and unanimously passed.

It says that if in the face of a protest of this Section an investigation is to go on, then that Col. Olcott, Annie Besant, A. P. Sinnett, and others should be investigated, and they be compelled to show their commission from the Mahâtmas and to divulge what they know thereon and to show the truthfulness of their claims thereon. Lastly this was passed :

Resolved, that in the opinion of this Section only a body of Mahâtmas appearing at the session of the Committee could decide whether or not any communication was or is a genuine or fraudulent Mahâtmic message.

Several reports were then presented and referred, such as League Report and Report on World's Fair T.S. Congress. Bro. Judge then reported that the T.S. was duly represented by Dr. Buck and himself in San Francisco on April 17th, where they made addresses on Reincarnation and Points of Agreement in All Religions. Adjournment was then taken at 12:20.

SECOND SESSION.

The second session opened at 2:30 p.m., Dr. Buck in the chair, with the Hall crammed, many standing. The Countess Wachtmeister then further explained that Col. Olcott had agreed to transfer of Indian Headquarters to some other place. Toronto T.S. asked for next Convention there, which was referred. The work of the Lotus Circles was approved. It was then ordered by unanimous vote that the Executive Committee appoint the delegates on the Judicial Committee on the charges against Brother Judge, and directing :

Such delegates are directed to take as their instructions on the points of constitutionality all such resolutions and parts of resolutions passed by this Convention as apply to the same.

It was then resolved the steamship fare of one delegate to said committee's sitting, between New York and London and back, might be drawn from the funds of this Section.

At this point the papers of the day were taken up, Miss M. A. Walsh addressing the Convention on the Extent and Variety of T.S. Work in the World. She outlined our work and showed how strong we are and how we are working to turn the thought of the next century. Rev. W. E. Copeland followed with a paper on Esoteric Christianity. The greatest interest was shown in both papers, and the matter given was extremely useful as well as interesting. Abbott Clark read a short paper on Karma, and was followed by Mrs. S. A. Harris on the Dangers of Psychism.

A discussion on Branch Work then followed, taken part in by Countess Wachtmeister, Miss Walsh, Mr. F. M. West, W. Q. Judge, and Mrs. Thirds, after which the Pacific Coast Lecturer's condensed report was read. It showed that he had visited 150 cities, lectured 169 times, held 237 meetings, had 21,000 people, distributed 48,000 leaflets, obtained 700 columns of reports in the press, traveled 13,000 miles, and founded seven Branches.

Adjourned at 5 p.m.

THIRD SESSION.

The third session was opened at 8 p.m. at Golden Gate Hall where the Religious Parliament sat, and Dr. Buck occupied the chair at first and later Dr. Anderson. The large hall was crowded with people who had begun to come at an early hour.

Countess Wachtmeister opened by speaking on Theosophical Reminiscences, giving what H.P.B. told her of the T.S. movement. She said H.P.B. met her Master in 1851 at London when he told her he had selected her for the work of a Society. She told her father and got his consent to do what she was asked. She then went away and was taught, and after many years returned to the world instructed to find a man named "Olcott". Coming to America she asked everyone of such a man, and at last found him at the Eddy farm. She was a medium in youth, but in her training that was "knocked out of her" and she was shown how to do phenomena by will power. The Countess then applied Theosophy to daily life, and reaffirmed our undogmatic character by saying no belief in Masters or H.P.B. was demanded. She spoke over half an hour, displayed an immense amount of native talent as a speaker, and held her audience closely.

Brother E. T. Hargrove, London Delegate, followed upon Occultism the Dictum of Common Sense, claiming that the laws of the natural world should be applied to the spiritual, and cited Huxley thereon. He asserted that Occultism is the doctrine of Common Sense, and claimed that all men are seeking the unknown.

Dr. J. D. Buck then spoke on Scientific Theosophy, showing how all science in its true sense tends to prove Theosophy and not to disprove it.

William Q. Judge began at 9:40 p.m. to speak on What Theosophy is not, but all remained and applauded continuously. He adverted to all the religions of the world and showed they were not Theosophy, but claimed the good and the true of them for Theosophy. When he said "We have not been accused of being Christians", the entire audience laughed. He said "Theosophy is the Reformer of Religions, the Justifier of Conscience, and Mediator between Science and Religion; it is our present and future, our life, our death, and our immortality". A storm of applause then followed, as everyone waited to the last word, and to the astonishment of the Theosophists there were loud calls for "Judge", who was rather ashamed to step forward and bow to the applauders. It was very evident that the abuse in the newspapers had not lowered interest nor driven people away. In the opening of his remarks Bro. Judge referred to the newspaper abuse and the instigators of it in the city, and said they should all be forgiven, and, if they wished, taken in the Society and helped to be better.

FOURTH AND FIFTH SESSIONS.

The morning and afternoon sessions at Red Men's Hall were crowded, the afternoon being literally jammed, so that people had to sit on the steps of the platform. Dr. Buck opened at 10:10 a.m., and all resolutions were reported by the committee. Section 11 of Article 3 of the Constitution providing for 25 per cent of receipts to go to Indian Headquarters was abolished entirely, and American official remittances limited to fees and dues. On proposal of Countess Wachtmeister the General Secretary was authorized to go to India, if necessary, to a convention, but the question of making any suggestions as to removal of the Indian Headquarters was declared premature. A resolution was passed requesting the Council of the T.S. to alter the Constitution by providing for a really general T.S. convention to rotate through the Sections. The resolutions of Boston and Providence Branches asking the General Secretary to inquire of the Indian Section what and how many Branches were active and in good standing there, and to show why they do not think the rule of payment of dues should prevail to make "good standing", were approved. The Oriental Department was approved and continued. The circular issued by the Indian and European General Secretaries, and that of William Q. Judge, regarding investigations into letters from Mahâtmas were approved. The Bond scheme of savings boxes and Harter scheme of subscribers for funds for T.S. were approved.

The General Secretary was ordered to ask the Council of the T.S. to amend the Constitution so as to require the President to consult the Sections before forming new Sections, and that the basis of representation be made 100 members instead of 250. The American Rules were amended by altering basis of votes to every ten members after first five, from every twenty-five, thus giving large Branches more votes.

The Vice President presented correspondence between himself and E. B. Page on a question arising with a member in the West who had sent messages claimed as from Mahâtmas, and the Convention approved his decision that it was not a matter for charges and that the President's order to the T.S. Congress at Chicago settled the question constitutionally.

The new Executive Committee is Alexander Fullerton, Elliott B. Page, Dr. J. A. Anderson, Dr. J. D. Buck, Alpheus M. Smith, and Robert Crosbie. The Treasurer for next year is Alexander Fullerton; William Q. Judge was elected General Secretary for next year.

The afternoon session was confined to papers and addresses by Dr. Buck, E. T. Hargrove, Mrs. Beane, Mrs. Thirds, Mrs. Blodgett, and William Q.

Judge. At 4:30 p.m. a photograph of the Delegates was taken on a park in front of the Hall.

LAST SESSION.

This was at Golden Gate Hall at 8:00. It was crowded again. Dr. Cook spoke on Primitive Christianity and Theosophy, and Dr. Buck on An Object Lesson in the Wisdom Religion, using a diagram in colors. E. T. Hargrove spoke on Reincarnation, and William Q. Judge on Spiritualism. Great interest was manifested, and Dr. Buck closed the meeting amid a storm of applause. Beyond doubt this was the most successful convention ever held in this or any other Section, not only as to interest but as to attendance and public report.

WHITE LOTUS DAY—1894.

Once again the anniversary of H.P.B.'s departure is upon us, with all its memories of devoted work, cordial confidence in fellow-workers, freedom from envy and secret machination. As heretofore in the three years gone by, many will be the tributes to her labor and its effects; yet perhaps none will surpass the glowing words of the President-Founder uttered in Theosophist of July, 1891, in the first flush of sorrow and desolation. They are gladly reproduced now, as certifying to the spirit which intercourse with her would fittingly produce, the possibility of direct relation with Masters vouchsafed by her to her immediate pupils, and the sacredness with which her faithful friends surround her memory. All Branches may well re-read them and reflect upon their copious suggestiveness:

"And what wonder that I, who have been favored beyond all others in the Theosophical Society with these valid proofs; who was shown by her the realities of transcendental chemistry and physics, and the marvellous dynamic potencies of the human mind, will, and soul; who was led by her into the delightful path of truth which I have ever since joyfully trodden; and who was made personally to see, know, and talk with the Eastern Teachers—what wonder that I have loved her as a friend, prized her as a teacher, and evermore keep her memory sacred? Living, I might quarrel with her, but dead, I must only bewail her irreparable loss, and redouble my exertions to push on our joint work".—

THEOSOPHICAL CORRESPONDENCE CLASS.

The number of members in the Correspondence Class is now 243. The answers to Question Papers Nos. I and II, which so far have been sent in, have been very good and have shown evidence of thought and study.

The third set of Questions has been sent to those who have answered No. II, and No. IV will shortly be ready. A paper of Notes and Comments on Papers I and II is now in the press and will shortly be sent to members who have answered those papers.

New members can join the class at any time and have the first set of questions. Applications for membership should not be sent to General Secretary, but to Secretary T. S. Correspondence Class, 144 Madison Avenue, New York.

SUPPORT OF T. S.

There appeared in The Path a year ago a brief communication from me under the above title. The communication referred to was brought out by there having come to me the knowledge that the work of the T.S. was handicapped by the want of means, by the lack of common, hard, ordinary dollars and cents; that much or all of the means at the command of our faithful workers came from a very few of the older members; and, what possibly had more to do with my determination and action in the matter than anything else, that all the contributions from all other sources combined were entirely inadequate, and had to be helped out by large additions from the Headquarters' Staff, from those whose time and intellect and energy were being devoted to the work practically or entirely without pay. I could not believe otherwise than that such failure of support was due entirely to a lack of effort upon the part of somebody toward the raising of a perpetual fund—that is, a fund that could be relied upon from month to month and from year to year. The communication spoken of above was the first step. I met with some encouragement. A great interest was taken in the matter by a few members, suggestions were made, and the plan upon which we are now operating was adopted, full details of which I shall be pleased to mail to all interested inquirers.

While the result up to date has not been all that I could and did wish, it is certainly encouraging. While the total number of pledgers to the Fund is less than ninety, and while the total amount pledged is still less than $900 per year, enough has come of the idea to satisfy me that the plan is a good one, and that eventually the results will be sufficient to warrant its perpetuation.

Pledgers will be glad to know that the income derived from this fund has reached Headquarters at a most opportune time, as well as that several lines of activity have been opened up that, but for their contributions, must have remained closed for the present.

To all who have joined me in this work I extend my warmest thanks; and of such I have but one request to make: Resolve now that not a member known to you shall be prevented from joining us by a lack of full knowledge concerning the Fund, its plan and its object. How many of you will join me in a determination to add at least one name to the list during the coming twelve months? Remember that by such an effort the fund will be doubled.

Another source of revenue that has been opened up is the sale of Badges. Every member not already supplied should write Brother Judge or myself and find out about this. All might wear them, particularly when every dollar derived from their sale is covered into the Fund.

General Secretary.

NOTICES.

THE FOLLOWING CARD has been issued by Col. Olcott:—

A MISTAKE CORRECTED.

Mrs. Besant is entitled to an apology for the injustice (unintentionally) done her by the Managing Editor in my absence, by copying into the Theosophist for March (see page 390) a false report that, as a devout Hindu, she had bathed daily in the Ganges at the Kumbha Mela; and for his comments thereupon, as well as his others upon her presumed violation of the "broad eclecticism of the Theosophical Society" in declaring herself a Hindu. In my opinion Mrs. Besant has neither transgressed the bounds of our corporate eclecticism; nor overstepped the private rights of conscience which our constitution guarantees to her and to each of us; nor been guilty of the least impropriety in her utterances. Moreover, she has frequently cited the identity between the esoteric meaning of the Hindu Shāstras and that of each of the other religious systems of the world; and it has been my habit, in introducing her to her audiences, to declare that the T.S. as a body is not responsible for the private views of its President or other officers, or Mrs. Besant, or any other person, whether living or dead. The April Theosophist will contain an article by myself upon the First Besant Tour.

H. S. OLCOTT.

GERMAN F.T.S. WANTED.

A German-speaking, unmarried F.T.S., who is well versed in Theosophy, who can speak publicly ex tempore in German, and who is willing to devote his whole time and exertion to the propaganda of Theosophy in Germany, for a moderate remuneration if necessary, is requested to send his name and address to Dr. HUBBE-SCHLEIDEN, editor of the Sphinx, Steglitz, near Berlin, Germany.

The personal Self lurks last of all the host; greatest foe, most powerful, most obscure.—A Shaman's Book.

THE REAL BASIS OF ASTROLOGY.

IN attempting to arrive at any philosophical explanation of Astrology it will be necessary for us to regard the solar system in several aspects. If, for instance, we were to consider the sun in a purely physical sense, we should find him to be the source of life and heat. He might also be conceived as the parent of the planets that lie within his circle of attraction, inasmuch as they are supposed to have originally sprung from him, according to the commonly-accepted Nebular Hypothesis. But having proceeded thus far, we have come to the end of knowledge regarding the Sun's properties so far as defined by astronomical science. In the same way taking up Saturn, Jupiter, and the other planets, we find that they have no relation with each other except such as is expressed by the general law of attraction. Astronomy is thus seen to be limited in its scope to the physical or the material aspect of the planetary bodies.

ASTROLOGY A HIGHER ASPECT.

But is this all? Is there nothing beyond? May we not by careful study and analysis discover some elements existing in the sun and his satellites which are not recognized by materialistic science, and which may throw some light upon the problems of planetary existence? The ancients thought so, and the oldest science known and taught among men was the science of astrology. Just how far they reasoned out the rules governing the movements and influences of the planets we cannot tell. That part of astrology has never been divulged, being probably retained as something occult and pertaining to advanced initiation. What they did transmit was merely a set of empirical rules and statements which were essentially exoteric. Perhaps it was just as well, as in this Kaliyuga of physical science astrology was bound to be neglected, and sneered at, and denounced in any event, whether its rationale was revealed or kept secret. There has, however, been published one book in recent years wherein are given many hints and suggestions by which any student, if so inclined, might do much towards reconstructing the science of astrology and placing it upon a basis of reason instead, as it is now, of empiricism. I refer, of course, to the Secret Doctrine.

MICROCOSMIC ANALOGY.

In all speculative inquiries, whether in the field of physics or metaphysics, there is no argument which appeals to reason more forcibly than that of analogy. "As above, so below." This phrase expresses the intimate relation and correlation between microcosm and macrocosm. Do we not recognize the fact that law and order permeate the universe? Students of occultism learn as one of their earliest lessons that Man is ever to be regarded as the microcosm and external Nature the macrocosm, or, in other words, that the same general laws or tendencies governing mankind are also exhibited in the natural world. This analogy being once clearly established, it is comparatively easy to understand that the planets and the Sun, like Man, may have a manifold constitution, and may be regarded in many different aspects. The astronomical view is manifestly the lowest, as it comprises only their physical or material attributes.

PLANETS VARIOUSLY DEVELOPED.

Let us take as a starting-point, therefore, the well-known seven principles of Man. These may doubtless be applied to each of the planets. At first sight, this may seem perplexing and difficult to prove, at least in its entirety. Where, it may be asked, is the Atma or the Astral body of Saturn, for instance? This is a question that would be very hard to answer without a key. Fortunately that key is at hand. It is as follows: that while all of the seven principles are inherent in each planet, they may and probably do have different degrees of development. We know that in the stone and the plant and the animal these seven principles exist, though partly latent. In the animal kingdom, for instance, only the four lower principles have as yet found expression, the others remaining in abeyance or undeveloped. So, with the planets, it may be that only a partial development has as yet been attained in some, while others have reached a higher stage. This supposition is doubtless hypothetical, and of course cannot be proven by any appeal to the five senses ; yet analogically it is extremely reasonable and more than probable. If it is so, and if the seven planets possess higher attributes distributed among them in varying degrees, then we can begin to understand, or, at any rate, obtain an inkling of, the real basis of astrology.

ORIGIN OF THE ZODIAC.

Reference has been made to the Sun as the parent of his satellites. This is explained by the Nebular Hypothesis. It has been shown by Madame Blavatsky in the Secret Doctrine (Vol. 1, page 588) that the Nebular Hypothesis is a theory which only partially accounts for the formation of suns and planets generally. In reality, it only throws back the inquiry as to the origin of the Cosmos one step, leaving still unexplained the origin of matter, out of which nebulae were evolved. However, accepting the Hypothesis in its material aspect as probably true, we see how, in accordance with its provisions, the Sun, in turning upon its axis and at the same time moving forward in space, threw off or left behind at different epochs masses of nebulous matter which themselves revolved in the same direction around the Sun and gradually hardened into worlds. As these planets were stripped off from the Sun's equator, they must necessarily have passed off in the same direction into space, and consequently they have ever since moved upon the same plane, although at varying distances from the central nebula.

These planets are all revolving at varying rates of speed around the sun. Hence it follows that we upon the earth, in looking at the different planets, would always see them travelling in the same path across our apparent sky. That path, which extends about 8 degrees on each side of the ecliptic, is called the zodiac.

COMPOSITION OF THE SUN.

If we proceed to view the different planetary bodies in a higher aspect than the merely astronomical, we shall find that they possess certain characteristics or properties which vary with their varying degrees of development. The Sun, for instance, has from time immemorial been known astrologically as the "giver of life." If this be a true denomination, then we must suppose that all life as it exists upon this, and doubtless upon other globes, is derived from the Sun. Life must come from some source, and certainly we cannot trace its origin anywhere on our earth. Yet the life principle is universally diffused, and may be detected in a greater or less degree of development in every atom of matter whether organic or inorganic. This would have been a bold statement to make in public only a very few years ago, but to-day it requires no argument, being generally admitted by the scientific world. Certainly the latest investigations of physicists tend to corroborate the ancient astrological theory of the origin of life. It is now conceded that the photosphere of the Sun is not composed of fire, as was so long supposed, but is a magnetic or electric envelop. Nor is it very difficult to believe that the phenomenon called life is a certain phase or differentiation of the same mysterious force which in its lowest physical manifestation is known as electricity. In an article on the "Source of Heat in the Sun" in the Popular Science Monthly, Mr. Robert Hunt, F.R.S., wrote as follows :

"Arago proposed that this envelop should be called the Photosphere, a name now generally adopted. By the elder Herschel the system of this photosphere was compared to mother-of-pearl. It resembles the ocean on a tranquil summer day, when its surface is slightly crisped by a gentle summer breeze. Mr. Nasmyth has discovered a more remarkable condition than any that had previously been suspected, objects that are peculiarly lens-shaped like willow-leaves, different in size, not arranged in any order, crossing each other in all directions, with an irregular motion among themselves. The size of these objects gives a grand idea of the gigantic scale upon which physical operations are carried out in the Sun. They cannot be less than 1,000 miles in length, and from 200 to 300 miles in breadth. The most probable conjecture which has been offered respecting those leaf or lens-like objects is that the photosphere is an immense ocean of gaseous matter in a state of high incandescence, and that they are perspective projections of the sheets of flame. . . . But regarding Life—Vital Force—as a power far more exalted than either light, heat, or electricity, and, indeed, capable of exerting a controlling power over them all, we are certainly disposed to view with satisfaction that speculation which supposes the photosphere to be the primary seat of vital power, and to regard with a poetic pleasure that hypothesis which refers the solar energies to life."

From the above statement it may be seen how modern science treads upon the heels of ancient wisdom, astrology having always denominated the Sun as "hyleg," the giver of life.

SIGNIFICANCE OF THE OTHER PLANETS.

In the admission of this hypothesis of life as emanating from the Sun, we have at once stepped beyond and outside of the physical and material aspect of the great luminary. If all life proceeds from him, then each individual life must also depend upon the common origin, and we are launched upon the sea of astrology. The direct connection between the Sun, 93,000,000 miles distant, upon the health, and consequently to that extent upon the destiny, of every human being, is established. But the influence of other planets upon the inhabitants of earth is less easy of comprehension. Yet even here the law of analogy may hold to some extent. If the Sun has an acknowledged effect upon all of earth's people, the other planets should also possess some influence, even though in a varying degree. Notwithstanding their varying size, it is well known that the power of their attraction is sufficient to cause a considerable variation in the eccentricity of the earth's orbit, and if they possess such influence on the physical plane, why should they not have as much, or even greater, influence upon the astral or psychic plane? Astrology teaches that such is the case, and assigns to each planet a certain kind and degree of such influence. Thus the planet which we familiarly know as Mercury has in all ages and in all nations and in all languages stood as the representative of wisdom. In Sanskrit he was called Buddha, Lord of Wisdom; in Iranian or Chaldæan, Nebo, knowledge; in Egyptian, Thoth or thought. On account of his proximity to the Sun, he was said to receive seven times as much light and life as the earth. In modern exoteric astrology he governs the constructive, the inventive, the intuitive faculty which finds expression in literary or commercial excellence. Originality, at least such originality as can be said to exist, comes from Mercury, the "messenger of the gods".

In Venus is again exemplified the wonderful symbolism of the East. Hindu astrology from the earliest times considered this planet as having two aspects, in one being known as Sukra, the bright, the shining, and in the other and lower aspect as Usanas, desire. In these names are allegorized the dual and differing influences which Venus exercises upon humanity. In her higher aspect she is the "lesser fortune" of exoteric astrology, shedding a mild and benevolent ray upon the soul of man, inclining him to the gentler affections of family and kindred, and the ties of friendship and social intercourse. She thus lightens up a world otherwise dark, and too often full of sorrow and care. But in her character as Usanas she typifies the lower form of desire, which, carried to excess, leads to so much misery and wrong. This is the true explanation of the influence of Venus. Later astrologers lost the key and confused her significations. Sukra-Usanas became Lucifer-Venus, and the dual name was thought to refer only to her appearance at various seasons in the year as evening and as morning-star. The name Venus was derived directly from Usanas, and Sukra, the shining one, became Lucifer, the bright, the morning-star. And then, last of all, the church took a hand and formulated a theory or, rather, a myth—whichever you choose to call it—still further degrading the noble conception of the early Aryan star-gazers. She decided that, as the loftier aspect of Venus had disappeared from Latin astrology and only the grosser aspect prevailed, Lucifer should be considered as a fallen angel, as a basis for the myth of Satan, in fact; and that idea has descended to the present day among even the orthodox Protestants, who are not generally aware of its Romanist origin.

In the name of Jupiter is found an argument for the Hindu claim to the invention of astrology. The Latin word "Jupiter" is borrowed from Greek mythology, where the father of the gods is called "Zeus pater," but this is manifestly a direct copy from the Sanskrit "Dyaus pitar," father of heaven, an epithet of Indra. The word "Zeus" has no meaning, but "Dyaus" in Sanskrit has a very definite interpretation. The root "div" means "to shine", and hence its application to the sky. Our word "day" is directly evolved from it. In the same way the Aryans, reverencing the sky with all its starry host, came to regard it as "divine", and "dyaus", which originally meant bright and shining, passed into Greek as Zeus, the god of gods. Astrology very appropriately considers Jupiter as governing the religious faculty in Man, and he also indicates judgment and reason. He is the greater benefic, and his influence under favorable directions is always for the highest and most permanent good. The Sun may bring glory, and Mercury may induce fame, but Jupiter confers more lasting and substantial benefits by penetrating the inner nature and stimulating the spiritual growth.

In Saturn we have the antithesis of Jupiter. He is the "greater infortune", and, indeed, to his baleful influence may be traced nearly all of the misfortune with which humanity is afflicted. The name "Saturn" can be traced to Sut or Sut-Typhon, the dragon of Egyptian mythology, the evil spirit, the spirit of darkness, from which Christianity educed the conception of the devil, even borrowing the very name and calling this personage Satan. Yet Saturn did not originate in Egypt. Like almost every other important mythical idea and metaphysical thought, we can trace this one back to India, where Asita, the evil one, means literally that which is black. To this day in exoteric astrology Saturn always represents a dark person. And even such a simple, everyday word as soot, in English, the black particles of smoke deposited in chimneys, comes from the same ancient source. So, too, Saturn's day has always been the seventh day of the week in all nations and all languages. Among the Egyptians Sut-Typhon was so dreaded that his day was set apart for special prayer and worship, a custom which was subsequently taken up by the Hebrews and continued by them up to the present time.

The etymology of Mars is equally interesting. Of course we are familiar with its Greek form, "Ares", which doubtless came from the Egyptian Artes. Yet neither of these names has any inherent significance. It is only when we again refer to the Sanskrit that light appears. Here the name appears as Ava, and it means primarily a corner, an angle, hence anything sharp or cutting. This gives us the key to the influence of Mars. He is not peaceful and pleasant, but quarrelsome and sudden. He presides over battles as the Roman god of war, and in sickness he produces violent and sharp attacks such as fevers and apoplexy. All lingering diseases are due to Saturn. Therefore is Mars termed the "lesser infortune." The good aspects of Mars, however, confer advancement in military life, and sometimes even produce marriage, but in the latter case there is seldom any real affection, marriage being suddenly brought about by an influx of mere passion. It is an aphorism in astrology that people born with Mars in Aries on the ascendant always have a scar upon the face. The reason for this is said to be that when Mars comes exactly to the ascendant he causes an accident, and as Aries rules the head, it will take the form of some cut or bruise which will show through life upon the countenance.

Although the earth is not usually considered in exoteric astrology to have any influence, at least upon the lives of its own inhabitants, it may be interesting to know that our planet, like the others, possesses marked characteristics. How gratifying it would be to us if we could only define those characteristics as being of a lofty and noble order. But alas! such is not the case. From the most ancient times the earth has stood for all that is ignoble and material and base and unspiritual. In order not to offend the susceptibilities of people, dwellers upon this globe—"of the earth earthy"—astrology has kindly cast a veil over our weakness, and hidden under the disguise of an assumed name the symbol which designates our planet and its influence. The term "part of fortune" expresses to a limited degree the nature of that influence. It does, indeed, represent the merely temporal prosperity of the native. It measures, so to speak, the exact size of the pile of dollars or other kinds of money and property which each person is able to accumulate in a lifetime. The existence of the Part of Fortune is disputed by some modern astrologers on the ground that it is purely a figment of the imagination, yet Claudius Ptolemy laid great stress upon it, and as he derived his rules from Egyptian and Chaldæan predecessors, it would seem as though there must be some foundation for it.

HELIOCENTRIC AND GEOCENTRIC ASTROLOGY.

The mere fact of the Part of Fortune, or Earth, being included in all ancient horoscopes is an indication that at one time astrology was based upon the heliocentric system. According to the present geocentric theory which constructs a horoscope about the earth as a centre, it would seem absurd to introduce the same Earth again in the same horoscope as a planet or satellite of itself. Yet if at a remote epoch the heliocentric system was in vogue, the Earth would certainly figure along with Mars, Venus, and the other planets. And if, then, at a subsequent period the science was purposely or ignorantly muddled by being changed into a geocentric scheme, the Earth might very naturally survive as a feature of the horoscope, changed only in name to the Part of Fortune.

The principal objection urged against astrology at the present day is the fact that it implies a geocentric arrangement of the heavens. We all know how Copernicus revolutionized modern astronomy by introducing, or perhaps revamping, the heliocentric theory, and everyone knows what a tremendous step forward was thus taken in our knowledge and understanding of the movement of all bodies in our solar system. And it is therefore quite natural to denounce astrology as false because it still adheres to the geocentric arrangement. Yet the comparison is not entirely perfect. We mortals are dwelling upon this Earth, and according as the other planets revolve and focus upon us their rays, so are we, according to the astrological theory, affected. So, to all intents and purposes, we may truly consider them as circling around the earth as a centre, and in that fashion construct our horoscopes. If we were living upon Mars, it would be equally appropriate to place Mars in the centre, and likewise if we were denizens of the Sun we would put the Sun in the centre, in which case we would have truly and as a matter of fact a system of heliocentric astrology.

I have brought forward this view of the subject to show that astrology should not be condemned solely on account of its geocentric proclivities, and to answer the criticism of R. A. Proctor and other scientific writers. Yet, having made that defense, I am ready to admit that the astrology of the future will probably be heliocentric. The cycles and epicycles of Ptolemy answered their purpose for fifteen hundred years, and afforded a tolerably reasonable account of the motions of the planets. So, too, and perhaps in a yet greater degree, geocentric astrology has fulfilled the necessary conditions of horoscopy. Various attempts, on the other hand, have been made to construct a heliocentric system, but so far without success.

PRECESSION OF THE EQUINOXES.

Another objection frequently brought against astrology is the fact that by means of the precession of the equinoxes the signs of the zodiac have since the time of Ptolemy passed entirely out of the constellations after which they were named. This appears to be a more difficult question to meet than the previous one. Yet Ptolemy was fully aware of this constant change in the position of the signs, for he distinctly provided in the Tetrabiblos for this contingency. He said in Book I, Chap. xii. :

“The beginning of the whole Zodiacal circle (which in its nature as a circle can have no other beginning or end capable of being determined) is, therefore, assumed to be the sign Aries which commences at the vernal equinox.”

It will thus be seen that Ptolemy, and doubtless other astrologers before him, considered the influence of the Zodiacal signs as belonging to the places which they occupied, and not to the stars of which they were composed.

Ashmand says: “He (Ptolemy) has expressly and repeatedly declared that the point of the vernal equinox is ever the beginning of the Zodiac, and that the 30 degrees following it ever retain the same virtue as that which he has in this work attributed to Aries, although the stars forming Aries may have quitted those degrees. The next 30 degrees are to be accounted as Taurus, and so of the rest. There is abundant proof throughout the Tetrabiblos that Ptolemy considered the virtues of the constellations of the Zodiac as distinct from the spaces they occupied.”

DIRECTIONS AND TRANSITS.

Predictions in astrology are based upon three kinds of aspects, which are known respectively as primary and secondary directions and local transits. These follow an obscure and inexplicable law of cycles, and, while apparently distinct, are in reality greatly dependent upon each other; so much so, that if an astrologer consults but one kind, he will obtain very unsatisfactory and uncertain results. Primary directions depend upon the revolution of the earth upon its own axis every twenty-four-hours. In that time each planet apparently travels completely around us, making a circuit of 360 degrees. As in twenty-four hours these pass over the meridian 360 degrees, in one hour they will pass over 15 degrees, and one degree being equal to one-fifteenth of an hour, is therefore equivalent to four minutes. One degree of right ascension is considered equal to one year of time. Hence an error of four minutes in the time of birth will cause an error of one degree of right ascension or of one whole year in the subsequent life of the native. This is why it is so essential to know the exact moment of birth before drawing up a horoscope, or at least before attempting to forecast future events. And the lack of this information has been the cause of so many failures of astrologers in the past to accurately predict important occurrences. Fortunately there are rules by which the exact moment of birth may be ascertained and the truth of primary directions vindicated.

It is comparatively easy to compute secondary directions. They are said to be "merely the aspects formed by the Sun or Moon within a few weeks after birth by their proper motion in longitude in the heavens." But this definition fails to convey any meaning to the ordinary reader. I would add in explanation that, following the same law of cycles as is manifested in primary directions, although in a slightly different aspect, each day succeeding birth is considered as equivalent to a year of subsequent life. Thus the tenth day after birth will show events that will happen in the tenth year, the twentieth day the twentieth year, and so on. Secondary directions indicate affairs of secondary importance, yet whose effects last several weeks or months, while primary directions denote the greater occurrences and epochs of a career, frequently extending over a series of years, during which time a person is said to be uniformly lucky or unlucky as the case may be.

Local transits are extremely simple and are generally employed by professional astrologers. They are based upon the direct motion of the planets around the Sun. While to the observer of the heavens night after night the planets which are visible appear to retain about the same relative position to each other, in reality they are moving onward at varying rates of speed, and each night take a slightly different position. While our earth completes the circuit of the Sun in one year, it takes about thirty years for Saturn to finish his orbit. Each planet has a different rate of speed. Hence the combinations of position that arise daily are practically infinite. The local transits are the transits of one planet over the place of another in any nativity. They produce the minor events of life, the daily cares, annoyances, triumphs, and joys which everyone has, but which do not as a rule occasion any lasting effect. If, however, there is a coincidence of several evil transits at about the same time, particularly if the primary and secondary directions are also bad, then serious results may be expected. It is said that even primary directions cannot take effect without having transits of a similar nature to work through, and on this many professional astrologers ignore primary directions altogether, claiming that the local transits furnish all the data required for making predictions. In reality the reason for such omission is the difficulty of computing such primary directions. Local transits, on the other hand, require no mathematical skill or labor. The positions of the planets from day to day are given in every ephemeris or almanac published.

EMPIRICAL RULES.

It may be inferred from the foregoing hasty sketch of the main features of astrology that there is much in the science, as at present taught and practised, which cannot be understood. We read the rules laid down in the books, but no analysis is able to make clear to us their reason. Taking the aspects, for instance, no one can tell why a square, which implies four, should consist of only three signs of the Zodiac, while trine, implying three, should in reality embrace four signs or houses. Many other perplexing features arise to embarrass the student. It may be admitted without argument that a large part of the science is empirical. We have simply inherited a mass of rules and aphorisms which may be applied blindly, and our only consolation is that when properly used they generally bring about results which tally with the actual facts. We may not know why a certain direction in some person's horoscope will produce decidedly good or malefic effects, but that such effects are produced is proven to us again and again, until even the most skeptical must acknowledge the verification. Perhaps the empiricism is incident to the materialism of the age. It may be that with greater psychic development, or at any rate development of the intuitive intelligence, many of these blind rules will be made plain.

PRESENT ASTROLOGICAL STATUS.

In the meanwhile it is not by any means safe to sneer at this most ancient of all sciences, or even to belittle its importance at the present day. The mistakes of professional astrologers, the vain pretenses of vulgar charlatans, the lack of earnest and thorough study on the part of those who are by nature qualified to succeed in it, are all drawbacks which combine to hide a knowledge of astrology from the world at large, and thus render it essentially occult. Yet no one can investigate its claims in an unprejudiced spirit, or even pursue the study of it to a limited extent, without coming across sufficient evidence to prove that there is really something in it,—that it is not all a mere imaginary scheme. Individual assertion is, of course, of little value in a matter of this kind, else the testimony of the wisest men of all ages would not be so contemptuously disregarded as it is by the self-sufficient, materialistic, scientific writers of to-day. Doubtless there is room for improvement in the art and practice of astrology as it is now set forth, yet the errors and misconceptions of its practitioners are far more than outweighed by the constant verification of its rules and principles. What it wants is not ignorant abuse and denunciation, but serious investigation and study. Perhaps the twentieth century, whose dawn is already heralded by a widening of the range of human thought and a breaking down of the old walls of bigotry, will develop some intuitive soul who will see through the veils of empiricism by which astrology is now obscured, and so lift it up to the plane where it rightfully belongs as one of the keys to the mysteries of life and cosmic evolution.

GEORGE E. WRIGHT.

(The following article by Madame Blavatsky appeared in "Lucifer" for October, 1885, and has teaching value for Theosophists still.)

LODGES OF MAGIC.

"When fiction rises pleasing to the eye,
Men will believe, because they love the lie;
But Truth herself, if clouded with a frown,
Must have some solemn proofs to pass her down."
CHURCHILL.

ONE of the most esteemed of our friends in occult research propounds the question of the formation of "working Lodges" of the Theosophical Society, for the development of adeptship. If the practical impossibility of forcing this process has been shown once in the course of the Theosophical movement, it has scores of times. It is hard to check one's natural impatience to tear aside the veil of the Temple. To gain the divine knowledge, like the prize in a classical tripos, by a system of coaching and cramming, is the ideal of the average beginner in occult study. The refusal of the originators of the Theosophical Society to encourage such false hopes has led to the formation of bogus Brotherhoods of Luxor (and Armley Jail?) as speculations on human credulity. How enticing the bait for gudgeons in the following specimen prospectus, which a few years ago caught some of our most earnest friends and Theosophists.

"Students of the occult science, searchers after truth, and Theosophists who may have been disappointed in their expectations of Sublime Wisdom being freely dispensed by HINDU MAHATMAS, are cordially invited to send in their names to . . . , when, if found suitable, they can be admitted, after a short probationary term, as Members of an Occult Brotherhood, who do not boast of their knowledge or attainments, but teach "freely" (at £1 to £5 per letter?) "and without reserve" (the nastiest portions of P. B. Randolph's "Eulis") "all they find worthy to receive" (read: teachings on a commercial basis; the cash going to the teachers, and the extracts from Randolph and other "love-philter" sellers to the pupils!)"

If rumor be true, some of the English rural districts, especially Yorkshire, are overrun with fraudulent astrologers and fortune-tellers, who pretend to be Theosophists, the better to swindle a higher class of credulous patrons than their legitimate prey, the servant maid and callow youth. If the "lodges of magic", suggested in the following letter to the Editors of this Magazine, were founded without having taken the greatest precautions to admit only the best candidates to membership, we should see these vile exploitations of sacred names and things increase an hundredfold. And in this connection, and before giving place to our friend's letter, the senior Editor of LUCIFER begs to inform her friends that she has never had the remotest connection with the so-called "H(ermetic) B(rotherhood) of L(uxor)", and that all representations to the contrary are false and dishonest. There is a secret body—whose diploma, or Certificate of Membership, is held by Col. Olcott alone among modern men of white blood—to which that name was given by the author of Isis Unveiled for convenience of designation<sup>1</sup>, but which is known among Initiates by quite another one, just as the personage known to the public under the pseudonym of "Koot Hoomi" is called by a totally different name among his acquaintance. What the real name of that Society is, it would puzzle the "Eulian" phallicists of the "H. B. of L." to tell. The real names of Master Adepts and Occult Schools are never, under any circumstances, revealed to the profane; and the names of the personages who have been talked about in connection with modern Theosophy are in the possession only of the two chief founders of the Theosophical Society. And now having said so much by way of preface, led us pass on to our correspondent's letter. He writes:

"A friend of mine, a natural mystic, had intended to form, with others, "a Branch T.S. in his town. Surprised at his delay, I wrote to ask the reason. "His reply was that he had heard that the T.S. only met and talked, and did "nothing practical. I always did think the T.S. ought to have Lodges in which "something practical should be done. Cagliostro understood well this craving "of humans for something before their eyes, when he instituted the Egyptian "Rite and put it in practice in various Freemason lodges. There are many "readers of Lucifer in —shire. Perhaps in it there might be a suggestion "for students to form such lodges for themselves, and to try, by their united "wills, to develop certain powers in one of the number, and then through the "whole of them in succession. I feel sure numbers would enter such lodges, "and create a great interest for Theosophy. "A."

In the above note of our venerable and learned friend is the echo of the voices of ninety-nine hundredths of the members of the Theosophical Society: one hundredth only have the correct idea of the function and scope of our Branches. The glaring mistake generally made is in the conception of Adeptship and the path thereunto. Of all thinkable undertakings that of trying for Adeptship is the most difficult. Instead of being obtainable within a few years or one lifetime, it exacts the unremitting struggles of a series of lives, save in cases so rare as to be hardly worth regarding as exceptions to the general rule. The records certainly show that a number of the most revered Indian Adepts became so despite their births in the lowest, and seemingly most unlikely, <sup>1</sup> In Isis Unveiled vol. ii. p. 308. It may be added that the "Brotherhood of Luxor" mentioned by Kenneth Mackenzie (vide his Royal Masonic Cyclopædia) as having its seat in America, had, after all, nothing to do with the Brotherhood mentioned by and known to us, as was ascertained after the publication of Isis from a letter written by this late Masonic author to a friend in New York. The Brotherhood Mackenzie knew of was simply a Masonic Society on a rather more secret basis, and, as he stated in the letter, he had heard of, but knew nothing of our Brotherhood, which having had a branch at Luxor (Egypt), was thus purposely referred to by us under this name alone. This led some schemers to infer that there was a regular Lodge of Adepts of that name, and to assure some credulous friends and Theosophists that the "H. B. of L." was either identical or a branch of the same, supposed to be near Lahore!—which was the most flagrant untruth.

castes. Yet it is well understood that they had been progressing in the upward direction throughout many previous incarnations, and, when they took birth for the last time, there was left but the merest trifle of spiritual evolution to be accomplished, before they became great living Adepts. Of course no one can say that one or all of the possible members of our friend A's ideal Cagliostroian lodge might not also be ready for Adeptship, but the chance is not good enough to speculate upon: Western civilization seems to develop fighters rather than philosophers, military butchers rather than Buddhas. The plan "A" proposes would be far more likely to end in mediumship than Adeptship. Two to one there would not be a member of the lodge who was chaste from boyhood and altogether untainted by the use of intoxicants. This is to say nothing of the candidates' freedom from the polluting effects of the evil influences of the average social environment. Among the indispensable pre-requisites for psychic development, noted in the mystical Manuals of all Eastern religious systems, are a pure place, pure diet, pure companionship, and a pure mind. Could "A" guarantee these? It is certainly desirable that there should be some school of instruction for members of our Society; and had the purely exoteric work and duties of the founders been less absorbing, probably one such would have been established long ago. Yet not for practical instruction on the plan of Cagliostro, which, by-the-bye, brought direful suffering upon his head, and has left no marked traces behind to encourage a repetition in our days. "When the pupil is ready, the teacher will be found waiting", says an Eastern maxim. The Masters do not have to hunt up recruits in special —shire lodges, nor drill them through mystical non-commissioned officers: time and space are no barriers between them and the aspirant; where thought can pass they can come. Why did an old and learned Kabbalist like "A." forget this fact? And let him also remember that the potential Adept may exist in the Whitechaps and Five Points of Europe and America, as well as in the cleaner and more "cultured" quarters; that some poor ragged wretch, begging a crust, may be "whiter-souled" and more attractive to the Adept than the average bishop in his robe, or a cultured citizen in his costly dress. For the extension of the Theosophical movement, a useful channel for the irrigation of the dry fields of contemporary thought with the water of life, Branches are needed everywhere; not mere groups of passive sympathisers, such as the slumbering army of church-goers, whose eyes are shut while the "devil" sweeps the field; no, not such. Active, wide awake, earnest, unselfish Branches are needed, whose members shall not be constantly unmasking their selfishness by asking "What will it profit us to join the Theosophical Society, and how much will it harm us?", but be putting to themselves the question "Can we not do substantial good to mankind by working in this good cause with all our hearts, our minds, and our strength?" If "A." would only bring his —shire friends, who pretend to occult leanings, to view the question from this side, he would be doing them a real kindness. The Society can get on without them, but they cannot afford to let it do so.

Is it profitable, moreover, to discuss the question of a Lodge receiving even theoretical instruction, until we can be sure that all the members will accept the teachings as coming from the alleged source? Occult truth cannot be absorbed by a mind that is filled with preconception, prejudice, or suspicion. It is something to be perceived by the intuition rather than by the reason; being by nature spiritual, not material. Some are so constituted as to be incapable of acquiring knowledge by the exercise of the spiritual faculty; e.g. the great majority of physicists. Such are slow, if not wholly incapable of grasping the ultimate truths behind the phenomena of existence. There are many such in the Society; and the body of the discontented are recruited from their ranks. Such persons readily persuade themselves that later teachings, received from exactly the same source as earlier ones, are either false or have been tampered with by chelas, or even third parties. Suspicion and inharmony are the natural result, the psychic atmosphere, so to say, is thrown into confusion, and the reaction, even upon the stauncher students, is very harmful. Sometimes vanity blinds what was at first strong intuition, the mind is effectually closed against the admission of new truth, and the aspiring student is thrown back to the point where he began. Having jumped at some particular conclusion of his own without full study of the subject, and before the teaching had been fully expounded, his tendency, when proved wrong, is to listen only to the voice of his self-adulation, and cling to his views, whether right or wrong. The Lord Buddha particularly warned his hearers against forming beliefs upon tradition or authority, and before having thoroughly inquired into the subject.

An instance. We have been asked by a correspondent why he should not "be free to suspect some of the so-called 'precipitated' letters as being forgeries", giving as his reason for it that while some of them bear the stamp of (to him) undeniable genuineness, others seem from their contents and style to be imitations. This is equivalent to saying that he has such an unerring spiritual insight as to be able to detect the false from the true, though he has never met a Master, nor been given any key by which to test his alleged communications. The inevitable consequence of applying his untrained judgment in such cases would be to make him as likely as not to declare false what was genuine, and genuine what was false. Thus what criterion has any one to decide between one "precipitated" letter, or another such letter? Who except their authors, or those whom they employ as their amanuenses (their chelas and disciples), can tell? For it is hardly one out of a hundred "occult" letters that is ever written by the hand of the Master in whose name and on whose behalf they are sent, as the Masters have neither need nor leisure to write them; and that when a Master says, "I wrote that letter", it means only that every word in it was dictated by him and impressed under his direct supervision. Generally they make their chela, whether near or far away, write (or precipitate) them, by impressing upon his mind the ideas they wish expressed, and if necessary aiding him in the picture-printing process of precipitation. It depends entirely upon the chela's state of development how accurately the ideas may be transmitted and the writing-model imitated. Thus the non-adept recipient is left in the dilemma of uncertainty whether, if one letter is false, all may not be; for, as far as intrinsic evidence goes, all come from the same source and all are brought by the same mysterious means. But there is another and a far worse condition implied. For all that the recipient of "occult" letters can possibly know, and on the simple grounds of probability and common honesty, the unseen correspondent who would tolerate one single fraudulent line in his name would wink at an unlimited repetition of the deception. And this leads directly to the following. All the so-called occult letters being supported by identical proofs, they have all to stand or fall together. If one is to be doubted, then all have, and the series of letters in the Occult World, Esoteric Buddhism, etc., etc., may be, and there is no reason why they should not be in such a case—frauds, "clever impostures", and "forgeries", such as the ingenuous though stupid agent of the "S.P.R." has made them out to be, in order to raise in the public estimation the "scientific" acumen and standard of his "Principals".

Hence, not a step in advance would be made by a group of students given over to such an unimpressible state of mind, and without any guide from the occult side to open their eyes to the esoteric pitfalls. And where are such guides, so far, in our Society? "They be blind leaders of the blind", both falling into the ditch of vanity and self-sufficiency. The whole difficulty springs from the common tendency to draw conclusions from insufficient premises, and play the oracle before ridding oneself of that most stupefying of all psychic anæsthetics—IGNORANCE.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

JAMES MORGAN PRYSE is our head printer, and he with his brother John must remain immortal among our annals. He came with his brother to New York in July, 1888, and enabled the editor of the PATH to start the Aryan Press for the printing of much needed Theosophical literature.

Brother Pryse was born in New London, a suburb of Cincinnati, Ohio, August 14th, 1859, and is of Welsh descent. His father was a Presbyterian minister in Cincinnati, where James spent his childhood. Both father and mother were born in Wales. It may be noted that Pryse is also the name of the recent Grand Druid of Wales. Being a minister's son James went from place to place in America, taking a high-school course and preparing in Latin, Greek, and the like for a college in Crawfordsville, Ind. Ill health, overstudy, and trying to do three years' work in a little over one spoiled these plans, and Bro. Pryse began to read law. At 17 he was ready for the bar, but not caring to spend four years as a clerk he went to Red Cloud, Neb., to the frontier. There for a while he ran a photograph gallery, but sold it out and entered a printing office, learned that business, edited a country paper, and with his brother John published other papers in various towns. They started an office at Anaconda, Mont., sold that out and began a paper at Prescott, Mich., and St. Paul. From there he went to Florida, and then up to Minnesota, where in January, 1886, he gave up printing and was admitted to the bar in the Circuit Court for the Eighth District of the State.

Intending to practise law he went to Lacrosse, Wis., but took a position as telegraph editor on the Republican Leader instead. Becoming what the Americans call "disgruntled" with all things, he joined a socialistic colony going to Sinaloa, Mex. A year was spent at Hammonton, N. J., doing the printing for the colony and helping to organize. While there he got into correspondence with Mrs. VerPlanck, who is now Mrs. A. Keightley, and resolved to work for the T.S. instead of for socialism. Bro. Pryse had never taken to any religion nor joined a church, and was too familiar with psychic phenomena to be in sympathy with naturalism, yet took no interest in mere spiritualism, its phenomena being of no use and the utterances of its spirits being nonsense. He had been studying Fourier while holding to pantheism and reincarnation, and the instant he met Theosophy recognized it as that for which he sought. Then began a study of Isis, of the PATH, of all that could be found on Theosophy, as well as an invaluable correspondence with Mrs. VerPlanck. In July, 1887, he joined the T.S. at Los Angeles, and met there again his brother, by that time also full of Theosophy. From there both went to Peru and back to Panama, and from there to New York.

In August, 1889, Bro. Pryse went to London to start the printing office there named the H.P.B. Press, wherein the machinery is American. There he is still at work night and day. He has wandered over most of the States of the U.S., keeping himself foot-free for a possible work in the future. He and his brother cannot be erased, and while our books are read, though no printer's name is on them, yet the soul and the work of James M. Pryse are in them. That he is a printer of the highest ability no one can deny, that he is a man who has unselfishly worked for the T. S. is a fact that is recorded in the unimpeachable books of Karma. We show his counterfeit presentment.

MOON'S MYSTERY AND FATE.

PROBABLY no heavenly body has received as much attention from men in all ages as our moon. Many causes contributed to this. The moon is near us; she is a remarkable and large object in the sky; she enlightens the night; she appears to have much to do with man and his affairs. Omens, spells, wishes, oracles, divination, traditions cluster around her during all time. It would be difficult to find a scripture that does not exalt the moon. The Christian Bible says that God ordained that the sun should rule the day and the moon the night. The Roman Church depicts Mary the Mother of God holding the child while she stands upon the crescent moon. The twelfth chapter of Revelations opens thus:

And there appeared a great wonder in heaven; a woman clothed with the sun, and the moon under her feet, and upon her head a crown of twelve stars.

Other religions are the same as this modern Hebraic one in giving the moon a very great prominence.

Even science cannot escape the fascination. The brilliancy and nearness of the moon and her many recurring changes all aid in fixing the attention of science. Modern and ancient science alike unite in watching the night's great light as she performs her journey round us. Nations regulate themselves and their acts, religious and commercial, by the moon. Feast days of the church are fixed more by the lunar than the solar calendar, for all the movable feasts depend on the moon. Calendars rule commercial affairs in credits, obligations, and settlements.

From earliest times the calendar, ruled in fact by the moon's motion, has been of immense interest to man. Periodically rulers of the earth try to reform the calendar of days and months when it as periodically gets out of order. The present arrangement of months with twenty-eight, twenty-nine, thirty, and thirty-one days was invented to make a calendar which would last some centuries before another one will be needed, just because the moon's motion will not give twelve regular months, but twelve regular ones and one small one of about six days. And when the present style of reckoning was introduced, many communities of men in Europe rebelled because they thought they had been deprived of some actual days of life.

Cæsar ordered a reformation of the calendar by attempting to use the sun, but in time it fell into great confusion. Pope Gregory XIII. directed ten days to be suppressed, and then found that the Julian calendar had an error which would amount to three days in four hundred years—quite a serious matter. The Gregorian year now prevails, except in Russia. But still the greater number of men and the greater number of festivals depend on the moon and her motion. While if we examine the records relating to superstition, we will find that whatever may have been the place once held by the sun, it has been usurped by the moon, leaving one nation distinctly worshippers of the Lord of Day.

Modern Theosophy, coming on the field as the uniter of all religions by explaining the symbols and traditions of each, is not exempt from the mystery of the moon. H. P. Blavatsky is our sole originator of a theory regarding the satellite which one could not have invented with the most wonderful imagination. She says her teachers told her, and leaves us to work out the details; but her theory will bear investigation if taken as part of the whole evolutionary scheme reported by her. If we had thought to escape from lunar dreams and puzzles we were in error, for while she plainly asserts that the former body of the entity now called Man's Earth is the very moon in our sky, the existence of a mystery is as plainly declared. The first mystery which she claimed to reveal—and, indeed, she first of every one states it—is that in a remote period, when there was no earth, the moon existed as an inhabited globe, died, and at once threw out into space all her energies, leaving nothing but the physical vehicle. Those energies revolved and condensed the matter in space near by and produced our earth; the moon, its parent, proceeding towards disintegration, but compelled to revolve around her child, this earth. This gives us a use and history for the moon.

But then the same messenger says that the “superstition” prevailing so long and widely as to the moon’s bad influence, as in insanity, in necromancy, and the like, is due to the fact that the moon, being a corpse intimately associated with earth, throws upon the latter, so very near to her, a stream of noxious emanations which, when availed of by wicked and knowing persons, may be used for man’s injury. Then the same writer goes on to assert that six mysterious doctrines or facts remain yet untold, and all relating to the moon.

It would be idle to speculate on these mysteries, for it has ever been found that unless the Great Initiates speak the general run of men can but modify, enlarge, or intertwine by their fancy those facts and doctrines of which they have heard. But as to the fate of the moon, H.P.B., speaking for those Initiates, says plainly what is to become of our satellite.

In the first volume of Secret Doctrine, in a foot note on page 155 of the first edition, she writes:

Both [Mercury and Venus] are far older than the earth, and before the latter reaches her seventh Round her mother moon will have dissolved into thin air, as the “moons” of the other planets have, or have not, as the case may be, since there are planets which have several moons—a mystery again which no Œdipus of astronomy has solved.

This is extremely plain as to our moon, yet raises another mystery as to the general subject of moons. If correspondence is a law of nature, as I firmly believe, then it would be in accordance with it for the moon, considered as earth’s former body, to dissolve all away in course of time. And as evolution proceeds with uniformity, the upward progress of our races and earth should be marked by the gradual fading and final disappearance of the moon, as H.P.B. says. It is likely that before our sixth round is ended, it being the round relating to Buddhi as the vehicle of spirit, the body of the moon, which was the vehicle for prana and astral body, will have disappeared. Very probably one of the unrevealed mysteries has to do with the uses and purposes of and for the whole mass of matter now constituting the moon's bulk. But whatever those mysteries are, the fate of our satellite is very clearly asserted, for the benefit of those who have confidence in H. P. B.'s teachers, and who are willing to take the key of correspondence for the unlocking of the lock of Nature.

A STUDENT'S NOTES AND GUESSES.

THE serpent symbol is a strange one. A cold, selfish creature, voiceless and limbless; capable only of spasmodic activity as it seeks to escape, to sting, or to gulp its living prey; its life is spent in sullenness and torpor; its sole ambition is to lie "untrodden in the sun".

With a minimum of brain capacity it exhibits correspondingly little intelligence, far less than that shown by many insects.

Yet the serpent has been chosen, among all races, as the symbol of intellectual power of every grade, from a subtle cunning to the wisdom of the gods. In the Jewish mythology, it is represented as tempting the first woman with a promise of divine wisdom and power: Hermes carries the caduceus as a token that he is a messenger between gods and men; the serpent accompanying Æsculapius signifies the healing power; Jesus exhorts his disciples to be "wise as serpents".

Mundane serpents have signified an all-sustaining and encompassing will and intelligence, both in India and the extreme north; and the serpent has been the symbol of the adept, from the far East to ancient Peru and Mexico. . . . .

Perhaps when St. Patrick drove the snakes from Ireland, he was the cause of its soil having ever since produced more wit than wisdom. . . . .

Look into the eyes of any living creature and you touch its soul. The dog seeks from yours something which he dimly feels and would fain comprehend. There is a look in his brown eyes as he fixes them upon yours, which is not there at any other time, which he fixes upon no creature except man, and which no animal but the dog is able to give.

As we look into the limpid fluorescent depths of a horse's eye, our sympathies go out to the fellow-being which looks out through that window. Even when it sparkles with spirit, it is still tempered with timidity. We feel its pathetic patience, which is above that of the dull ox, an intelligence which is moral rather than intellectual, and we receive the impress of an instinctive nobility and unselfishness.

The patient drudge is quick to respond to our wants rather than to his own; a harsh word sets his pulses bounding; a kindly look awakens instant recognition.

Contrast this with the attentive, well-regulated selfishness which gleams from the yellow eyes of the cat, as she looks debating the chances of a morsel or the possible hospitalities of a comfortable lap. Watch the change from the receptive to the active, as she hears a mouse-like rustle, and the glare of the beast of prey shines out.

Or, as she steps softly along, you are aware that she has in mind either a warm corner by the fire, an amatory interview on a back fence, or a raid on the canary bird or an unguarded pantry. Self, and self only, is the center around which revolve the thoughts of this courtesan of the animal world.

That domestic Arab, the rat, has had his little brain quickened, for untold generations, by contact with civilization, by its warfare against him, by the dangers and rewards of his predatory and pariah life. You can read the whole story in the mingled impudence, fear, and cunning of his beady eyes as he faces you for a moment with his whiskers a-quiver, knowing as he does his exact distance from the nearest retreat.

Compare the eye of a rat with that of his third cousin, the squirrel. In that softer little orb you read not only the alertness of his tribe, but a milder curiosity and timidity. You are to him rather a strange and possibly dangerous visitor, than a giant hereditary enemy.

Greed and a limited shrewdness gleam from the small eyes of a pig, and when we see the like in a human being—we know what to expect.

What creature has the chilling, stony stare of the serpent? What can you read in those fixed eyeballs which suggests an emotion or a thought with which any human being ever had an instant of sympathy? Their effect is different from that which can be produced by any fixed glassy ball. You feel the consciousness of the creature as it meets some sphere of your own, but it is an icy and utterly selfish consciousness; you recoil from the psychic touch of the snake as you do from that of his body.

A writer in a recent number of the Fortnightly Review, in speaking of the serpent, says :

“The power of continuing motionless, with the lifted head projecting forward, for an indefinite time is one of the most wonderful of the serpent’s muscular feats, and it is of the highest importance to the animal both when fascinating its victim and when mimicking some inanimate object, as, for instance, the stem and bud of an aquatic plant; here it is only referred to on account of the effect it has on the human mind, as enhancing the serpent’s strangeness. In this attitude, with the round, unwinking eyes fixed on the beholder’s face, the effect may be very curious and uncanny.”

He goes on to quote the experience of an African traveller who discovered a snake at the bottom of a pool of water :

“Presently, without apparent motion, so softly and silently was it done, the snake reared its head above the surface and held it there erect and still, with gleaming eyes fixed on me in question of what I was. It flashed upon me then that it would be a good opportunity to test the power of the human eye upon the snake, and I set myself the task of looking it down. It was a foolish effort. The bronze head and sinewy neck, about which the water flowed without a ripple, were as if carved in stone; and the cruel unwinking eyes, with the light coming and going in them, appeared to glow the brighter the longer I looked. Gradually there came over me a sensation of sickening fear, which, if I had yielded to it, would have left me powerless to move; but with a cry I leaped up, and, seizing a fallen willow branch, attacked the reptile with a species of fury.” . . . .

The fixity of the serpent’s eye is not the cause of the peculiar impression which it makes. The eyes of fishes, though not as a rule immovable, are moved but seldom and slightly. They have not that filmy blankness we see in the dead fish, from which the idea of the “fishy eye” has been derived. Study them in an aquarium (if you can do no better), and you find nothing unpleasant in the eyes of a fish; no matter how fixed they may be. They suggest rather a restful consciousness of existence, which hardly feels its own separateness; they recall in no way the stony selfishness of the snake.

If we are fishermen, we grasp the slimy scales of a prize with eagerness, while we would shrink from the less defiling touch of the most harmless snake.

Fixity, then, is not the cause of the repellent fascination that lurks in a serpent’s eye.

Is it in the shape of his head?

Many lizards have heads closely resembling those of snakes, both in color and shape, in fact often more calculated to inspire aversion, if critically examined. Their bodies are cold and scaly and tapering. The eyes of lizards vary in color and shape, as do those of serpents, but the expression is wholly different. Take, for instance, one of the little lizards that scuttle through the dry fallen leaves of our southern forests, or, squirrel-like, scamper up a tree and shift to the opposite side as we approach, or flatten themselves against the bark, with which they seem to blend. Fix the eye of one of these reptilian sprites, if you can, and you will find nothing repulsive in it. It is bright and inquisitive, what the women would call "cute", and you feel like feeding the little fellow with a fly, if you can convince him of your friendly intentions.

The toad is repulsive enough, even when impartially considered. Industry is not his forte, and there is a fixity in his freckled countenance as he waits patiently for what Providence may send in the shape of a fat bug, but no evil light shines from the little circular, golden-iris windows. They will but wink and roll if an occasional doubt crosses him as to the expediency of retaining on his stomach that strange-looking insect which just now he confidently swallowed, as it was rolled toward him by some one (let us say a school boy).

. . . . The Egyptians derived their symbols from a period when men were in closer touch with the soul of the world than in these days of machinery. The manifold life which has built together the forms of dust looks out through many portals. In the ancient picture-teachings we find the human form surmounted by the head of the hawk or the jackal, the ibis, the cat, or the crocodile. The bull and the beetle were sacred symbols, degraded in a later age.

In all of these we may read of an all-pervading power and intelligence, manifesting through a potential humanity, through different aspects of evolving soul. Strength and swiftness, keenness and tenacity, intelligences working in earth, air, and water, were all recognized as parts of the whole, as co-ordinate psychic factors. Not one was despised as unworthy or contemptible.

The Miss Nancyism of the modern sectarian affects innocence and ignorance, and will have none of these things . . . except the lamb and the dove.

Yet in that elder and broader symbology we find the serpent erect, as the symbol of kingly power and occult wisdom.

Yet the serpent that crawls in the dust or glides through the tangled swamp is a thing apart and accursed; it raises itself but to threaten, or to sting, or to paralyze with the steely steadfastness of its will. It is shunned by all that lives, by all that flies or runs; hated in forest and field. The only sound it can make is a hiss, and that sound is the only one common to the language of bird and beast and man. All who can use it mean but one thing when it is sent forth; malice, defiance, separateness.

And is this reptile, with its cruel eye, its crushing fold or poison tooth; which rejects even the freshly slain as its food; which must have a living, struggling victim; is this creature, because of its sinuous path or some fancied grace, to be taken as the type of anything to which we should aspire?

Instinct and common sense say No.

But, with one accord, the solemn picture-teachings of the ages, of Jew and Gentile, of India, Egypt, and America, point to some hidden mystery, to some occult combination of power and intelligence, of which, it may be, the serpent of the dust is but the degraded rudiment.

Who can read the riddle of the serpent?

AN IMPORTANT DECISION.

"MAHATMA LETTERS."

THE following correspondence, which explains itself, is presented for the information of members. It was submitted to the 8th Convention of this Section and approved of after one reading and consideration in committee and convention. It was also forwarded to the European and Indian General Secretaries, who have decided similarly in another case:

144 MADISON AVENUE,

NEW YORK, March 12, 1894.

To William Q. Judge, Esq., Gen'l Sec'y, Am. Sec. T.S., New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I desire to submit the following statement of facts for your consideration and opinion as a member of the Council of T.S.

A member, in good standing, of the T.S. has, at various times and until quite recently, sent me letters and messages which purport to emanate from one of the Masters spoken of by H. P. Blavatsky and supposed to be interested in the welfare of the said Society. In these letters and messages there is no attempt to imitate the supposed handwriting of the Master nor to convey any idea of so-called precipitation, but one letter is signed with the name, in full, of the Master whose message it purports to be, and others, whether signed or not, contain internal evidence that they are accepted as emanating from the same high source.

It has been suggested to me that a committee should be appointed to inquire into this matter on charges to be made that the sending of messages purporting to come from a Master, or Masters, is untheosophical, or that the proper officers of the T.S. should consider the matter to the same end.

I have replied that I consider this a matter into which a committee of the T.S. may not properly inquire; that I do not, for a moment, entertain the idea that it may be brought within the jurisdiction of the Society under any clause of its Constitution; that it can rightly be regarded as a matter between individuals only; that any such inquiry or determination of such a subject would only tend to raise a dogma in the Society, and, furthermore, that it seems desirable that some official statement of a general character should be made defining the Society's position on questions of this nature.

Sincerely Yours,

ELLIOTT B. PAGE,

A Fellow of the Theosophical Society.

No. 599.

THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, AMERICAN SECTION,
GENERAL SECRETARY'S OFFICE, 144 MADISON AVENUE,
NEW YORK, March 14, 1894.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I have your letter of 12th inst. informing me that a member of the T.S. (whose name you have privately given me) has sent you at various times "letters and messages which purport to emanate from one of the Masters spoken of by H. P. Blavatsky and supposed to be interested in the welfare of the said Society, and that one of the letters is signed with the name in full of the Master whose message it purports to be, but that in the letters there is no attempt to imitate the supposed handwriting of the Masters, etc." and asking me officially whether a committee could be properly appointed to consider the matter on the ground that such actions by said member are untheosophical. This could only be considered by the Society acting through a committee on the ground of being an offence under the Constitution of the T.S.; it is also a matter which should first be submitted to the Council and the President; it is competent in my opinion for you to raise the question as one of information, asking for a decision or opinion from the proper officers or Council. I shall therefore give you my opinion officially and then forward the same to the President and the Council. My opinion is:

First: The matter stated is not one which the Society or its officers can consider; it stands on the same ground as the affirmation of a member that he or she has seen or heard of or from a Mahâtmâ. On this see the public utterances of the President, Colonel Olcott; also those of Mrs. Besant; and the late publication by Mr. Sinnett, President of the London Lodge, to the effect that what he (Mr. Sinnett) published was directly from said Mahâtmâs. These are not offences in the T.S. for the reason that cognizable offences are these: Slander of members; violation of the T.S. neutrality on questions of legislation, politics, religion, caste, and social rules; violation of the rule that we have no dogma by proclaiming a dogma or belief as that of the T.S.; wilfully hurting the religious feelings of members at a meeting of Branch or Section; conviction of crime under the law of the land, and the like. In no place are the Mahâtmâs, their powers, existence, or functions mentioned. It is solely and simply a personal matter whether one shall or shall not affirm he has messages from the Mahâtmâs; it is also a personal matter whether other members shall or shall not believe him.

Second: It would be a violation of the Constitution to decide either negatively or affirmatively under the official shield of a T.S. Committee whether a person had or had not a message from the Mahâtmâs, and to consider the facts cited by you would involve preliminarily that affirmative or negative. The Society would thus through its Committee fix a dogma one way or the other; either the dogma that Mahâtmâs exist and may be heard from, or the opposite dogmatic statement that such Mahâtmâs do not exist.

On this I beg to refer you to the official statement by the President in his Executive Notice of May 27, 1893, respecting the T.S. Congress at the Parliament of Religions. He said: "Of course it is to be distinctly understood that nothing shall be said or done by any delegate or committee of the Society to identify it, as a body, with any special form of religion, creed, sect, or any religious or ethical teacher or leader; our duty being to affirm and defend its perfect corporate neutrality in these matters".

This goes directly to the point, and was meant, as intimated to me by the President, to cover precisely the existence of the Mahâtmas under the word "teacher" and to prevent any fixing of the T.S. to H. P. Blavatsky by means of the use of the word "leader". Hence we have in advance the decision in general of the President, in which the other members of the Council will concur, as I now do in advance.

Fraternally Yours,
 WILLIAM Q. JUDGE,
General Secretary American Section and Member of the T.S. Council.

CORRESPONDENCE.

EDITOR OF PATH: A Mrs. * * * near my California home has a little granddaughter, five years of age, who has never walked. She is physically weak or delicate, but intellectually very precocious. When but three years of age an educated gentleman happening to call heard her reading and asked the grandmother if it was not a great task to teach one so young to read like that. She answered that she thought that she must have taught herself from the letters on the cans she played with, but the child replied "No, grandma, I knew how to read before coming to this house to live", meaning before she was born.

Her grandfather spoke broken English, he being a German. After listening to him one day she said, "Grandpa, if you had attended school where I did, you would not have been allowed to talk so improperly as that". They asked her where that was, and she said it was when she lived in another house. "And, grandpa, you were not born then, I think". They did not then know anything about reincarnation, and I explained it to them and gave them leaflets to read. They now accept it. Little children can teach.

Yours truly,
 A MOTHER..

LITERARY NOTES.

APRIL THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XXV" is of extraordinary interest. It minutely describes the appearance to Col. Olcott at New York in astral body of the Master, with accompanying incidents, notably that of the turban,—an appearance, we may add, seen also and testified to by a lady not a Theosophist. The Col. narrates two cases in which he himself had projected his double, one of them illustrating "repercussion", and cites five instances of seeing clearly the doubles of others, three of them Adepts. Sepharial gives the horoscope of Mr. Gladstone, and shows how his postal cards are directly due to Jupiter. "Annie Besant's Indian Tour" is a glowing record of the almost royal progress of that truly royal woman, and in the splendid diction of Col. Olcott tells what she is and did. He truly speaks of "this five months' intellectual feast, this banquet of rhetoric and wisdom", and eloquently describes her lofty religiousness, her profound devotion. It is a tribute from one of the most charming of writers to one of the most glorious of characters.—[A. F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VII, No. 3, gives "Neo-Platonism" by E. W. Ward, and "Reincarnation" by R. Machell. The former prefaces an analysis of the doctrine with a sketch of its ablest exponents, and the style is peculiarly pleasing, with neat touches and a musical flow. The text is far more lucid than the quotations. Why shouldn't composition be better after fifteen centuries of practice? "Reincarnation" has many pregnant thoughts and suggestions, advocates independent efforts to grasp truth, and most truly says that "we only know a thing when we can express it in our own language and in different ways". The metaphors on the last page are a little mixed, but the idea is clear. If Siftings continues through the year as it has begun, those who have saved their $1.25 will be a good deal poorer than richer.—[A.F.]

THE NORTHERN THEOSOPHIST for May has its "Editor's Remarks" as fresh and sprightly and sound as heretofore, their combination of geniality and sense giving delightful flavor. The subscription is only one shilling and six pence per year. It would be nice if the editor would contribute some of his thought to the American Forum.—[A.F.]

THE PACIFIC THEOSOPHIST for May prints a most interesting address by the Countess Wachmeister before April Convention upon "The Theosophical Society". The method of H. P. B.'s entrance into Tibet is described, and an outline of her tuition there and in Egypt. The remarks upon the power of thought are especially strong and good.—[A.F.]

LIGHT OF THE EAST has an undoubted right to oppose Theosophy and the T. S. if its convictions are adverse, but surely no cause can be advanced by the publication of so indescribably vulgar an article as that in the April issue called "History of the T.S." It is taken from The Buddhist Ray. If the question was merely of slang, or even deliberate misrepresentation, one might let it pass as lack of refinement or truth; but coarseness so gross, so redolent of the stable, so disclosive of the character and habitat of the being who could use it, can only have been quoted, it is fair to suppose, because of partial unfamiliarity with English. Indian gentlemen, no less than American, must instinctively revolt from vulgarity of speech, and from editors' sanctums as well as from private parlors must banish what belongs only in the sty.—[A.F.]

THE NEW CALIFORNIAN for April and May frankly avows its "pressing need" of financial support, but takes the right way to secure it by at last printing a readable article. "Scientific versus Christian Ethics", by Adeline E. Knapp, is singularly bright and penetrating. With great good humor and almost entire fairness it handles conventional beliefs, jauntily stripping off sham and amusedly exposing contradiction, always clever, incisive, strong. Is it true that there are more Mahometans than Buddhists in the world? Further articles by Miss Knapp will do more to gain "support" than even the despairing offer on the inside cover.—[A.F.]

LAY RELIGION, by Richard Harte. It might have antecedently seemed somewhat improbable that Mr. Harte, even allowing for his natural versatility, would enter the field of religious discussion, and indeed, strictly speaking, he has not done so now. For there is never in these 178 pages the trace of a perception that religion is the most profound of human experiences, the conscious relation of the soul to God, the reality of all realities and the motor to duty: he has no other thought of it than as an affair of intellectual beliefs and opinions, and these usually expounded by a selfish caste for its own purposes. The influence of religion he defines (page 104) as "the power of the priests"; "true religion" (page 117) as "the correct interpretation of the Cosmos". Having therefore no apprehension whatever of religion as anything more than doctrine, it would be impossible for him to treat it as a spiritual force.

Yet the consequence by no means follows that his work is either shallow or valueless. It is, on the contrary, shrewd, acute, logical, clever, vigorous, and well-informed, besides being always entertaining and sometimes witty. The attitude is that of a philosopher indifferent to the distinctions between creeds, but with some hostility to the groundwork of all and a touch of cynicism as to human nature, desirous fairly to depict every side of fact which his own limitations do not exclude from vision, and careful to state the qualifications or restrictions due to any theory. Hence not a little of truth and interest must necessarily come from so able a man and writer. To Theosophists his first chapter is the most interesting, and however acrid his tone towards the T. S. wherein he still claims membership, to H. P. B., the Esoteric Section, the Mahatmas, and Theosophic convictions generally, it is no doubt a fact that the aim and actual operations of the Society have greatly changed since its foundation. This may not prove conclusively, as Mr. Harte thinks, the absence of intervention by Mahatmas in the Society's affairs: it might even prove the opposite, if the aim was raised and the operations made more successful: but it certainly shows that the Society has, in Mr. Harte's words, "strayed away from its original path and purpose". Lay Religion is to be followed by The Old Theology, and doubtless that will be just as clever, just as thoughtful, and just as religionless. (Orderable through PATH, cloth $1.00.)—[A.F.]

THE BOOK OF THE PATH OF VIRTUE is a version of the Chinese Philosopher Lao-tze's Tao-Teh-King, to which Mr. Walter R. Old has, in his ever-pleasing style, prefixed an Introduction and added a paper on "The Tao". The text is largely in the form of proverbs, a few somewhat sagacious without being strikingly profound, but most of them superficial and commonplace, and one rather wonders how wisdom of such mild quality could form the basis of a national school of philosophy. "Doors and windows", says Lao-tze, "are useful to a house by being cut out". "A virtuous man is identified with Virtue". "What is brittle is easily broken". "Virtue is good". These truths would seem to be incontestable, and the book contains others quite as much beyond the reach of successful impugment.—[A.F.]

THE DIVINE PYMANDER, edited by W. Wynn Westcott, has an interesting preface by the editor, pointing out that by Hermes Trismegistos the three departments of arcane wisdom—Theosophy, Alchemy, and Magic—are combined, and that, despite corruptions, these seventeen chapters do enshrine the very old Egyptian ideals and are almost the only existing remains thereof. H. P. B. speaks of him as "the oldest and most spiritual of the Logoi of the Western continent", and Kenealy thinks his date to be 1800 B.C. The archaic style makes the work curious, but its break-up into brief and disconnected sentences makes it wearisome. All these ancient fragments of Sacred Learning have a place in history, yet they probably are not of great service to the practical student of to-day, who must have clearness, consecution, a modern treatment of thought, a contemporaneous sense to words. The reverent spirit and the deep cognizance of supersensuous realities do, however, always edify. (The PATH, cloth, $1.00.)—[A.F.]

THE SOURCE OF MEASURES, J. Ralston Skinner. This remarkable book, so learned, painstaking, and profound, was published nineteen years ago, but the edition has for some time been exhausted and much disappointment caused. Robert Clarke & Co. of Cincinnati have just issued a new edition, adding to it a Supplement of sixty-three pages which Mr. Skinner in 1876 printed for private circulation. The central idea is that the Egyptians, Hebrews, Romans, and probably the Hindus, used for linear measures a unit which has come down from antiquity unchanged, the British inch, and that this arose from the relation of the diameter of a circle to its circumference. This relation and cognate facts are elaborately treated; history, ethnology, symbolism, philology, mythology being brought to bear on the theory, and special attention being given to the construction of the Great Pyramid, the significance of the Kab-bala, and the need of an esoteric interpretation to the Bible. Mr. Skinner considers that the keys to this interpretation were at one time possessed by the Roman Catholic Church, the Free Masons, and probably the Greek Church and the Brahmins. Most curious facts in rites, measurements, proportions, numerical meanings, etc., pervade the whole work, which will doubtless always remain not merely an erudite contribution to an interesting topic, but a help to those deeper truths in religion which science is now beginning to surmise. ## Mirror of the Movement.

"H. P. B." T. S. had May Sunday evening lectures: Spirit and Soul, Donald Nicholson; The Truth about Ghosts, James H. Connelly; Nature and Nature's Laws, Jos. H. Fussell; "The Power of an Endless Life", Alex. Fullerton.

ST. JOHN T.S., Brooklyn, N.Y., was chartered on April 27th with eight charter-members, and is the eighty-seventh Branch upon the roll. It starts with a Headquarters and a resident official, and has already planned out important works. The President is Mr. Henry C. Parke, and the Secretary Mr. Arthur D. Stetson, 365 Bedford Ave.

ARYAN T.S. lectures on Sunday evenings in May were: Does Science teach Reincarnation, E. B. Guild; The Old and the New, A. W. Wadham; The Human Soul, Dr. Edward G. Day; Present-Day Theosophy, H. T. Patterson.

GILROY T.S., Gilroy, Calif., was chartered on May 24, with eight charter-members. It is one of the fruits of the Pacific Coast Lecturer's work. It ranks eighty-eighth on the American roll. The President is Mrs. Mary A. Van Schaick, and the Secretary Mrs. Lola E. Forsyth.

MR. BURCHAM HARDING arrived at Boston Headquarters April 26th, and lectured that evening on "Seven Principles". Sunday, 29th, in the hall of the Boston Society he began a reply to statements about Theosophy made in his Bible class by Rev. Minot J. Savage, the prominent Unitarian minister. Upon that evening Mr. Harding confined himself to rebutting the accusation of dogmatism, and showing the reasonableness of the "septenary constitution"; on the following Sunday "Reincarnation" and "The Masters" were treated upon. Crowded audiences listened to these addresses, and full reports appeared in the Boston papers. At the League meeting on May 3rd, the names of twenty cities adjacent to Boston were presented. Members were called upon to assist in working up meetings, engaging halls, and making preparations for lectures. Many responses were made, and it looks as if Mr. Harding is likely to have his hands full for some time to come around Boston. Lowell was worked by Mr. H. A. Richardson, and lectures given by Mr. Harding on 16th, 17th, and 18th May. The hall was well filled each evening. The newspapers gave very full notices, with result that a considerable number have given their names to join the study class to meet there weekly. Charlestown, Lexington, Newburyport, Worcester, and Sharon have already fixed dates for meetings. Lectures have also been given at the branches at Cambridge, Malden, and Somerville. The Secret Doctrine class in Boston, as well as the weekly classes at Malden and Somerville, have by his advice taken up the subjects of the correspondence class for study, and the members joined that class.

On White Lotus Day the members of the Boston, Malden, Cambridge, and Somerville branches met at the Boston Hall for the memorial services. The address was given by Mr. Harding, an excellent and long report appearing in the local papers.

Very interesting accounts of White Lotus Day celebrations, condensed for PATH, have been unfortunately lost, together with other items, by a casualty in the printing-office.

INDIA.

A PROSPECTUS has been issued in and circulated through India announcing the formation of the "Brahma Vidya Prakatana Sabha", a Society to "revive Hinduism and raise the standard of Spirituality". Its methods are avowedly modelled upon those of the foreign missionaries upon Indian soil,—native schools and colleges with religious instruction, journals and leaflets, working centres, and a staff of preachers. The High Priest of the Sri Sivaganga Mutt is temporary President, but his is the only name given, and so important an enterprise needs the endorsement of many influential names. The restoration of religious sensibility and influence to a race becoming dulled through an imported secular spirit is a noble undertaking, but it may be marred, even checked, if "observances and ceremonies" are much regarded. They are even yet too numerous. The movement seems, however, to be under distinctively Theosophical auspices, and the word "Theosophy" is used.

CEYLON.

ON EASTER DAY a Reading Class was formed at Colombo, Ceylon, by the Lanka Branch and a few visitors. It will meet every Sunday at the Annie sant School. Dr. English from America is working hard to revive the nka Branch.

AUSTRALASIA.

AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND, maintains its weekly open meetings and fortnightly Sunday evening lectures, both well attended. Original lectures have been given upon The Harvest of Life, C. W. Sanders; Siderial Theosophy, S. Stuart; The True and the False, Mrs. Ellis; Theosophy and the Masses, or Conceptions of God, Karma, and Reincarnation, Mrs. Sara Draffin.

SYDNEY, N.S.W., keeps up its Theosophical activities; its fortnightly lectures, readings and discussions on Sunday evening, a weekly Secret Doctrine class alternately for beginners and Lodge members, the former conducted by Mrs. E. Minchen.

 GENERAL SECRETARY'S TOUR.

The General Secretary lectured at Hamilton Hall, Oakland, Calif., on the evening of April 25th to about four hundred persons, the subject being "Ghosts; what and where are They?" He also had meetings with members. On the 26th he lectured at the Metropolitan Temple in San Francisco on "Mahât-mâs". This was also the subject of the lecture at Sacramento, questions being subsequently put and replied to by Messrs. Judge and Hargrove. Mr. Hargrove had previously gone down to Santa Cruz on the 24th and had lectured there and at San José, besides seeing members. Meetings were also held at the Headquarters and otherwise. On May 1st they arrived at Portland, Or., where the General Secretary lectured in Arion Hall on "Reincarnation and Karma". A visit was made to Headquarters, where members were met, and the Branch meeting on May 2d was attended. On the third they left for Seattle, where the Branch was met and addressed. On the 4th went to Victoria, B. C., and lectured in Philharmonic Hall on "Death and After". The audience of 300 was almost wholly of men. On the 5th went to Port Townsend, where the United States Steamer "Yorktown" was visited for a dinner with the Commander, after which a lecture in the evening was delivered on "Reincarnation" in "Red Men's Hall". It was crowded with 275 people. On the 7th returned to Seattle. Travel north of Seattle is slow because steamers are few, yet there is much Theosophical interest and audiences were surprisingly large. On May 10th met the Narada Branch of Tacoma at their rooms for an hour and spoke of Convention and other matters. This Branch has a good hall where some member attends each day and keeps the place always open. The evening lecture was attended by about five hundred people, and the local papers gave good reports as well as a long interview. The next afternoon left for Olympia, and lectured in the Unitarian Church that evening on "Karma and the Law of Cycles" to a small audience. On the 11th left for Portland, Or., going on thence to Salt Lake City and arriving on the evening of the 13th. Met the Branch in the President's room at 11 a.m., and others later. At 8:15 lectured in the Salt Lake Theatre on "Reincarnation and Karma", and met Branch members and inquirers on the 14th, leaving in the evening for Colorado. After stopping in Aspen Mr. Judge went to Denver, met the members there, and obtained a parlor in Albany Hall for meeting inquirers during the 18th. About twenty persons called for conversation on Theosophy, and application was made for a Branch Charter by new members and those already on the spot. The preliminary meeting was addressed by Mr. Judge and by Mr. E. M. Sasseville. Arrived in Omaha on the afternoon of the 19th, and was met by Branch President and many members. At 8 p.m. Mr. Judge held a reception at the Mercer House, and on the 20th lectured at Arcanum Hall on "Theosophy". The audience was considered good. On the 21st he left Omaha for Chicago.

POINTS OF AGREEMENT IN ALL RELIGIONS.<sup>1</sup>

MR. CHAIRMAN, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: Let me read you a few verses from some of the ancient Scriptures of the world, from the old Indian books held sacred by the Brahmans of Hindustan.

“What room for doubt and what room for sorrow is there in him who knows that all spiritual beings are the same in kind and only differ from each other in degree?”

“The sun does not shine there, nor the moon and the stars, nor these lightnings, and much less this fire. When He shines, everything shines after Him; by His light all this is lighted.

Lead me from the unreal to the real!

Lead me from darkness to light!

Lead me from death to immortality!

Seeking for refuge, I go to that God who is the light of His own thoughts ; He who first creates Brahman and delivers the Vedas to him ; who is without parts, without actions, tranquil, without fault, the highest bridge to immortality, like a fire that has consumed its fuel".—Mundaka Upanishad.

The Midwinter Fair at San Francisco had annexed to it a Religious Parliament modeled after the first great one of 1893 at Chicago. Dr. J. D. Buck and William Q. Judge, the latter as General Secretary American Section, were officially invited to address the Parliament at one of its sessions as representatives of the Theosophical movement. Time was so short that all speakers were limited to thirty minutes each; for that reason the address is not as full as it would be had more time been granted. But the occasion once more showed the strength of the T.S. movement.

Such are some of the verses, out of many thousands, which are enshrined in the ancient Hindu Vedas beloved by those we have called "heathen"; those are the sentiments of the people we have called idolaters only.

As the representative of the Theosophical movement I am glad to be here, and to be assigned to speak on what are the points of agreement in all religions. I am glad because Theosophy is to be found in all religions and all sciences. We, as members of the Theosophical Society, endorse to the fullest extent those remarks of your chairman in opening, when he said, in effect, that a theology which stayed in one spot without advancing was not a true theology, but that we had advanced to where theology should include a study of man. Such a study must embrace his various religions, both dead and living. And pushing that study into those regions we must conclude that man is greatly his own revealer, has revealed religion to himself, and therefore that all religions must include and contain truth ; that no one religion is entitled to a patent or exclusive claim upon truth or revelation, or is the only one that God has given to man, or the only road along which man can walk to salvation. If this be not true, then your Religious Parliament is no Parliament, but only a body of men admiring themselves and their religion. But the very existence of this Parliament proclaims the truth of what I have said, and shows the need which the Theosophical Society has for nineteen years been asserting, of a dutiful, careful, and brotherly inquiry into all the religions of the world, for the purpose of discovering what the central truths are upon which each and every religion rests, and what the original fountain from which they have come. This careful and tolerant inquiry is what we are here for to-day ; for that the Theosophical Society stands and has stood ; for toleration, for unity, for the final and irrevocable death of all dogmatism.

But if you say that religion must have been revealed, then surely God did not wait for several millions of years before giving it to those poor beings called men. He did not, surely, wait until He found one poor Semitic tribe to whom He might give it late in the life of the race? Hence He must have given it in the very beginning, and therefore all present religions must arise from one fount.

What are the great religions of the world and from whence have they come? They are Christianity, Brahmanism, Buddhism, Confucianism, Judaism, Zoroastrianism, and Mohammedanism. The first named is the youngest, with all its warring sects, with Mormonism as an offshoot and with Roman Catholicism boldly claiming sole precedence and truth.

Brahmanism is the old and hoary religion of India, a grown-up, fully-developed system long before either Buddhism or Christianity was born. It extends back to the night of time, and throws the history of religion far, far beyond any place where modern investigators were once willing to place even the beginning of religious thought. Almost the ancient of ancients, it stands in far-off India, holding its holy Vedas in its hands, calmly waiting until the newer West shall find time out of the pursuit of material wealth to examine the treasures it contains.

Buddhism, the religion of Ceylon, of parts of China, of Burmah and Japan and Tibet, comes after its parent Brahmanism. It is historically older than Christianity and contains the same ethics as the latter, the same laws and the same examples, similar saints and identical fables and tales relating to Lord Buddha, the Savior of Men. It embraces to-day, after some twenty-five hundred years of life, more people than any other religion, for two-thirds of the human family profess it.

Zoroastrianism also fades into the darkness of the past. It too teaches ethics such as we know. Much of its ritual and philosophy is not understood, but the law of brotherly love is not absent from it; it teaches justice and truth, charity and faith in God, together with immortality. In these it agrees with all, but it differs from Christianity in not admitting a vicarious salvation, which it says is not possible.

Christianity of to-day is modern Judaism, but the Christianity of Jesus is something different. He taught forgiveness, Moses taught retaliation, and that is the law to-day in Christian State and Church. "An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth" is still the recognized rule, but Jesus taught the opposite. He fully agreed with Buddha, who, preaching 500 years before the birth of the Jewish reformer, said we must love one another and forgive our enemies. So modern Christianity is not the religion of Jesus, but Buddhism and the religion of Jesus accord with one another in calling for charity, complete tolerance, perfect non-resistance, absolute self-abnegation.

If we compare Christianity, Buddhism, and Hinduism together on the points of ritual, dogmas, and doctrines, we find not only agreement but a marvellous similarity as well, which looks like an imitation on the part of the younger Christianity. Did the more modern copy the ancient? It would seem probable. And some of the early Christian Fathers were in the habit of saying, as we find in their writings, that Christianity brought nothing new into the world, that it existed from all time.

If we turn to ritual, so fully exemplified in the Roman Catholic Church, we find the same practices and even similar clothing and altar arrangements in Buddhism, while many of the prescribed rules for the altar and approaching or leaving it are mentioned very plainly in far more ancient directions governing the Brahman when acting as priest. This similarity was so wonderful in the truthful account given by the Catholic priest Abbé Huc that the alarmed Church first explained that the devil, knowing that Christianity was coming, went ahead and invented the whole thing for the Buddhists by a species of ante facto copying, so as to confound innocent Catholics therewith; and then they burned poor Abbé Huc's book. As to stations of the cross, now well known to us, or the rosary, confession, convents, and the like, all these are in the older religion. The rosary was long and anciently used in Japan, where they had over one hundred and seventy-two sorts. And an examination of the mummies of old Egypt reveals rosaries placed with them in the grave, many varieties being used. Some of these I have seen. Could we call up the shades of Babylon's priests, we should doubtless find the same rituals there.

Turning to doctrines, that of salvation by faith is well known in Christianity. It was the cause of a stormy controversy in the time of St. James. But very strangely, perhaps, for many Christians, the doctrine is a very old Brahmanical one. They call it "The Bridge Doctrine", as it is the great Bridge. But with them it does not mean a faith in some particular emanation of God, but God is its aim, God is the means and the way, and God the end of the faith; by complete faith in God, without an intermediary, God will save you. They also have a doctrine of salvation by faith in those great sons of God, Krishna, Rama, and others; complete faith in either of those is for them a way to heaven, a bridge for the crossing over all sins. Even those who were killed by Krishna, in the great war detailed in the Ramayana, went straight to heaven because they looked at him, as the thief on the cross looking at Jesus went to Paradise. In Buddhism is the same doctrine of faith. The twelve great sects of Buddhism in Japan have one called the Sect of the Pure Land. This teaches that Amitabha vowed that any one who calls three times on his name would be born into his pure Land of Bliss. He held that some men may be strong enough to prevail against the enemy, but that most men are not, and need some help from another. This help is found in the power of the vow of Amita Buddha, who will help all those who call on his name. The doctrine is a modified form of vicarious atonement, but it does not exclude the salvation by works which the Christian St. James gives out.

Heaven and Hell are also common to Christianity, Buddhism, and Brahmanism. The Brahman calls it Swarga; the Buddhist, Devachan; and we, Heaven. Its opposite is Naraka and Avitchi. But names apart, the descriptions are the same. Indeed, the hells of the Buddhists are very terrible, long in duration and awful in effect. The difference is that the heaven and hell of the Christian are eternal, while the others are not. The others come to an end when the forces which cause them are exhausted. In teaching of more than one heaven there is the same likeness, for St. Paul spoke of more than a single heaven to one of which he was rapt away, and the Buddhist tells of many, each being a grade above or below some other. Brahman and Buddhist agree in saying that when heaven or hell is ended for the soul, it descends again to rebirth. And that was taught by the Jews. They held that the soul was originally pure, but sinned and had to wander through rebirth until purified and fit to return to its source.

In priesthood and priestcraft there is a perfect agreement among all religions, save that the Brahman instead of being ordained a priest is so by birth. Buddha's priesthood began with those who were his friends and disciples. After his death they met in council, and subsequently many councils were held, all being attended by priests. Similar questions arose among them as with the Christians, and identical splits occurred, so that now there are Northern and Southern Buddhism and the twelve sects of Japan. During the life of Buddha the old query of admitting women arose and caused much discussion. The power of the Brahman and Buddhist priests is considerable, and they demand as great privileges and rights as the Christian ones.

Hence we are bound to conclude that dogmatically and theologically these religions all agree. Christianity stands out, however, as peculiarly intolerant—and in using the word "intolerant" I but quote from some priestly utterances regarding the World's Fair Parliament—for it claims to be the only true religion that God has seen fit to reveal to man.

The great doctrine of a Savior who is the son of God—

God himself—is not an original one with Christianity. It is the same as the extremely ancient one of the Hindus called the doctrine of the Avatar. An Avatar is one who comes down to earth to save man. He is God incarnate. Such was Krishna, and such even the Hindus admit was Buddha, for he is one of the great ten Avatars. The similarity between Krishna or Cristna and Christ has been very often remarked. He came 5,000 years ago to save and benefit man, and his birth was in India, his teaching being Brahmanical. He, like Jesus, was hated by the ruler, Kansa, who desired to destroy him in advance, and who destroyed many sons of families in order to accomplish his end, but failed. Krishna warred with the powers of darkness in his battles with Ravana, whom he finally killed. The belief about him was that he was the incarnation of God. This is in accord with the ancient doctrine that periodically the Great Being assumes the form of man for the preservation of the just, the establishment of virtue and order, and the punishment of the wicked. Millions of men and women read every day of Krishna in the Ramayana of Tulsī Das. His praises are sung each day and reiterated at their festivals. Certainly it seems rather narrow and bigoted to assume that but one tribe and one people are favored by the appearance among them of an incarnation in greater measure of God.

Jesus taught a secret doctrine to his disciples. He said to them that he taught the common people in stories of a simple sort, but that the disciples could learn of the mysteries. And in the early age of Christianity that secret teaching was known. In Buddhism is the same thing, for Buddha began with one vehicle or doctrine, proceeded after to two, and then to a third. He also taught a secret doctrine that doubtless agreed with the Brahmins who had taught him at his father's court. He gave up the world, and later gave up eternal peace in Nirvana, so that he might save men. In this the story agrees with that of Jesus. And Buddha also resisted Mara, or the Devil, in the wilderness. Jesus teaches that we must be as perfect as the Father, and that the kingdom of heaven is within each. To be perfect as the Father we must be equal with him, and hence here we have the ancient doctrine taught of old by the Brahmins that each man is God and a part of God. This supports the unity of humanity as a spiritual whole, one of the greatest doctrines of the time prior to Christianity, and now also believed in Brahmanism.

That the universe is spiritual in essence, that man is a spirit and immortal, and that man may rise to perfection, are universal doctrines. Even particular doctrines are common to all the religions. Reincarnation is not alone in Hinduism or Buddhism. It was believed by the Jews, and not only believed by Jesus but he also taught it. For he said that John the Baptist was the reincarnation of Elias "who was for to come". Being a Jew he must have had the doctrines of the Jews, and this was one of them. And in Revelations we find the writer says: "Him that overcometh I will make a pillar in the house of my God, and he shall go out no more".

The words "no more" infer a prior time of going out.

The perfectibility of man destroys the doctrine of original sin, and it was taught by Jesus, as I said. Reincarnation is a necessity for the evolution of this perfection, and through it at last are produced those Saviors of the race of whom Jesus was one. He did not deny similar privileges to others, but said to his disciples that they could do even greater works than he did. So we find these great Sages and Saviors in all religions. There are Moses and Abraham and Solomon, all Sages. And we are bound to accept the Jewish idea that Moses and the rest were the reincarnations of former persons. Moses was in their opinion Abel the son of Adam; and their Messiah was to be a reincarnation of Adam himself who had already come the second time in the person of David. We take the Messiah and trace him up to David, but refuse, improperly, to accept the remainder of their theory.

Descending to every-day-life doctrines, we find that of Karma or that we must account and receive for every act. This is the great explainer of human life. It was taught by Jesus and Matthew and St. Paul. The latter explicitly said:

"Brethren, be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that also shall he reap"

This is Karma of the Brahman and Buddhist, which teaches that each life is the outcome of a former life or lives, and that every man in his rebirths will have to account for every thought and receive measure for the measure given by him before.

In ethics all these religions are the same, and no new ethic is given by any. Jesus was the same as his predecessor Buddha, and both taught the law of love and forgiveness. A consideration of the religions of the past and to-day from a Theosophical standpoint will support and confirm ethics. We therefore cannot introduce a new code, but we strive by looking into all religions to find a firm basis, not due to fear, favor, or injustice, for the ethics common to all. This is what Theosophy is for and what it will do. It is the reformer of religion, the unifier of diverse systems, the restorer of justice to our theory of the universe. It is our past, our present, and our future; it is our life, our death, and our immortality.

OCCULTISM THE HIGHER SCIENCE.

THERE is not so much conflict between Modern Science and Occultism as is imagined by those who know little of the former—some of whom are its loudest professors—and nothing of the latter. In fact Occultism is simply a loftier range of scientific research than is attempted by those who confine their investigations to the material plane of the universe. Its methods of study and demonstration are no less exact than those employed in the lower field, and it is much more exacting upon the student, requiring of him not only special capacity but such arduous training and negation of self as few are capable of enduring. At the same time, it offers to his perception fewer prizes than are easily attainable in the pursuit of the lower material science. This is not because there are not prizes infinitely greater to be won by it, even upon estimate from a material stand-point, but the study has the effect of elevating the mind to a plane whence all of what are known as “the practical advantages of life” look small and unworthy of effort. To illustrate: Suppose that an advanced Occultist possessed the knowledge of how to select and aggregate the proper atoms to make gold, and actually could make genuine gold. There is hardly anybody who would not say he was the greatest of all possible fools if he did not with all the energy he could command, at once set himself to producing the largest possible quantity of that much-coveted metal. But all the interest he could feel in the matter would end in satisfying himself that he possessed the knowledge and that it might aid him in the discovery of other secrets of atomic combination. He would smile with contempt at the folly of the thought that he might possibly waste his time in monotonously turning out ingots of gold; if indeed he he did not, knowing the debasing effects of selfish desire for wealth and its demoralizing temptations when attained, shudder with horror at the idea of so perverting his powers. But the end and aim of Modern Science is the discovery of new and more rapid ways for amassing wealth. Nothing else is “practical” from the popular point of view; and that which is not “practical” is, of course, not worth wasting time upon.

Modern Science and Occultism go together to a certain point—recognition of atoms as the ultimate resolvment of the molecule. To the former, however, atoms are merely hypothetical somethings, quite impossible of demonstration to sensuous perception until they become agglomerated into molecules, and consequently not worth bothering about; while the latter pursues its study of the atoms infinitely further, finding in the degrees of their attenuation, their different sorts, their infinitely varied combinations and respective modes of motion—or vibration—simple and complex, full explanation of all the phenomena of the manifested universe. The materialist's pretentious equipment of 'ometers and 'scopes is useless lumber in that field, for there it is necessary to see with the eyes of the soul, to employ powers of perception and cognition latent in man, but ordinarily so little used that most persons are ignorant of their possession.

The iron, the fire that softens it, the muscular force of the artisan who shapes the metal, the thought-concept of the form the metal shall assume, and the purpose impelling that creative thought, all are manifestations of the vibrations of atoms. Let us reverse that chain of incident and, with its links in their proper order, trace the connection between them.

Vibrations on the mental plane being in atoms of exceeding tenuity are much too rapid for perception by or effect upon the comparatively gross atoms which have reached the density necessary for combination into molecules and so constituting the world of matter. They are, however, retardations of the yet higher rate pertaining to the planes of Will and Spirit, which are beyond our present field of study. Mental vibrations, however, are sensed by astral matter, in which the atomic density is in many degrees, but all less rare than that prevailing on the mental plane, yet beyond the range of our sensuous perception. Its intermediateness enables it to function as the interpreter, or commutator, between the planes above and below it, translating the vibrations of either into the rate of the other and so rendering the thought forces impulsive upon the organs of action. So, then, upon the artisan's mental plane stir, as vibrations, the reason for and desirability of production of a particular something upon the material plane, and form must necessarily, upon that plane, be one of the attributes of that something. That form, whether of sword, plowshare, or aught else, must primarily exist as an image or model in the astral atoms, which in turn transfer the concept of it to the material thinking organ, and that machine transmits to the organs of action controlled through it the necessary impulses for reproduction, in the atoms subject to material forces, of the model in the astral atoms.

The sensitive thinking organ, the fierce fire, and the dense metal are alike products of atomic vibrations in matter. The material, astral, and mental planes are constituted of five distinct classes of atoms, differentiated by their respective modes of motion—vibrations—impelled by the Infinite and ceaseless during the Manvantara. The mode of motion distinctively belonging to each class of atoms is always the same upon all the planes, but its velocity is different, the increase of rate determining the degree of tenuity. There are two higher planes upon which the rate of vibration is inconceivably rapid—though there also the respective modes of motion, technically known as the “tatwic forces”, are like those below. The atoms can only be cognized by us as forces, not as matter, until they attain by agglomeration and condensation sufficient density to come within the range of our organs of perception. Fire is one specialized manifestation of an atomic force which, in varied combinations with others, pervades all the universe, and where there is an excess of the particular class of atoms affected by that vibration in any combination, its effects are demonstrated as light, heat, or energy, all or singly, and each capable of transmutation to the other by slight vibrations in the atomic proportions. Mutability is one of the distinctive attributes of all atomic combinations, particularly upon the super-sensuous planes, where, owing to the rarefaction and the rapid prevailing rate of vibration, there is extreme facility for mutual interpenetration. The rapidly moving atoms of the force specifically known as the “tejas tatwa” disintegrate the gross molecules submitted as fuel to their action, and so produce the phenomena of fire. But the presence of the tejas tatwa is also discernible in heat where no fire is actually present, as in boiling water, or a ball of heated metal, or a fevered body, for in those there is, as it were, storage of an excess of those vibrations, or, rather, of atoms excited by those vibrations. And we find that the molecular constitution of the gross matter subjected to those influences modifies greatly its capacity for retention of such vibrations and power to impart their energy to other matter, and in varying phenomena. But the potentiality of transmission and mutation is always present in every manifestation of the tejas tatwa, becoming actual in all favoring atomic combinations.

Since we have arrived at dealing with visible fire and solid metal, modern science is harmonious with occultism in recognizing the former as atomic vibration and the latter as an agglomeration of atoms, for our wise men of the Western world have, in very recent years, found the atom and its ceaseless motion necessary factors in a reasonable philosophic hypothesis concerning material phenomena.

Sir R. Ball says: "Were the sensibilities of our eyes increased so as to make them a million times more powerful, it would seem that the diamond atoms, which form the perfect gem when aggregated in sufficient myriads, are each in a condition of rapid movement of the most complex description. Each molecule would be seen swinging to and fro with the utmost violence among the neighboring molecules, and quivering from the shocks it receives from the vehement encounters with other molecules, which occur millions of times in each second". It seems to be sufficient for science to know that the molecules are in motion, without troubling itself to enquire either the causes of that motion or what may be its varieties; or what consequences would follow upon alterations of the proportions between the modes of motion in combination; or whether it is possible, by affecting them, to alter the character or integrity of gross matter to extents now undreamed of. Here again Occultism is far in advance of science. It has investigated these things, and in learning the various proportional combinations of the tatwic atoms which constitute the differentiations of matter, has also gained knowledge of the particular vibrations, or "tatwic forces", respectively affecting the several classes of atoms, through the operations of which are effected the creation, preservation, disintegration, and re-construction of all forms.

When we see a thin glass shivered by the sounding, at a distance from it, of a certain musical tone, science is content with ascribing the destructive action to vibrations set up among its molecules by the sound. That is indubitably true, but no more satisfactory than would be the saying, had it been smashed by a hammer, that its continuity of form had been interrupted by the too forceful impact of the molecules of the hammer upon those of the glass. Both would be statements of facts, but not exhaustive explanations. But the occultist sees in the simple phenomenon something more. It is to him a demonstration of the presence in the molecular constitution of the glass of a certain proportion of the akasic atoms, which are the most tenuous of all, the most numerous, and the chief attribute of which is the transmission of sound. And when the variations peculiar to the akasic atoms are intensified, they may readily become even more potent than those of the tejas tatwa in the disintegration of matter. When of two material objects one responds to and re-produces a tone emitted by the other, it is because their atomic constitution, in its inclusion of the akasic element, is the same, whatever may be the material form of their agglomerated molecules—as, for instance, when a musical glass voices a particular tone sounded upon the string of a violin, the latter, owing to its stoppings, being susceptible of infinite changes in the proportions of its component atoms, only one of which accords with that of the glass. It is only necessary to increase abnormally the volume and intensity of those akasic vibrations to go far beyond the mere production of a responsive tone or the shivering of a thin glass, to the disintegration of the most solid forms of matter, through the rending apart of their atoms by the disruptive force of the vibration in the akasic element in their combination. To produce such effect, however, it is requisite that the tone impelling such vibrations shall be the exact one capable of thrilling the particular combination of tatwic atoms in the molecular structure it is desired to affect. And there always is such a tone for every mass of matter.

A Biblical story affirms that the Jewish priests caused the walls of Jericho to fall by blowing their ram's horn trumpets about them. It is by no means an improbable story, not nearly so unlikely as many others in the same book. Numbers of the Jewish priests, in the days when Israel had a highly cultivated priesthood, were advanced practical occultists—King Solomon is reputed to have been one—and were of course aware of the properties of the akasic tatwic force. For the production of the desired effect upon Jericho's wall, all they had to do was to discover the inherent tone, or key-note, of that mass—which they were probably able to do easily by their art—and to sound the note which would excite destructively that particular akasic vibration.

And, by the way, this recognition of the power of the akasic vibrations over molecular matter affords the only real explanation of the now-common scientific experiment of causing thinly spread lycopodium, or fine sand, upon a plane surface, to assume various geometrical designs under the influence of musical tones. The lycopodium, or sand, arranges itself always in the same patterns in response to particular notes, and other tones cause it to break up those formations and enter into new ones, so that it would appear to have a power of volition and capacity for intelligent control of its action. And so it has. The Divine Spirit is in all matter, and its manifestation is through the tatwic forces controlling the atoms.

NIGAMAGAMA DHARMA SABHA.

THIS is the name of a society in India which has also members in the ranks of the Theosophical Society in America and elsewhere. It has been noticed by Col. H. S. Olcott in the Theosophist of April, 1894, under the title of "The Hindû Revival", and it is now well that we should all know the facts more fully. This article will attempt to give some information. Col. Olcott says :

The foregoing remarks are introductory to the notice we are about to make of the founding at the recent Magh Mela at Prayag of a new association of Hindû ascetics and laymen under the title of Nigamagama Dharma Sabha. Our theosophical colleagues Rai B. K. Laheri and Pandit Jagneshwar Mukhapadaya are among the promoters and most active managers of this important movement, and are thus forging one more link in the chain of sympathy which ought to bind every well-wisher of the Aryan religion to the cause of theosophy.

Then follow the rules, and at the close he says :

Since the adoption of the above rules nearly five hundred Sadhûs, Brahmacharyas, and pandits have signed for membership.

Strange as it may seem to some, this is an American movement, and was begun about January, 1893. Feeling that such a society should be started, I wrote to Brother Laheri and asked him to aid me in doing it, I promising on my part to raise money as I was able for helping on the work, and a little society was begun under a different name. Brother Laheri took hold of it at once, and after consulting with some pandits suggested that the name be altered to the present one, NIGAMAGAMA DHARMA SABHA. This was agreed to, and one of the rules affecting the West is that members from the West must be members of the T.S. and they should furnish means and also now and then give other help. One of its first works was the "Letter to the Brahmans", to which many replies were received from India and for which gratitude was expressed. The object of that open letter was to remove from the minds of the Hindûs, if possible, the wrong notion that the T.S. was a Buddhist propaganda, so that future work with the aid of the Society might be possible. It had a good effect. Brother Laheri acting for the new society went also, as before noticed, to a great meeting of orthodox Brahmans in India, and after his lecture to them they endorsed the movement of the T.S. Money has been raised in America and sent to India for the N. D.S. with the object of beginning the following as might be possible :

- (a). To have a Sanscrit organ for the Society.
- (b). To engage the services of a good pandit at some seat of learning in order to revive among the Hindûs under Hindû methods their own religion, to the end that more and more a knowledge of its true philosophy should spread there and in the West.
- (c). To have a district inspector.
- (d). To aid all good movements among the Hindûs, and especially to do all such works as would tend to spread theosophy there.
- (e). To procure rare manuscripts and palm leaves, and have them translated.

Under (d) it has been proposed to aid effectively the work so long carried on by Jagannathiah and Swaminathiah, F.T.S., at Bellary, India, where they have a small vernacular section and a little journal. It is proposed to them, in a letter sent by me, to include their work in that of the N.D.S. without in any way impeding them or having them alter the name they have adopted. To this they will no doubt agree ; and money has already been sent them for their help.

Brother Laheri recently writes thus :

The fact is that N.D.S. is now all over India in some form or other. In the Northwest it is under the guidance of J. Mukerjee, and several Dandiswamis, Brahmacharyas, and Paramahansas are among the members. I am in touch with the orthodox Brahmans in the Punjab and Northwest, and in Madras have the same relation through the Sanmarga Samaj, Bellary. I do not wish to make members at random nor to expend in useless matters the money that our most beloved brothers in America send in love, affection, and sympathy to their poor Hindû brothers. Hundreds of plans will have to be formed and hundreds given up as we learn by experience. You have got the best wishes of India for you because you really try to improve her cause ; people are simply delighted to see that America sends money through you to help in that.

Now this whole enterprise is for the benefit of the T.S. in India, and is not outside of its work. It was begun privately so as to prevent suspicion and distrust, but now there is no need for keeping it so. It is a fact that while Theosophy is forwarded best in the West by our own methods, those methods will not do for India, and such is the opinion of many Brahmans who know their own land. But help must be extended to them so that they can rise to their feet and help themselves. So the work of the N.D.S. in so far as the West is concerned is to furnish the means and later some of the men, so that under strictly Hindû ways and in the tongues of the land our objects may be forwarded by attempting to arouse a new spiritual aspiration. It is not competent for the T.S. as yet to donate money from its funds for this work, but it is right and proper that members should, if they see fit, give some of their money to it. This they have done, and several have sent me some subscriptions. These of course ought not to limit that which is needed for our own work, and it is not expected that members will cut off from the latter to give to the former, but that the aid given to N.D.S. shall be additional to all other. It is also intended to procure through the N.D.S. such rare palm-leaf manuscripts as will not only be of interest here but also perhaps a means of obtaining funds from those who would not give them to the T.S.

As Brother Laheri says, many plans will have to be formed and many given up until at last the best shall be discovered. But the plan of aiding the already-started work at Bellary is for the present permanent. It may result in a printing press there soon or late. American members become such by certificate issued by me under authority of Brother Laheri, and will be informed as the work goes on of its progress. So far, since May, 1893, I have received $548.00 and have disbursed $360.00 in drafts to India exclusive of a small bill for needed printing. Any one wishing to know more and to help can address me, as all names in the West have to go through my hands.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE.

UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD AND ADMIS- SION OF MEMBERS.

SOME confusion has at times arisen in the minds of Branch officers and members on the point of admitting persons to the T.S. It has been asked, Why, if we hold to Universal Brotherhood, should we refuse to admit those to whom there is objection? The answer seems to be the same as one would give if the question related to admitting all persons to one's family or house. Indeed, the relation of Branches to the T.S. is much like that of the family to the State. Every individual not positively criminal has the right to citizenship, and may, subject to the statutes, take part in civic affairs, express his convictions as to public policy, join in meetings of citizens for discussion or new movements, and everywhere be regarded as on a par with his fellows. But this gives him no right to entrance into any family, and a claim that his citizenship entitled him to cross whatever threshold he liked and establish himself as a member of the domestic circle would be laughed at. Every one would say that families had a right to their privacy and to select their associates, and that if they saw fit to exclude any person from their home, there was no canon of justice or proper feeling which should constrain them to do otherwise. It was wholly for them to say who was congenial, acceptable, welcome.

Just so in Branches of the T.S. Every sincere and reputable person is free to join the Society, and as a member of it to enjoy all the privileges belonging to membership. He can attend all meetings of Theosophists as such, join in petition to the constitutional authorities, use his diploma for purpose of identification, claim the documents due to F.T.S., and, in general, have full possession of every right conferred by our rules. But this does not empower him to demand admission to private meetings of a Branch, much less to election to its membership; nor can there be any ground of complaint if its existing members decline to elect him.

This will be clearer if we consider the nature and purpose of a Branch. It is a union of a group of members having a common ground of interest in Theosophic study or work, a certain general conception of desired methods, and a more or less intellectual or social or personal sympathy. The basis must of course be Theosophy, but the local superstructure takes shape and color from the quality of those who plan its erection. Now it is the continued harmony of the constituents which is to determine both its endurance and its activity. If an applicant for Branch membership is known to have views as to its policy which are in marked contrast to those prevalent within it, or to be offensive in manner, of ill-repute in the community, quarrelsome, heady, flighty, certain to excite discord inside or to compromise the Society outside, there is no possible reason why he should be accepted. To admit him would do him no good, for he is not in harmony with the rest of the organization, and would simply be introducing an element of discord certain to eventuate in ill feeling, contention, a check to work, and possible disintegration. One factious or indiscreet Branch member may paralyze a Branch. Nor is his exclusion an injury. He has no claim to entrance, and consequently no grievance at denial; and he is altogether at liberty to join the Society as member-at-large, to assist its operations, and to study its literature. He can be a citizen of the commonwealth without being a member of a particular household in it.

More than this. Where a Branch is aware that a person is sure to cause trouble or to act as a stumbling-block to other and worthy men and women, it is its duty to prevent that catastrophe. Sentiment should not be a bar to justice. To protect the Society and to secure peace to existing workers is of more importance than the self-love of a single individual. Indeed, if he resents the expression of the Branch's preference in the case, he shows that he has not that respect for others' rights, judgments, and feelings which is essential to any true Theosophist, and is destitute of the elementary qualifications for close union in Branch life. His very pique justifies the Branch action and affirms it.

Of course it cannot be said that no sacrifice of personal desires or preference is ever to be made by Branch members in elections. That would be queer Theosophy. It may very well happen that a person somewhat distasteful in ways may yet give promise of a valuable future, and a sincere member may, and should, concede personal considerations to a larger good. But this is a different case from that radical unfitness which cannot be smoothed over by tolerance or by phrases, and which demands the blackball for protection.

To recapitulate. We believe in unity, but at the same time we know that it is not possible for all to live intimately with each other because of various differences existing among individuals as to race, manners, and style of mind as well as of nature. Brotherhood does not require that we shall take into our home the vicious, even though we are working for their reformation; nor that we should bring into our own circle those whose manners and development are vastly different from our own. And just as it is in our private life as human beings, so it is in the Theosophical Society.

We have no right to deny to any one the right to be alive and one of the human family, and neither have we the right to deny to any one the right to belong to the Society so long as the applicant is not a criminal unreformed. But in the Society the Branch represents the family, and it has a right to draw a line or make limit, and to say who shall and who shall not belong to that family. Hence each Branch has to decide upon whom it will admit. If some apply who are sure to bring trouble to the Branch or who are of a nature that will not permit free and harmonious work with the others, the Branch has the right from all points of view not to admit to the Branch roll. This very question was once raised very needlessly in a place where there were many colored people and where a sentiment existed against their associating intimately with whites. It was settled by deciding that if colored people desired a Branch of their own they could have it and would be helped by the other. Brotherhood does not demand that elements wholly dissimilar must be violently mixed. Neither party would be comfortable in such circumstances. They can work apart for the common aim.

But the rules provide for cases where applicants wish to enter the T.S., as any Branch President may admit the applicant as a member-at-large if willing to endorse his character in general. In such an event the transaction is between the president, the applicant, and the office of the General Secretary. It does not concern the Branch at all.

And so the union of right feeling and sound reason will usually solve duty when uncertainty occurs, and the Branches be secured the largest proportion of good material, with a minimum of risk to harmony, effectiveness, and continuing life.

W.Q.J.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

MRS. ISABEL COOPER-OAKLEY is now well-known personally to Theosophists in all Sections of the Society. She is the daughter of the late Henry Cooper, C.B., Commissioner of Lahore, India, who was made the Governor of Delhi on his death-bed. She was born at Amritsar, Punjab, India, in 1854. Her father, one of the best known men in the Bengal Civil Service, was made a "Companion of the Order of the Bath" at the early age of twenty-eight for distinguished services rendered during the mutiny in India; the Cooper Buildings in Delhi are named after him, and the "Cooper Medal" was struck for him in 1864 by the Indian Government in recognition of great and continued services in the educational questions of India, and especially in regard to the education of women. On her father's side Mrs. Cooper is descended from Baron Cooper of Paulett (Earl of Shaftsbury) and Sir William Burnaby, both old English families. Her father was a nephew of Lord Forbes of Forbes Castle in Aberdeenshire. Her mother was the daughter of Gen. Steel (who married the daughter of Prince Angelo Della Trememondo, an exiled royal family of Tuscany), one of the old families of Steels of West Cumberland, whose mother, Dorothy Ponsonby, was a niece of the Earl of Bessborough. These facts are not given by way of glorification, but for those who wish to know of a person's descent.

Mrs. Cooper-Oakley and her sister Laura passed a great deal of their early life on the Continent. At the age of twenty-three the subject of our sketch met with a severe accident and for two years was unable to walk. This enforced quiet threw all her interests into her studies, and it was during this illness in 1878 that Isis Unveiled was lent to her and she began her investigations into Spiritualism with its cognate subjects. Life then took a more serious aspect, and on recovering in 1879 she began to take up public questions, interesting herself in Woman's Suffrage and the Social Purity Alliance. Wishing to study philosophy more deeply, Mrs. Cooper-Oakley determined to go to Girton College, Cambridge, in order to pass through a systematic course.

In 1879 when H.P.B. was passing through London on her way to India Mrs. Cooper-Oakley just missed her. Going on with her studies she passed her "matriculation examination" in 1881 and entered Girton as a student. In 1882 she met Mr. Oakley, who was at Pembroke College, Cambridge, with Dr. Keightley, and they all began their studies together. Together with the Keightleys they wrote to Adyar in 1883 applying for membership in the Theosophical Society, but received no answer. Hearing from Mr. A. P. Sinnett in the autumn of 1883 that H.P.B. was expected in Europe, they determined to visit her upon arrival. Isabel Cooper was married early in June, 1884, to Mr. A. J. Oakley. In March Col. Olcott arrived in London, and then Mrs. Oakley, Dr. Keightley, and Mr. B. Keightley joined the Society.

During the summer of 1884 it was arranged that Mrs. Cooper-Oakley and her husband should accompany H.P.B. on her return to India, and the plan was carried out. They took a house in London where H.P.B., Dr. Keightley, and Miss Laura M. Cooper lived during September and October until the party started for India in November. On the way to India Mrs. Cooper-Oakley spent three weeks in Egypt with H.P.B. and found the period full of intense interest, as H.P.B. was a mine of deep information. Arriving at Adyar, Mrs. Cooper-Oakley says she "had every opportunity of investigating the Coulomb affair and also was an eye witness to Mr. Hodgson's investigations, besides seeing the unfair way in which the S.P.R. representative behaved to H.P.B."

H.P.B. then fell sick, and Mrs. Cooper-Oakley nursed her through a long and dangerous illness, falling sick herself afterwards and being unable to leave India when H.P.B. was ordered away in February. In May Mrs. Cooper-Oakley was sent home, arriving in the summer of 1885, when H.P.B. sent her a warm and affectionate invitation to come to Wurzburg, but owing to bad health and business affairs Mrs. Cooper-Oakley was unable to leave London, but went to see H. P. B. as soon as the latter came to Norwood. During that summer of 1887 Mrs. Cooper-Oakley held small meetings in her rooms for inquirers, and was studying Theosophy steadily. That autumn she went to India for three months, and later in April, 1888, came back and staid with H. P. B. in Lansdowne Road for a few weeks, and in 1889 she became one of the household staff.

Continued bad health has prevented Mrs. Cooper-Oakley from doing the work she would like to have done. In 1890 the Headquarters was moved to 19 Avenue Road; the following year H. P. B. left us and her last message for the Society was given to Mrs. Oakley the night but one before she died. At three a.m. she suddenly looked up and said "Isabel, Isabel, keep the link unbroken; do not let my last incarnation be a failure". At the moment of H. P. B.'s death Mrs. Cooper Oakley was out, but received a telegram recalling her and arrived just ten minutes too late.

Since then she has been to Australia, where she worked among the Theosophists, arousing a great deal of public and private interest and doing much good to the Society. From there in 1893 she returned by way of California, stopping and working there and meeting many members. She arrived in Chicago in September, 1893, in time for the Theosophical Congress of the World's Fair, and took part in that as a speaker at the meetings of the Society. From there she came across to New York and returned home to London in October with the English and Indian delegates who had been at the Theosophical Congress. We leave the record at this point in London where she has been at work ever since, and hope that the future may record services to the Society as long as she shall live.

HOW TO STUDY THE "SECRET DOCTRINE".

IS there a key to the study of the Secret Doctrine? Are the seeming contradictions in the Secret Doctrine really such, or is there a possibility of their reconciliation?

It is not the purpose of this paper to show that the apparent contradictions are not contradictions, nor even to attempt to reconcile any of them; for, while it is claimed by some students that such reconciliation can be shown in many cases, others fail to see it in any. Nor is it necessary to bring up the question of the fallibility of the writer of the book, for even going so far as to grant infallibility to H. P. B., which she herself would have disclaimed, there remains the imperfection of the language in which the book is written, and its inadequacy to express purely metaphysical ideas. There is, however, it is claimed, a key to the study of the Secret Doctrine, the use of which will open many of its doors, clear away many of its difficulties, connect many otherwise disconnected statements, and even reconcile some of its apparent contradictions.

Theosophy is synthetic. The Secret Doctrine is also synthetic, and the key to its study, if such may be found, must also be, so to say, synthetic. For the difficulty in understanding it is partly due to the fact of the many points of view from which each subject is treated and the absence of definite links to connect the different statements thence arising: e. g. a subject in one place may be treated from the standpoint of the Vedanta philosophy, and in another place from that of the Sankya philosophy, and again from a third standpoint elsewhere. Add to all this the personal equation of the reader, usually a very important factor, depending upon education and general trend of mind, and it will be evident that it is no easy matter to reduce to order the great mass of information contained in the volumes under consideration.

It may be as well at this point to call to mind one of the preliminary requisites for the study of Occultism, and the value of a pursuit of the second object of the T.S., viz.: to free the mind from all preconceived ideas which may be due to inheritance and training, so that the true underlying meaning of the subject in hand may be grasped apart from the garb in which it is given, or the particular system of philosophy according to which it is presented. In other words, every student must learn to think for himself, and must realize that the ultimate tribunal to which he must refer everything is his own inner nature. The completest philosophy ever conceived can be no more than a mere working hypothesis for the student until he has arrived at that point where such a philosophy may be proved and tested in every way, i. e. until he is able to reformulate the same philosophy for himself and is able to base it on his own knowledge, not on the knowledge of others. In fact, each one ought to have his own philosophy of life; not a cut and dried philosophy with hard and fast limits, but a living philosophy which can grow as the mind develops, taking in a wider and wider horizon and sending its roots deeper and deeper in search of the living waters of Truth.

The key above referred to is threefold and consists of the three fundamental propositions of the Secret Doctrine.<sup>1</sup> Space does not permit of giving these here in full, but they may be summed up briefly as follows:

(a) "An Omnipresent, Eternal, Boundless, and Immutable Principle, on which all speculation is impossible. . . . It is beyond the range and reach of thought . . . . unthinkable and unspeakable."

This first proposition is a statement of the unity underlying the whole manifested universe, the unity of source and the unity of ultimate essence of all things, of the whole of nature, of things animate and inanimate, of universes, worlds, men, atoms. A further statement of this proposition is, that although the ultimate Reality, the ever Unmanifested, is One, yet the sine quâ non of all manifestation is duality. Manifestation implies duality, relativity, and is unthinkable save as comprising subject and object, cogniser and the thing cognized, the ego and the non-ego, spirit and matter. To rise above this quality one must pass from the finite, the conditioned, the manifested, into the unmanifested, the unconditioned, the infinite. From this duality which underlies all manifestation further spring the pairs of opposites, for the object of cognition can only be such in reference to other objects; a condition or state or property can be known only in reference to other conditions, states, or properties. This arises from and indeed constitutes one of the primary functions of mind, that of analysis and comparison. Separateness and illusion do not exist save in the mind; it is in the mind that arises the idea of the "me" and the "not me", and then the further analysis of the totality of the "not me" by means of the pairs of opposites, heat and cold, light and darkness, love and hate.

(b) "The absolute universality of the law of periodicity, of flux and reflux, ebb and flow." The Universe in toto is periodically "the playground of numberless universes, manifesting and disappearing", called "the manifesting stars" and the "sparks of eternity".

(c) "The fundamental identity of all Souls with the Universal Over Soul, the latter being itself an aspect of the Unknown Root; and the obligatory pilgrimage for every soul—a spark of the former—through the cycle of Incarnation (or "Necessity") in accordance with Cyclic and Karmic law, during the whole term".

This proposition further goes on to say that each Soul or divine spark, in order to have an independent (conscious) existence, must have "(a) passed through every elemental form of the phenomenal world of that Manvantara, and (b) acquired individuality, first by natural impulse, and then by self-induced and self-devised effort (checked by its Karma), thus ascending through all the degrees of intelligence from the lowest to the highest Manas, from mineral and plant up to the holiest archangel."

It is easily seen that propositions (b) and (c) depend upon (a). For if there is a Unity underlying all things it must imply, and be implied by, universal law as in (b), and also it must imply a unity in evolution as in (c). If we grant the unity of all things in source and essence, this ultimate unity must also apply to the law underlying and guiding all manifestation, and synthesizing all the known laws of the manifested universe. Furthermore, if we grant the One Reality, the ever Unmanifested Unity, and also that manifestation is the differentiation not of, but arising in, the One, thus causing the apparent "many", it must follow that between "non-manifestation" and the condition of greatest manifestation, between homogeneity and the utmost heterogeneity, there is endless progression, endless gradation, without one break or a single missing link in the chain of evolution.

There is, then, a sequence and a logical connection between these fundamental propositions, and since they are given as being "fundamental" it may be that in them we may find a key to the whole philosophy of the Secret Doctrine.

The tendency of Western thought and civilization has for a long time been in the direction of specialization. Religion, Philosophy, and Science have been separated and considered apart from one another, so much so that Religion has said "The secrets of life and death are with me alone, follow me." Science has said "Follow me and I will teach you to map out the heavens and weigh the sun in a balance; I will teach you the story of evolution, and the chemical combination of atoms upon which life depends." But if asked "What of the Soul?" Science answers, "I have nothing to do with the Soul, it is outside my province; we can never know anything about the soul, or that it exists; but follow me, accumulate facts, frame hypotheses, and get knowledge." And Philosophy? . . . Philosophy has been running between the two, between dogmatic Religion and dogmatic Science, and ending too often in agnosticism, or else mere empiricism. Let it not be understood, however, that the writer is unaware that there are many of the exponents of Religion, of Philosophy, and of Science who cannot be included in the above; but he asks, can it be denied that such has been the general trend of thought in these departments.

What, however, has this to do with using a key to the study of the Secret Doctrine? It is an illustration of the tendency of thought which each one of us has from education and heredity, viz.: to treat part of a subject as the whole subject, to look at things from one standpoint only, and so long as we are unable to view a subject as a whole and in its relation to other subjects, so long will the Secret Doctrine remain practically a sealed book; so long will the different view-points cause its statements to appear contradictory; so long will the connecting links be unperceived. What is needed is a study of fundamentals, and a constant application of and appeal to them. The Secret Doctrine begins with a statement of fundamentals; and its philosophy, far older than Plato, is yet Platonic, proceeding from universals to particulars. Hence to study it, to comprehend it, the student must proceed along the same lines, and endeavor to grasp with his mind the fundamentals, and to realize that neither man nor anything can be separated from the All, but that all evolution has one origin, is guided by one law, and has one aim. If the student can ever keep this in his memory, then can he also take up the study in the way that Science does, from particulars to universals, but with a far different result, for he no longer has to look for a key; he has it in his own hand.

AN ANCIENT TELEPHONE.

IT has been the custom of many people to belittle the ancients by assuming that they knew but little of mechanics, certainly not so much as we do. The builders of the pyramids have been described by modern guessers as making their calculations and carrying on the most wonderful engineering operations with the aid of pools of water for obtaining levels and star angles: they could not, it was assumed, have instruments except the most crude. So also the old Chinese were mere rude workmen, although it is well known that they discovered the precession of the equinoxes over 2,000 years ago. Of late, evidence has been slowly coming out that tends to show the ancients as perhaps having as much, if not more, than we have. So the following from the New York Evening Sun, an influential daily paper, will be of interest. It says, on May 31, 1894:

An English officer by the name of Harrington has discovered in India a working telephone between two native temples which stand over a mile apart. The testimony of the Hindûs, which, it is said, is backed up by documentary proof, shows that the system has been in operation for over 2,000 years. Scientists engaged in excavating the ruins of ancient Egyptian temples have repeatedly found unmistakable evidence of wire communication between some of the temples of the earlier Egyptian dynasties."

It will probably be found, in the course of time, that the oft-repeated statements of H. P. Blavatsky that the ancients had all of our arts and mechanical devices were true. She asserted that they had flying machines. In Buddhist books is a story of Buddha which refers to a flying machine or mechanical bird used in a former life of the Lord, and Indian tradition speaks also of air walking machines. Reading this item in the newspaper reminds me too of a conversation I had with H. P. Blavatsky in New York before the phonograph came out, in which she said that some Indian friends of hers had a machine by which they spoke with each other over distances of miles with great ease. Perhaps when the great West is convinced that the old Aryans had mechanical contrivances equalling our own, it will be ready to lend a readier ear than now to the philosophies the East has so long held in keeping.

LITERARY NOTES.

MAY LUCIFER surprises many of us by its statement that the "Comments" upon Light on the Path had the same exalted source as the text. Was this ever intimated before? Dr. Wilder's "Religions of Ancient Greece and Rome" is finely done and will almost certainly be excellent throughout. "A Manuscript from Another Space" is by an author who has apparently never read Flatland, and who gambols in uncouth glee over supposed discovery of thoughts now well in their teens. Mr. Mead's "Moulds of Mind" has of course all the rich intellection familiar to his readers, but specially strikes because in two distinct styles, — the first half almost staccato in its quickness and intensity, the last half flowing and full. It is charming to once more encounter in print Mrs. Patience Sinnett, and her "Alchemy as a Spiritual Science" closes its exposition with beautiful words which only the changed type disproves as her own. From a strictly Western view-point "G. R. S. M.'s "Dwellings of the Gods" may not appear as of intelligible thought, but doubtless the true view is that it is rich in meaning and spiritual help. "The Veil of Maya" grows ever more absorbing, even thrilling, and the latest scene is superb. The "Brother" discussion has three contributions; J. T. Campbell's slightly hysterical and altogether missing the point, Dr. F. Hartmann's concise and clear, W. Kingsland's fair but not very strong. Mr. Mead's lamented illness causes a sad drop in the reviews. — [A. F.]

MAY THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XXVI" narrates the temporary union in 1878 of the T.S. with Swami Dyanand Sarasvati's Arya Samaj, the dissolution being upon discovery that this Samaj was a local and sectarian body. The episode is interesting as one proof of the gradual evolution in character of the T.S. Col. Olcott's readiness for the union was in part, he says, because H.P.B. had told him that the Swami's body was inhabited by an Adept of the Himalayan Brotherhood, whereas he later discovered that the Swami was not an Adept at all, only a pandit ascetic. No inference is drawn, but four may be: that H.P.B. mistook; that the Colonel mistook; that the Colonel misunderstood H.P.B.'s assertion; that H.P.B. was right, though the inhabitation was only occasional. It is among the possibilities that any one of the last three may meet the case. "Altruism" is very good indeed, but Mr. Old's "Transmigration of Souls" is not, since it seeks to substitute for the Karmic doctrine of allotment as the result of desert a cloudy mass of phrases wherein no distinct thought appears. The clergyman whom he opposes has really, on page 494, given the Theosophic teaching as well as any Theosophist. Mrs. Besant's "Spirit of Theosophy" is, of course, broad and vitalizing. "The Hindû View of Transmigration" holds that the most sacred books teach descent of bad souls into animals and trees, but the editor thinks a different translation warranted. Verbal inspirationists are always in trouble, longitude not affecting inherent difficulties. There are some very sensible reflections in "Cuttings and Comments". The Astrological Bureau has encountered an untoward obstacle in the rapacity of native astrologers, and has to suspend for the present. But why was not this foreseen by due inspection of the heavens? Such, we fear, may be the inquiry of profane scoffers in the West, and there does not appear any immediate reply to them. Even if there was, these men would no doubt be shameless enough to hint that a planetary guidance which does not keep the "Bureau" out of scrapes might prove sad reliance for ordinary folk. Ah! well. — [A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VII, No. 4. "Life Eternal", by Dr. Alexander Wilder, is a singularly beautiful article, beautiful both in spirit and in diction. Sweet and pure and elevated, it tones up the whole nature of the reader, and it has a certain cordial sensing of celestial verities, utterly unpretentious and yet palpably genuine, which makes one feel their reality with peculiar vividness. Delightful thoughts are charmingly expressed. "I am ready to learn that gold itself is solidified sunshine which has been attracted and entombed in a matrix of quartz." "To see is better than to be seen." "The truth, and not its exponent, will make us free." The second paper, "What are we here for?", a reprint from the Theosophist, is fair but not noteworthy. — [A.F.]

TRANSACTIONS OF THE LONDON LODGE No. 20 is Mr. Bertram Keightley's lecture upon "Masters of Wisdom". It starts with a strong distinction between the material and the spiritual theories of Evolution, gives the ideal of a Mahâtma, shows how it is demanded by evolution, by analogies throughout it, and by history, closing with testimony, answers to objections, and a beautiful tribute to Masters' work. It is an able and of course well-written pamphlet, but the idea that experience has to be stored up in physical atoms rather than in the souls which merely use them is very fanciful and painfully materialistic, and one notices that in the description of Mahâtmas Buddha receives fifty-eight lines, Apollonius of Tyana nine, and Jesus five. At Mr. Keightley's request Mr. Sinnett appends an account of eight persons whom he personally knows and who have seen and communed with Masters, prefaced with some very sound remarks as to discretion in discussion. — [A.F.]

THE COSMOPOLITAN FOR JUNE contains a Theosophical story by Mrs. Arthur Gordon Rose, "Karma à la mode". Probably nothing more delightful has ever appeared in the Theosophical department of fiction. All our terms are perfectly familiar to the writer, and are used with the utmost dexterity. A humor more than delicious bubbles up all through the neat phraseology, and the culmination in the scenes on the last two pages is nothing short of genius. Every part of the whole story is so good-natured, so clever, so indescribably rich in dry wit and half-veiled fun, so apt and ingenious and well-conceived, that one yearns to shake the hand of such a writer and then steal her pen. Of course such a story illustrates the astonishing spread of Theosophy and the perception of popular taste now growing in writers and editors, but this is an after reflection. Any well-read Theosophist with a sense of humor who wishes half an hour of rarely-equalled delight had better send fifteen cents and postage to the Editor of The Cosmopolitan, New York. — [A.F.]

THE BUILDING OF THE KOSMOS, and other Lectures. These are four of the five lectures delivered by Mrs. Annie Besant before the Convention at Adyar in December. Most unfortunately that on Karma was omitted because of inadequate time to revise the report, but the other four, The Building of the Kosmos, (a) Sound, (b) Fire; Yoga; Symbolism, have been most carefully gone over and are issued under the direct sanction of their illustrious author. That they should be learned, luminous, instructive, eloquent, filled with an exalted spirit of purity, grace, wisdom, devotion, is of course. One expects that. But what astonishes is the marvellous knowledge of the vast and complicated Hindû sacred literature, a knowledge of its text and surface meaning, and esoteric sense, a knowledge so precise and large, all gained—or shall we say “revived”?—in these last five years. It is easy to picture the amazement and reverence with which the Brahman caste must have listened to the eloquent foreigner who knew better than they their own scriptures and lived them out in their very spirit.

The first two lectures are based mainly upon the Upanishads and H. P. B.'s Secret Doctrine, and unfold their teaching with amazing clearness, its spiritual quality being especially emphasized. Yoga is a most practical, common-sense exposition, but it soars grandly into the loftiest realms as the thought of “devotion” thrills and inspires the speaker. Symbolism finely expounds the meaning hidden in universal and Oriental symbols, and contends for their value as impressions on the ignorant. Through all these four great utterances of a great soul, so forceful with learning, intellect, and spirituality, is apparent a sympathy with Eastern methods which shrinks from admitting them as sharing human imperfection, and would rather endow them with the glow of a fervid reverence than subject them to any criticism, however just. The mantrams during conception and at birth and death (p. 24-25) and the treatment of the words “never to return” (p. 37-38) are illustrations; and the apologies for fakir asceticism (p. 60-62) and for idolatry (p. 82-87) suggest how affection impels more to perception of a fancied merit than to realization of an actual effect. This is true no less as to systems than as to individuals, and of philosophers as of the unlearned. And yet without such tenderness the speaker could not so have won the Hindû heart or touch the universal human soul.

The appended catalogue of works sold at Adyar exhibits an astonishing range, though the classification is sometimes rather startling, Dr. Dewey's Open Door, or the Secret of Jesus, for instance, coming under “Occult Stories”. (The PATH; 60 cents.)—[A.F.]

THE UNKNOWN LIFE OF JESUS CHRIST is a translation by Jas. H. Connelly and Leon Landsberg, both New York F. T. S., of the French version by N. Notovich of the Thibetan MSS. read to him in a convent in Ladak—Lesser Thibet. A very full and interesting description of his journey and of his access to the MSS. is given by M. Notovich, and a resumé of the work itself. Jesus, here called Issa, is considered the actual son of Joseph and Mary, though an incarnation of Buddha, and the seventeen years as to which the Gospels tell nothing are described as passed in study under Buddhists and Brahmins in India, and in preaching there and upon the return route to Judea, many short discourses being given. His crucifixion is attributed to a direct order of Pilate, after acquittal and protest by the friendly Jewish priests and elders, and the disappearance of the body to a transfer by Pilate to another tomb, no trace of resurrection being in the story. The earliest MSS. were written in Pali within four years after Issa's martyrdom, and translations into Thibetan were carried from India to Thibet about 200 A. D. Of course they far antedate the canonical Gospels. Naturally controversy is raging over their authenticity, but for this and for their correctness M. Notovich gives strong reasons.

From this account the whole miraculous element is missing, as to the birth, history, death of Jesus, and as to his personal acts. His teaching was simple, direct, practical, without parable, personal claim, or specific doctrine. The narrative is too concise for much criticism, but the style is clear, dignified, and marked by an evidently sympathetic spirit. That this remarkable work, possibly destined to create a great change in theological thought, should have been first brought within English reach by Theosophists, is pleasant to their brethren. (Orderable through PATH; $1.50.)—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHY SIMPLY PUT, by a New York reporter, is one of the best of Theosophical pamphlets, being exactly what its title claims. It is intended for every-day men and women, who need a clear statement in every-day language, and no other tractate covering so much ground has been written down to this level. The common objection to our literature is that it is not sufficiently popular. Provision is made for trained minds, the educated, the thoughtful; but not for the masses, though they need it as much. This can no longer be said. The work has been excellently done, done by one whose experience showed him the desideratum and whose powers were sufficient for it without surpassing it. Theosophists can serve the Cause precisely where service will be of special value by circulating this pamphlet among the class for whom it is written, and the "League of Theosophical Workers", 144 Madison Ave., N. Y. C., who have published it and to whom orders should be sent, will supply it for distribution at five cents, single copies being ten cents.—[A.F.]

THE VOICE OF THE SILENCE in the new American edition for the pocket has a great improvement over all others,—the foot-notes are upon the page where they belong, and not at the end of the book. Thus they can be read at once, without the annoyance of perpetual reference to another place. Copies in red leather and red edges are 75 cents; those in morocco with gilt edges are $1.00. The edition matches in size the new editions of the Bhagavad Gita and Patanjali's Yoga Aphorisms, and the Stanzas of Dzyan have been added, as well as a portrait of H. P. B. (THE PATH).

THE HERMETIC ART is Vol. III of Collectanea Hermetica edited by Dr. Wynn Westcott, and has a preface by "Non Omnis Moriar" and an Introduction and Notes by "S. S. D. D." Most of the text consists of warnings of the difficulty in understanding the subject and of the few who ever do, and one passage shows how the Philosophers "take the liberty" of contradicting themselves and each other. Still, this is not to be used as an argument against them or their Art, or even against the propriety of publishing further unintelligible works; rather is it a "trial of faith", as good Christians would express it. And all the difficulties vanish when one once gets the key—if one ever does. One can possess himself of some of these difficulties (though without the key) by investing $1.00 in this little work of fifty-two pages, wherein, partly in multi-capitalled prose and partly in what passed for poetry in a less exacting age, he can read about "Hunting the Green Lion", "The Doves of Diana", "Leprous Gold", "Metallic Moisture", and other profound mysteries understood only by the elect. (Orderable from PATH).—[A.F.]

WAS IST DIE MYSTIK? by Carl Graf zu Leiningen-Billigheim, is another new and very good book in German on Theosophical subjects. This book is intended to fill a long-felt want, being an introduction to more difficult Theosophical literature. Appended to it is a useful Theosophical Glossary. (Paper 127 pp., THE PATH, 75 cents.) Besides the above Herr Julius Sponheimer of Zurich, Switzerland, has made a very good German translation of the well known brochure, The A B C of Theosophy. (PATH, 20 cents). Both the above books were published by Wilhelm Friedrich, Leipzig, Germany.

DR. FRANZ HARTMANN has issued a circular asking attention to the appalling number of cases of burial alive, giving recent instances, and announces that he is about to publish a book upon the subject. Besides advocating legislation preventive of premature burial, the book will give the occult view of life and death. The Doctor asks friends to contribute well authenticated cases of burial alive in modern times, addressing him at Hallein, Salzburg, Austria. A retired army officer, U.S.A., is collecting the various statutory regulations abroad, and these will be used to promote reform here.—[A.F.]

Mirror of the Movement.

AMERICA.

ARYAN T.S. Sunday evening lectures in June were: "The Power of an Endless Life", Alex. Fullerton; Mahâtmas, Wm. Q. Judge; Nature and Nature's Laws, Jos. H. Fussell; Other Worlds than Ours, Claude F. Wright.

BROOKLYN T.S. had Sunday evening lectures in June: Theosophy and Art, Wm. Main; "The Power of an Endless Life," Alex. Fullerton; The Story of Osiris, Harry S. Budd; The History of a World, Jos. H. Fussell.

THE APRIL CONVENTION having authorized the General Secretary to cancel the Charters of the Lotus T.S., Kearney, Neb., and Gray's Harbor T.S., Hoquiam, Wash., this was accordingly done. These Branches have long been asleep and delinquent as to dues, and are finally cut down as mere cumberers of the ground.

VYASA T.S. AND SARASVATI T.S. of New Orleans have consolidated under the name "New Orleans T.S.," and the new Charter was issued on June 5th. The President will be Norman F. de Clifford, and the Secretary Dr. F. Barroso, 828 Canal street.

KALAYANA T.S., New Britain, Conn., has moved to another building in better location, where it has two good rooms, large signs, and a much more public character. Both daily papers announce the topic of Branch discussion each week, and often give space to a report. Influence is being exerted to secure for the Public Library the principal Theosophical works. On June 7th Miss Mary E. Hart of the Aryan T.S. read a paper before the Branch upon "The Evidences of Theosophy". The study-classes formed by Mr. B. Harding in Bristol and Meriden are doing well in both attendance and interest.

CLAUDE FALLS WRIGHT passed the latter half of April in lecturing and work at Macon and Atlanta, Ga., and in attempts at Palatka, St. Augustine, and Jacksonville, Fla. Arriving in New Orleans May 6th, he gave almost daily lectures or classes until the 16th, when he left for Nashville, Tenn. On the 17th and 18th he lectured publicly in Library Hall on "Reincarnation" and "Occultism". After many private meetings and also talks with members, he left for Washington, D. C., and arrived there May 24th, Thursday. On Friday he lectured before Branch on "The Theosophical Society". Sunday, 27th, he lectured on "Dreams". On Tuesday, 29th, he gave a public lecture on "Reincarnation". On Thursday, 31st, he gave another public lecture on "Occultism". On Friday, 1st June, he addressed the Branch and answered questions. Sunday, June 3d, he addressed over one thousand persons in Metzert's Hall on "H.P.B. and the Mahâtmas". The following Friday he again addressed the Society on "The Seven Principles of Man". Saturday, June 9th, he lectured publicly to a large audience on "Occult Development". On Monday, June 11th, he addressed a meeting in Mrs. Irwin's drawing rooms. Friday, 15th, he lectured before the Branch on "Kama". Sunday, 17th, he attended Western Presbyterian Church and listened to attack on Theosophy and his own lectures by Rev. H. W. Ennis. Mr. Wright promptly challenged him to a public debate. Mr. Ennis lamely refused, and the papers widely advertised the whole affair. On Thursday, the 21st, Mr. Wright replied publicly in the large Metzert's Hall to Mr. Ennis in a lecture entitled "Theosophy and the Churches". Mr. Ennis was invited.

DENVER T.S., Denver, Colo., was formed by the General Secretary on his return route to the East. It was chartered on May 31st with six Charter-members. The President is Wm. S. Wing, and the Secretary Edward B. Cronkhite, 1,644 Tremont Street.

MR. B. HARDING has passed a busy and most successful month in New England. The Norumbega Club of Charlestown, Mass., numbering two hundred or more, requested a lecture on Theosophy, and Mr. Harding complied with it to their satisfaction. A series of three lectures has been given in Worcester, Mass., to crowded audiences, and the result has been the formation of a class of twelve to study Theosophy at the home of Mrs. Clafin through whose energetic work it was that Mr. Harding's visit proved so successful. A series of three lectures was also given in Lynn, Mass., to large audiences, and the result there was equally gratifying. A class of fifteen was formed for weekly study under the guidance of Mr. Robert Crosbie, President of the Boston T.S. Lectures have also been given at Newburyport, Lexington, and Sharon, and a class formed at Sharon to be conducted by Miss Craig. Mr. Harding has also delivered lectures during the month to large audiences in the halls of the Malden, Boston, Cambridge, and Somerville Branches of the T.S. In all, nineteen public lectures have been given, besides much other work accomplished in visiting and meeting individuals, etc. Under the auspices of Bro. Clarke Thurston of Providence, R. I., halls for lectures were engaged at New Bedford, Taunton, and Fall River. Mr. Harding delivered three lectures at each place. Classes to study at these towns have been begun and will be looked after by the members of Providence.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

SAN FRANCISCO LECTURES continue well attended in spite of the heat. That on June 10th was by Mrs. S. A. Harris upon Man and God; that on June 17th by Dr. J. A. Anderson was upon The Devil. Dr. Griffiths's Southern tour is very successful.

KESHAVA T.S., Riverside, Calif., was chartered May 31st with eight Charter-members. One of its most active organizers was the late Secretary of the Krishna T.S., Philadelphia, now a resident of Riverside.

HARMONY LODGE T.S., Los Angeles, Calif., is the third Branch in that important town, and was chartered on June 8th with nine Charter-members. The dissolution of the two Western Branches and the union of the two in New Orleans make this one to rank eighty-eighth on the American roll.

AURORA T.S., Oakland, Calif., is about to open a free Reading Room every afternoon, thanks to liberal donations from the Countess Wachtmeister and from those she had generously interested.

THE PACIFIC THEOSOPHICAL CORPORATION is now a legally incorporated body, designed to carry on Theosophical work on the Pacific Coast. It has for officers such men as Dr. Anderson, Mr. Rambo, and others. The last of the monthly lectures at the San Quentin Prison was given by Abbott B. Clark on June 3. The inmates of the prison begged for more Theosophical books, and a large number have now been given. A class of 120 students has been formed for the study of Theosophy, and is carried on without outside assistance. Messrs. Evan Williams, Abbott Clark, T. H. Slater, and others have lately begun work among the sailors on the water front. It promises grandly. Literature is distributed, and lectures will be given as soon as arrangements can be made. The H.P.B. training class of San Francisco has been so successful that others are to be formed throughout the country. A training class has already been started in Oakland with a large and enthusiastic membership. The object of this class is to train members for active and efficient propaganda work; the expression being "to assist its members to get a clear, comprehensive, and common-sense view of Theosophy, and to acquire the ability to convey that view to others".

DR. GRIFFITHS visited Salinas, Calif., and gave a lecture to a crowded house May 15th. Many unable to secure seats sat upon the steps and remained standing during an address of nearly two hours. A number of ministers were present, also teachers, editors, and professional men, and intense interest was manifested. A quiz meeting was held the following evening. Leaflets and marked catalogues were distributed.

San Ardo was the next stopping place. Bro. J. C. Hadley resides and had done some preliminary work there. Many came from the surrounding country and attended the lecture given May 18th. I.O.O.F. Hall was well filled, leaflets were distributed, and Bro. Hadley decided to hold regular T.S. meetings there hereafter. A nucleus is thus started which may soon develop into a Branch.

A general lecture upon Theosophy, Karma, and Reincarnation was given to a good audience in Santa Maria, Calif., May 25th, and a quiz held next evening. As usual, long reports were given by the local press.

Lectures were given in Santa Barbara June 1st and 3d. Unity Church was offered and accepted with thanks for same. A good audience attended. An informal quiz meeting was held and frequent calls were received during the lecturer's stay in that city.

June 4th, p.m., Mrs. Albert McGee, F.T.S., who resides at Montecito, a suburb of Santa Barbara, gave a reception to Dr. Griffiths at which a number of people interested to know what Theosophy is attended. It was a pleasant and profitable occasion. Brothers Playter and Wallerstein also reside near that city, and there is prospect of a Branch there. Ventura was next visited and a lecture given June 7th. Two large and interested audiences attended lectures given at Santa Paula June 12th and 13th, three informal meetings were held, a class for study started, and a Branch will no doubt later result. Numerous calls were made upon the lecturer at his hotel. Leaflets were distributed and press reports given.

THE COUNTESS WACHTMEISTER, who accompanied Mr. Judge and party on his recent Western trip, has proven herself an indefatigable and tireless worker for Theosophy. Beginning in San Diego, her first lecture was delivered in the Theosophical Hall, before the Branch, and was of an hour's length, followed by another hour of questions and answers. Going thence to Los Angeles, she remained in that city for three days, and during that time gave a lecture in Blavatsky Hall to a crowded audience, received a constant stream of people at Headquarters during the day, and at the private residences of several of the members of the Society during the evenings. She then went to Riverside and organized a new Branch in that city. After this, she came on to the Convention in San Francisco with the other Delegates, and gave a number of lectures before the Convention and at private and Branch meetings in San Francisco; a large hall was then secured and she was announced for a special lecture upon Spiritualism and Theosophy, which she gave before a fine audience, and which was of over an hour's duration, and was a most successful effort in showing the explanation of spiritualistic phenomena by Theosophic philosophy. A regular tour through the Santa Clara Valley was then mapped out for her, and she visited all the principal points in this valley, lecturing at each place. At Santa Cruz she gave a lecture to a good audience, and received visitors at Dr. Gamble's residence and at the Headquarters while there. She did a great deal of most satisfactory work while in this city. She attended a Branch meeting at the village of Soquel in the afternoon, and gave a lecture in the evening. Next morning she attended another Branch meeting, and was then driven over to Watsonville, where a lecture was arranged for and delivered in the Opera House to a fine audience. The following day she received visitors, both afternoon and evening, in the parlors of the hotel, with the result that a class for the study of Theosophy was formed, and it was arranged for Mrs. Russell of Santa Cruz to go over once a week and take charge. Seven or eight persons joined the class, and a room was engaged for regular meetings. Thence she went to San José, and received enquirers at private residences. The following day she lectured at the Town Hall. The day after she again received visitors and enquirers. Next morning she went on to Gilroy, and received visitors the whole time at the residence of Mrs. Angney; gave one successful lecture, and the following evening a conversazione, where there were continual questions and answers. During the same afternoon, at a private residence, she met many people who were interested in Theosophical subjects. The next day continual visitors again, and in the evening a Branch meeting to discuss methods of work. She then returned to San José, was driven to Mrs. Stubbs's house, about six miles from San José, returning to San José and lecturing in the evening to a full hall on India. The next morning received visitors again, and in the afternoon left for Oakland, where a lecture was delivered that night upon India.

The Countess arrived in Stockton Monday, May 28th, and received visitors through the forenoon of each day of her stay. A reception was given to her in the Masonic Temple on the following afternoon, and many questions were put and answered. In the evening she lectured on Theosophy to a large attendance, and on Wednesday and Thursday afternoons she received Theosophists in the Branch Hall and imparted valuable information. A private Branch meeting for members only was also held, and a public lecture given on India. The Countess left Stockton and arrived in Sacramento on June 1st, and during most of her stay experienced unpropitious weather, but she received visitors constantly except when occupied with public work. On the evening of the 2d a reception was given her, much impaired in attendance by rain. She met the Branch on Sunday afternoon, and in the evening publicly lectured and answered questions. After the lecture she received the members of the "Seventy times Seven Club" and gave them good Theosophical advice. Up to the very last moment of her unfortunately short stay she was answering earnest questions from callers, and it was with great reluctance that Theosophists bade her good bye after only three days of visit. She then went to Marysville.

ALOHA T.S., Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, was chartered on June 14th with eleven Charter-members, and is our eighty-ninth Branch. The very interesting work going on for some time in Honolulu has steadily increased in volume and public interest, and the actual organization into a Branch has been prepared for with much care and foresight. All the Charter-members are new except the one who has been for some years a member-at-large of the American Section and to whom the present Theosophical activity in Honolulu is mainly due—Mr. A. Marques.

MRS. M. M. THIRDS, the devoted Secretary of the Central States Committee, left Chicago on June 29th en route to San Francisco and thence to Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, where she purposes Theosophical work in connection with the new Branch there. This important undertaking will doubtless give great aid to Theosophy in Honolulu.

AUSTRALASIA.

AUCKLAND, New Zealand, has resolved upon a Lotus Circle, to meet on Sunday afternoon and to be conducted by F.T.S. who will each give a month in turn. Papers or lectures have been given upon Thoughts on the Deity and on Man, The Harvest of Life, The Cause of Separateness; What is it?, The Philosophy of Mysticism, Theosophic Conceptions of Christ, and Why do we not recollect our past lives?

SYDNEY, N.S.W., celebrated White Lotus Day with special care, the room being beautifully decorated with flowers and ferns, and H.P.B.'s portrait upon the table being wreathed with flowers and flanked by photographs of Mrs. Besant, Mr. Judge, and Mrs. Oakley. The average attendance at meetings is fifty.

THEOSOPHICAL CORRESPONDENCE CLASS.

The very great value to F.T.S. of this method of systematic instruction and training is strikingly shown in the eight-page circular upon the answers to Question Papers 1 and 2, just sent to members of the Class. It is called "General Comments and Notes". Taking up each Question it rounds out the answers received, correcting, amplifying, explaining with singular clearness and knowledge. The Questions themselves had been eminently judicious and intelligent. Students who really desire to ascertain both what they know and what they do not, and who wish to progress under the direct guidance of a highly instructed Theosophist, have thus opportunity in a system which has been planned with great sagacity and is carried on with great ability. Members of the T.S. can join at any time by writing to Secretary Theosophical Correspondence Class, 144 Madison Ave., New York.

MAN'S DUTY TO HIS BROTHER BRUTES.

CONFOUNDING the individuality of man with his personality, and the according of an undue importance to the latter, which is a basic error in modern Christian belief, are in various ways much to be regretted, as affording false premises from which many wrong and injurious conclusions are naturally drawn. The fundamental injury done by it is through a tendency to cultivate in a man a sense of separateness from both the Divine Source of his immortal being and the phenomenal universe of which his transient personality is a part. In point of fact, he is separate from neither, being in his essence a portion of the former—with potentiality of conscious reunion—and indissolubly connected with the latter, so long as he retains corporeal form, by his subjection to laws governing all matter.

A rather rare old book, The Chronicles of Nuremberg, printed in 1492, contains a picture of the Lord, in voluminous robes and with a crown on his head, molding Adam out of a mass of clay; and another picture represents the Lord, costumed as before, pulling Eve—a little female figure, out of an oval hole in the side of the sleeping Adam. Those pictures were published under the censorship and with the approval of the church. To one who can believe that version of the creation of man, faith in almost anything else must come easy, and such robust credulity is demanded of him who would be an orthodox Christian. He must not doubt God's concentrating his attention upon man ; that God made the sun to give man light by day, and the moon to give man light by night, and the stars and planets to decorate the firmament for man's delectation, and the comets to amuse man or perhaps to stimulate his curiosity ; that God invented the seas and rivers for man to sail upon and drink, and iron for man to use in fashioning implements and weapons, and gold for man to use as a medium of exchange or standard of value, and the flora and fauna of every land for man to amuse or decorate himself with or devour, and so on, the general purpose and all the details being—everything for man. Theosophy does not accord such importance to the corporeal man, but regards him as simply a creature who has attained a certain advanced stage in the endless course of evolution through which all the manifested universe is moving, and affirms that it is impossible for him to evade by any assumption of superiority or inherent right of selfishness his full share of Karmic responsibility for his acts toward all other beings in the evolutionary chain, however low they may still seem to be. This is one of the serious differences between that philosophy and Christianity, which less than any other form of religion largely professed in so-called civilized countries inculcates as a moral duty human kindness to the lower orders of animal life. And, indeed, it was not enjoined by the founder of that creed. So far as we may judge from what his followers have chosen to retain of his teachings, Christ, while full of tenderness for the sons of men, gave no particular consideration to the rights of animals. It is true that he did upon one occasion mention the duty of rescuing a domestic animal from a pit into which it had fallen, as justifying a violation of the strict Sabbatical law, but even in that, whether higher regard was paid to the feelings of the animal or to its owner's acute appreciation of its property value—which he knew was strong in his people—is open to question. At all events, there is no record of Christ's having ever uttered any such eloquently compassionate appeal on behalf of the helpless dumb brutes as Gautama Buddha's protest against blood sacrifice.

Possibly a reflection stirring humanity's self-interest would be more potent than one based upon sentiment or justice to-day as much as in Christ's time, and, taking this point of view, men will do well to consider whether gravely evil consequences are not likely to grow from the seeds of wrong and cruelty our race is sowing in its treatment of the animals. A prominent newspaper, one which frequently manifests intelligence in its editorial columns, recently published the following :

From London and from San Francisco simultaneously come accounts of human beings mortally affected with glanders. Man domesticates an animal, uses or houses him ill, and presently nature develops in him a disease by means of which she avenges the outrage done on herself. The better opinion of to-day is that this is the origin and genesis of that supreme scourge of the human race, the disease of consumption. Recent investigation has brought to man's knowledge a number of human diseases produced by parasites originally developed in the lower animals and communicated from them to man. It begins to appear that the Societies for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals may yet receive their most effectual aid from the studies showing how the effects of such evil doing work out their own revenges on the higher race responsible for them. In time, systematic study may even trace the operation of nature's same law of inexorable revenge from the practice of cruelty upon children. Should this ever be made palpable to the plain understanding, the societies combatting this evil will have gained the most effectual ally their cause is capable of attracting. No evil is ever eradicated until it is shown to be a fruit of ignorance, containing within itself, for that reason, elements of a retribution inevitable under the operation of natural law.

With all the good sense its business interests cannot quite suppress, the paper making that utterance is still too timid, too much afraid of shocking its orthodox advertisers, to venture calling that "natural law" by its right name — Karma, for the doctrine of absolute justice, the affirmation of inevitable responsibility, is unwelcome to those trained to hope evasion, through the vicarious atonement, of what they know they deserve.

Karmic justice is an essential element of evolutionary development. It is not confined to the ethical field, rewarding good and punishing evil, but is operative upon every plane of being, for it is the law by which causes are inevitably productive of effects. The blooming of a flower from a planted seed, the blasting of a rock by an explosive force, and the blighting of a soul by a career of vice and crime, are all Karmic outcomes, and either is but one link in an endless chain of indissolubly related incidents. Nothing exists, or can be imagined by the mind of man, which is not at once a consequence and potentially a cause for other consequences. Hence man in his every thought, word, and deed sows seed which must produce harvest, in kind and degree exactly proportioned to it. And this harvest is in no wise dependent upon the vigilance of any "recording angel", or the humor of any anthropomorphic God, or the interposition of influence by any superhuman being more merciful than just.

The Karma made by human beings is not simply individual, but collective as well, and a family, a class, a nation, or a race may by joint participation in or condonation of wrong bring upon itself retributive consequences which will be deeply afflictive, or even destructive, to it as a whole ; individual deserts at the same time receiving their exact measure of award. It may seem to purblind human wisdom that in such comprehensive afflictions the innocent suffer with the guilty, but such is not the case. The unerring law of Karma determines the measure of individual responsibility, and is alone capable of prescribing who are the innocent.

Cruelties to animals generally dealt with by organized human societies, or taken cognizance of by law, are of four classes, — those perpetrated through ignorance or parsimony, as the ill-keeping or feeding of domestic animals ; the savage punishment of beasts of burden and “pets” by persons of ungovernably violent tempers ; such brutal sports as dog-fighting and cock-fighting ; and, unhappily, a certain small proportion in which unbalanced minds seem to derive a morbid gratification from the infliction of pain. These are, of course, very bad ; but it is open to question if all together make for the race so heavy a debt of evil Karma as must come from two other classes, for which the burden of direct responsibility rests upon those who assume to represent the highest civilization, culture, and scientific progress of the age. One of these is the practice of vivisection—the torture of living animals—nominally “in the interest of science” but actually for the gratification of a profitless and morbid curiosity as to the intensity of physical agony a creature can endure yet live and be conscious of its excruciating pain, or how it will act in the demonstration of emotions under such horrible conditions. As illustrations of this may be cited Prof. Bracket’s experiments on dogs, to test their affections. He dug out a dog’s eyes, destroyed its organs of hearing, inflicted upon it the most agonizing tortures in various diabolically ingenious ways, to find, if he could, the limit of its attachment, and still, until merciful death came to its relief, the poor animal licked his hands. A female dog with young was cut open and her puppies extracted, with the object of seeing if in her dying agonies she would recognize them as her offspring and exhibit maternal affection. Another, taken from her young, had her breasts cut off and was put down, so mutilated, bleeding, and dying, among her hungry little ones, to see what she would do when she could not feed them. She offered them her gaping wounds, caressingly licked them in her last agonies, and died. The law recognizes the right of so-called scientists to practice such infernal and utterly inexcusable atrocities, and licenses them, and the guilt of their perpetration consequently rests not only upon the individual perpetrators, but upon the community which does not punish such deeds and make them infamous.

The other enormous wrong referred to is the wanton slaughter of birds that their plumage may be employed for the decoration of women's hats and dresses and in certain specialties of "art-work". In a single week in 1888 there were sold at auction in London the skins of 400,000 North and South American birds, a large proportion of them those of humming birds. At one sale 12,000 humming birds' skins were sold. And that is but one of the numerous markets in which this trade goes on constantly in Europe and America. So great is it that it has almost made extinct some of the most brilliant varieties. Of the superb "ruby and topaz" humming-bird, 3,000 skins were sent in one shipment from Rio de Janeiro. Of many varieties of birds, women only care to adorn themselves with certain portions, the wings, breast, or tail, and, as it is believed that the feathers keep their brilliant colors longer if taken before the bird dies, hunters of birds for fashion's use make a practice of twisting off the wings, tearing out the tail feathers, or deftly ripping off the entire skin of the breast, from the still living creature, then indifferently casting aside the palpitating, agonized, mangled little victim, to die at its leisure.

Can any one who realizes the scope of moral responsibility involved in the operations of Karmic law for a moment imagine that the reaction from that cruelty will fall only upon the ignorant and brutal hunters—who are often savages—and that the men who employ them, the merchants who trade in their spoils, the fair women who adorn themselves with the blood-stained trophies, and the complacent friends who approve their fostering of the merciless traffic, will not all have to bear their share of the account?

Among various kindly peoples whom good Christian vivisection, bird-wing wearers, and preachers of the vicarious atonement stigmatize as "heathen", it is believed that one who is guilty of wanton cruelty to a dumb, helpless beast will, after death in mortal form, reïncarnate consciously as a beast, of the kind he has injured, and suffer at the hands of some other cruel man such suffering as he inflicted. Taken literally, it might be said that arrangement would be very fair and likely to keep up the supply of beasts and the practice of cruelties; but the real meaning of that exoteric teaching, as understood by the wiser, is not that there will be actual retrogression to animal form, since that would be a violation of the general law of evolution, but that the wantonly cruel deed certainly involves such Karmic retribution as will bring pain equal to that inflicted. Sooner or later the punishment will certainly come. "Though a man die, yet shall he live again", and the Karmic debt he incurs never is outlawed, but must eventually be paid.

One retributive effect, the causing of human diseases, has already been noted. Another is heard of in the wail of the agriculturist that his harvests suffer from the attacks of insect myriads no longer held in check by the little feathered songsters he has helped to send away for the adornment of women's hats. But it is not solely in such material phenomena that the Karmic recompense is meted out. It touches the minds and souls of men as well as their lives and pockets, even of those who deem themselves free from all responsibility in the matter, for there is no such thing as separateness possible in all our great family.

The astral condition of matter, in which the atoms are just a little too refined for perception by our senses, pervades the denser molecules of the material plane and, interblended with yet more tenuous atoms constituting other planes, fills all space, at least within our world, to the uttermost confines of its gaseous envelope. All material forms have in them their astral bodies, or models, upon which are molded the material molecules which make them objective to our senses. The dense atoms of the gross molecules, the astral atoms mingled with them, and the more rarefied atoms of yet subtler conditions of matter are all together in ceaseless vibratory motion, introactive, reciprocal, and productive of phenomena. All sentient things impel modifications of those vibrations, in kind and degree proportioned to their sensations, from their astral principles in which such sensations are perceived to the general ocean of astral atoms in which all are submerged, and these vibrations not only leave there their impressions, a record of all that which has been, but are causative of vibrations affecting other organisms through their responsive astral principles. Thus, when the astral ocean is made to pulsate with vibrations caused by pain and wrong, it attains a malefic influence which is as really poisonous in its effects upon men's minds and souls as an atmosphere charged with some deadly gas would be to the lives of those inhaling it. Dulled sense of moral responsibility, debasement of thought and feeling, inhuman indifference to the misfortunes of others, increase of selfishness and abandonment to sensuality are all products of such vibrational influences, unconsciously sensed on the astral plane and thence transferred to the higher and yet more potent rate of vibrations belonging to the mentality of man.

Not until we deal more humanely with what we are pleased to call the lower orders of creation will we cease to require constant enlargement of our prisons, alms-houses, insane asylums, and hospitals.

PROOFS OF THE HIDDEN SELF

THROUGH DREAMS.

THE dream state is common to all people. Some persons say they never dream, but upon examination it will be found they have had one or two dreams and that they meant only to say their dreams were few. It is doubtful whether the person exists who never has had a dream. But it is said that dreams are not of importance; that they are due to blood pressure, or to indigestion, or to disease, or to various causes. They are supposed to be unimportant because, looking at them from the utilitarian view-point, no great use is seen to follow. Yet there are many who always make use of their dreams, and history, both secular and religious, is not without records of benefit, of warning, of instruction from the dream. The well-known case of Pharaoh's dream of lean and fat kine which enabled Joseph as interpreter to foresee and provide against a famine represents a class of dream not at all uncommon. But the utilitarian view is only one of many.

Dreams show conclusively that although the body and brain are asleep—for sleep begins primarily in the brain and is governed by it—there is still active a recollector and perceiver who watches the introspective experience of dreaming. Sorrow, joy, fear, anger, ambition, love, hate, and all possible emotions are felt and perceived in dreams. The utility of this on the waking plane has nothing to do with the fact of perception. Time all is measured therein, not according to solar division but in respect to the effect produced upon the dreamer. And as the counting of this time is done at a vastly quicker rate than is possible for the brain, it follows that some person is counting. In all these dreams there is a recollection of the events perceived, and the memory of it is carried into the waking state. Reason and all the powers of intelligent waking man are used in dreams; and as emotion, reasoning, perception, and memory are all found to be even more active in dreams than in waking life, it must follow that the Hidden Self is the one who has and does all this.

The fanciful portion of dreams does not invalidate the position. Fancy is not peculiar to dreaming; it is also present in waking consciousness. In many people fancy is quite as usual and vivid as with any dreamer. And we know that children have a strong development of fancy. Its presence in dream simply means that the thinker, being liberated temporarily from the body and the set forms or grooves of the brain, expands that ordinary faculty. But passing beyond fancy we have the fact that dreams have prophecy of events not yet come. This could not be unless there exists the inner Hidden Self who sees plainly the future and the past in an ever present.

IN CLAIRVOYANCE.

Waking clairvoyance cannot now be denied. Students of Theosophy know it to be a faculty of man, and in America its prevalence is such as to call for no great proof. There is the clairvoyance of events past, of those to come, and of those taking place.

To perceive events that have taken place in which the clairvoyant had no part nor was informed about, means that some other instrument than the brain is used. This must be the Hidden Self. Seeing and reporting events that subsequently transpire gives the same conclusion. If the brain is the mind, it must have had a part in a past event which it now reports, either as actor or as hearer from another who was present, but as in the cases cited it had no such connection as actor, then it follows that it has received the report from some other perceiver. This other one is the Hidden Self, because the true clairvoyant case excludes any report by an eye-witness.

Then again, when the clairvoyant is dealing with an event presently proceeding at a distance, it is necessary that a perceiver who recollects must be present in order to make report. For the brain and its organs of sight and hearing are too far off. But as the clairvoyant does report correctly what is going on, it is the other Hidden Self who sees the event, bridges the gap between it and the brain, and impresses the picture upon the bodily organs.

THE FEELING OF IDENTITY.

If recollection is the basis for the feeling of identity continuous throughout life, and if brain is the only instrument for perception, then there is an inexplicable series of gaps to be accounted for or bridged over, but admitting the Hidden Self no gaps exist.

We are born feeling that we are ourself, without a name, but using a name for convenience later on. We reply to challenge by saying "It is I"—the name following only for convenience to the other person. This personal identity remains although we fall asleep each night and thus far become unconscious. And we know that even when a long period is blotted out of memory by fall, blow, or other accidental injury, the same feeling of identity crosses that gap and continues the same identical "I" to where memory again acts. And although years of life with all their multiplicity of events and experience have passed, leaving but a small amount of recollection, we yet know ourselves as that unnamed person who came to life so many years before. We do not remember our birth nor our naming, and if we are but a bundle of material experience, a mere product of brain and recollection, then we should have no identity but constant confusion. The contrary being the case, and continuous personal identity being felt and perceived, the inevitable conclusion is that we are the Hidden Self and that Self is above and beyond both body and brain

FACES OF FRIENDS.

E. AUG. NERESHEIMER is at present the Treasurer of the Board of Trustees of the Aryan T.S. of New York. He is a Bavarian of Catholic parents, and was born in Moosburg near Munich, January 2, 1847. At Munich he graduated from a business college, and then learned the silversmith's and jewelry trades in Switzerland, Augsburg, and Berlin. At present he is an importer of diamonds and precious stones in New York.

In 1868 he went to Australia, leaving there in 1870 for California. Two years after reaching California, in 1872, he came to New York and has been there in business ever since, taking trips to Europe very often.

In 1886 Mr. Neresheimer heard of Theosophy from reading Esoteric Buddhism which a friend had loaned him, and was particularly struck with the information about Adepts. A foundation for this belief had been laid by nursery tales about great and wonderful beings in India. He had always held theories of his own about the doctrine of correspondences and of the interrelations of the ideal cosmos with the visible universe. A study of Kant, Hegel, and Schopenhauer was made by him to obtain a mental anchorage, but not successfully. The Theosophical theory came like a key and a revelation, something like a formerly known and lost philosophy. The immediate link with the Theosophical Society began through an abusive article in a daily paper in which were given the name and address of the Secretary in New York, on whom he at once called, and then joined the T.S. in January, 1889.

Subsequently he called on H.P.B. in London and had some conversation with her at her rooms in Lansdowne Road, but cannot claim any greater acquaintance with her. He has served on the Executive Committee of the American Section, and from his intimate acquaintance with its work and with that of its General Secretary is qualified to know what this Section is and upon what the growth of Theosophy in the United States depends. Though not a speaker or writer of facility, he is one of those strong men who give a force to those with whom they work. His face does not appear here by his own wish, but because those who know of the great assistance rendered to the work of the Society not only in wise counsel but in many another field desire that readers should see the countenance of a strong friend, a good adviser, a liberal helper, one who is not easy to find in a walk of many days.

HOW TO STUDY THE "SECRET DOCTRINE".

IF, as has been claimed, the three fundamental propositions constitute a key to the study of the Secret Doctrine, the student should endeavor to apply these not merely to the philosophy as a whole, but to each and every department and special topic and to the linking of these together. Only by so doing can the true relations between the latter be found, and the place and importance of each in respect to the whole. It must therefore be borne in mind that these propositions apply to the whole manifested Cosmos, to Universes, worlds, and men, to all planes of the Cosmos as well as to all kingdoms of Nature; that back of all manifestation is the One Reality, one common Source; that guiding all manifestation is one Universal Law; and that the working of this one Law and the line of evolution are fundamentally the same in all cases.

A study of the great systems of ancient philosophy would show that underlying each are these same propositions, or some phases of them which, although differently expressed, embody the same fundamental ideas. In some instances these have been put into the form of aphorisms, which to a great extent are the keynotes of the systems in which they are so expressed. Such, for instance, are the following: "As above, so below", from the Hermetic school of philosophy; "Man is the Microcosm of the Macrocosm", from the ancient Hindu philosophy; both of these aphorisms are expressions of what is known as the "Law of Correspondences" which was used by all the great Hindû philosophers and to a greater or less degree by more modern writers, e.g., some of the early Church Fathers, and by Bœhme, Swedenborg, and others. It will easily be seen that these aphorisms are dependent upon the fundamental propositions of the Secret Doctrine, and in a measure contain or imply the latter. Then there is the Cabalistic saying, "A stone becomes a plant; a plant, a beast; a beast, a man; and man, a god". This particular statement is, however, only a partial statement of the third proposition; it is only a partial statement of evolution. It goes further than the modern scientific statement of evolution in that it does not stop at man, but it makes no statement of the stages of evolution preceding the mineral; it only begins at the lowest point of the cycle of evolution, omitting the elemental kingdoms on the downward arc. The above statements and many others are constantly referred to in the Secret Doctrine, and by presenting these fundamentals in different aspects the student who learns to connect them together is better enabled to comprehend the methods and working of Nature and also that to us most vital problem—man's place in Nature. Furthermore, these various statements furnish an additional argument for the Wisdom Religion's being the fountain of Truth from which all streams of Truth have sprung.

It is necessary, then, to examine these aphorisms and to include them as part of the key of which we are in search. In a letter from a Master to Mr. A. P. Sinnett advice is given to the student to hold to the doctrine of analogy and correspondences.<sup>1</sup>

Everything follows analogy. "As above, so below." Man is the Microcosm of the Universe. That which takes place on the spiritual plane repeats itself on the Cosmic plane. Concretion follows the lines of abstraction; corresponding to the highest must be the lowest; the material to the spiritual.<sup>2</sup> miniature of the Universe, we can well understand the value of the injunction given by the Delphi Oracle, "Know Thyself!", and the student of the Secret Doctrine cannot fail to notice the frequent application therein of knowledge about man to the elucidation of the mysteries of the Cosmos. In the same way knowledge of Nature as a whole gives us a knowledge of Nature's miniature, man. The study of man and the study of Nature must be pursued together, hand in hand; if we would understand one we must understand both, each one in relation to the other.

Not only is man the Microcosm of the Macrocosm, but each molecule, each atom, as well as each world and each system of worlds, mirrors the whole Universe; and each individual monad, each spark of the Universal Over-Soul, whether informing a world, a man, or an atom, is a mirror of the Universal Over-Soul.

"Lift thy head, O Lanoo; dost thou see one or countless lights burning in the dark midnight sky?"

"I sense one Flame, oh Gurudeva, I see countless undetached sparks shining in it."

"Thou sayest well. And now look around and into thyself. That light which burns inside thee, dost thou feel it different in anywise from the light that shines in thy Brother-men?"

"It is in no way different, though the prisoner is held in bondage by Karma, and though its outer garments delude the ignorant into saying 'Thy Soul and my Soul'."

The radical unity of the ultimate essence of each constituent part of compounds in Nature—from Star to mineral Atom, from the highest Dhyan Chohan to the smallest infusoria, in the fullest acceptation of the term, and whether applied to the spiritual, intellectual, or physical worlds—this is the one fundamental law in Occult Science. <sup>1</sup>

This fundamental law in Occult Science is the basis of the "Law of Correspondences", which in so many cases has been hit upon by Mystics and used by them intuitionally and, very often it would seem, fancifully. And being acquired merely intuitionally, and no basis or foundation being given, this law has come to be regarded by many as a mere empiricism. All through the Secret Doctrine this law is held to, and it is illustrated to such an extent that it rests with the student himself to test whether it be a law or not. Let the student "hold to the doctrine of analogy and correspondences. The Law of Correspondences does not merely hold on one and the same plane, as, for instance, in the case of man and Nature, the physical external man corresponds to physical external Nature, the astral man to the astral side of Nature, etc., but there is also a correspondence between different planes, and action and reaction from plane to plane. Manifestation takes place on four planes, which are phenomenal and rupic (rupa=form), while above these are three arupa or formless planes, where form ceases to exist and which cannot become objective to us. The three higher planes are noumenal and subjective, the four lower are phenomenal, and are, or may be, objective to us. The seven planes represent the seven states of Cosmic consciousness, the three higher planes being inaccessible to human intellect as developed at present". "These seven planes correspond to the seven states of consciousness in man." All ultimate causes originate on the higher planes, and pass from plane to plane to the lowest which is the plane of ultimate effects, whence there may again be reaction on the higher planes. That which may appear as an effect on any plane, due to a cause on a higher plane, may itself act as a cause in reference to a still lower plane. In this way there is correspondence from plane to plane, and in this way all manifestation proceeds, from plane to plane; from within, without. And although very few who can see into the astral and psychic planes of Nature can connect these with the physical plane, or rise to the purely spiritual, yet no links are missing between them, and it is only by a comprehension of the Law of Correspondences that it is possible to connect them together. The varied aspects of Nature, the many phases of development which we see in all the kingdoms of Nature and which exist on all the phenomenal planes; the hierarchies of beings—gods, men, elementals—which represent the stages of the development of the soul, are all links in the endless chain of manifestation. Destroy one link and the chain would be destroyed; but granting continuity, granting the law of cause and effect—Karma, it follows that the Law of Correspondences must also hold good, and we shall be wise if we follow the advice of the Master and hold to it as a guide in our studies.

THEOSOPHICAL CORRESPONDENCE CLASS.

WORK OF THE CLASS.

A PAPER of general notes and comments on the questions and answers has been sent out to all members. Extracts from that paper are given below. The membership has risen to 300, and includes some Indian Section members. The work has done a great deal of good.

QUESTION PAPER No. I.

QUESTION 1. Very well answered in general. The answers varied very much. Very few had a clear idea of what happens at death in regard to the physical body and Prana. When the Linga Sarira and higher principles leave the body, the "lives" which are controlled by the synthesizing power of the Ego during life begin to run riot, and Prana instead of acting in the body as a whole acts in the separate molecules, and thus causes disintegration. Disintegration being effected, Prana rebecomes Jiva.

(c) Man differs from the animals in the possession of Manas, not in the possession of the Triad, for Atma-Buddhi, the Monadic essence, is Universal and therefore in all kingdoms. There is, however, a difference between men and animals in respect to Atma-Buddhi, and that is, that man has a possibility in regard to these principles not possessed by the other kingdoms; he has the power to consciously rise to their plane. Besides Atma-Buddhi, the monadic essence, the principles which are common to all kingdoms are the four lower, viz., Sthula Sarira, Linga Sarira, Prana, and Kama. Kama was omitted in most of the answers, but it is present even in the mineral kingdom, being manifested as chemical affinity. The distinction between the lower kingdoms, then, is not one of principles but rather of activity of the principles. It is understood that all the principles are in all kingdoms in a latent form, but in man Manas is added as active instead of latent. The activity of Prana constitutes the distinction between the vegetable and mineral kingdoms; Kama in addition becomes active in the animal kingdom, though, as said above, existing on all planes. As we rise from one kingdom to another there is a gradual unfolding of consciousness until in man self-consciousness is attained, this being the function of Manas.

QUESTION 3. Many did not state the objects in full. The greatest omission was in the second object, by omitting the words "and to demonstrate the importance of such study", inasmuch as the study of those religions and philosophies is more important than the religions and philosophies in themselves; for such study reveals truth by presenting its many aspects as seen by different races.

Students should learn these objects word for word and also have a good definition of Theosophy, so that they may be able to give accurate information to enquirers and remove misconceptions.

It is interesting to compare the three objects of the T.S. with the three divisions under the heading of "The Higher Life" of the Buddhists. These are:

1. By an unremitting life of active altruism to realize the idea of non-separateness.
2. To substitute a life of study and analysis for all ceremonialism and exoteric worship.
3. To develop the psychic powers latent in man and get knowledge of the existence of subjective potent forces in Nature.

QUESTION PAPER No. II.

QUESTION I. (a) Most of the answers to this question were incomplete, many consisting of little more than the simple statement that the seven-fold division is better than the three-fold because it enables us to analyse man's nature more fully. While this is true and is one of the main reasons for the adoption of the seven-fold division, yet as it stands it is only a statement, and we should know what is its basis. It must not be concluded, however, that the three-fold division is an incorrect one, for it can be made to include the whole man; it is simply too general. In this division of body, soul, and spirit, there is no place for hypnotic and spiritualistic phenomena; for, strictly speaking, these have to do in most cases neither with the physical body nor with the soul, and furthermore no full explanation is afforded of after-death states.

To be accurate, the body is only the physical outer covering through which man comes into contact with external nature, and since spirit is Universal, this therefore leaves only soul to represent man in his different aspects and varying functions on all the intermediate planes, astral, psychic, and manasic, and to include all the phenomena of thought, will, desire, and sensation. Hence, leaving out the body, there is only one word to represent both the permanent and the impermanent parts of man's nature, and hence again a confusion arises between the illusory and the real, so that there is no true knowledge of what part of our nature should be cultivated and what part repressed. It is here that the advantage of the seven-fold division is apparent, for it enables us to give to sensation and desire their true places and to recognize to what extent they are necessary. It therefore enables us to know what man truly is and what is necessary for his highest development. Moreover, the seven-fold division shows man's relation to the other kingdoms of Nature and to the whole Universe. It is only by a consideration of this division that the facts of evolution can be accounted for, and only in this way is it possible to fully understand the distinctions existing between the different kingdoms of Nature. The seven-fold division allows for the progression from plane to plane, and links man to the whole of Nature.

(c) Some of the answers were very good, but by many the real idea of the question was not grasped. These stated that the metaphysical basis was the Absolute, or Parabrahm. While of course this is the One Reality that underlies everything, yet from such a statement we are no nearer understanding the Cosmos than we were before. The references given on the question paper to the Secret Doctrine, Vol. I, pp. 269-299, show that the word metaphysical was used in its strict meaning, and a study of the word and its use would be profitable to all. The word Metaphysics is derived from the Greek meta—after, and physis—physics, from physis—nature. It is said that Metaphysics was the name given by Aristotle and his followers to the science of mind and intelligence. According to them, the science of natural bodies, or physics, came first in the order of studies and the science of mind came after this; and therefore the latter was called Metaphysics because it came after physics. Metaphysics applies to all inquiries seeking to discover the "first principles" of the constitution of existing things and particularly of our own nature. In this is included the nature of being and the attributes belonging to it as such, and therefore the metaphysical basis and constitution of the Universe is found in the noumena and the underlying causes of external nature, and in their relationship one to the other. In the metaphysics of the Esoteric Philosophy, Thought itself is considered a reality. Back of all manifestation is Idea. The whole manifested Universe is the expression of Thought. "Everything that is, was, and will be, eternally IS, even the countless forms which are finite and perishable only in their objective, not in their ideal, form. They existed as Ideas in the Eternity, and, when they pass away, will exist as reflections". The Universe is worked and guided from within outwards. The phenomenal is transitory, impermanent, and therefore illusory; the noumenal is the permanent, and therefore the real. (Secret Doctrine, Vol. I, p. 282.)

QUESTION 2. (a) Since Manas is the distinctive principle of Man, "lower man" must mean "lower Manas" in connection with the "lower nature" which, generally speaking, consists of those parts of our nature which are dissipated after death and which cannot be retained by the Ego. These are the instruments or vehicles through which the lower man acts and by means of which he comes into contact with external nature. More particularly the lower nature is Kama and the Astral body, for the physical body may be omitted since it neither feels nor acts of itself. The seats of sensation are in the Astral body; the physical is merely an instrument; to a great extent it is the result of Kama and is formed upon the model of the Astral.

(b) Kama is the middle principle in the septenary classification, and in conjunction with Lower Manas, or Kama-Manas, is the dominant principle in the humanity of to-day as a whole. Kama-Manas may be said to be the man as we know him, the personal man who stands at the middle point of the ladder of evolution, attracted upwards by his Higher Ego and pulled downwards by his lower nature. It is only through and by means of Kama that Lower Manas can act, hence the importance of an understanding of this principle. In the animal kingdom Kama is the highest active principle, acting normally and naturally according to law; but in man it may become perverted, since in him to desire is added reason. Kama-Manas gives man power to become a god or a devil, or worse than a beast. It is only when Manas is developed, giving the power to reason, analyze, and choose, that the normal line of nature's evolution can be departed from, and that it is possible to work, as it were, contrary to Nature when that is considered mindless. Hence if Kama is allowed to rule in Man, his evolution is retarded; it is only by dominating and ruling Kama that he can rise spiritually, but if he does not awaken in himself the desire for spiritual things, he will be dragged downwards.

(c) The three qualities of nature were well described in general, but their relation to higher and lower man was not clearly given in the majority of answers. Of course this relation may be looked at from different points of view, and hence it would change accordingly, but the key-note seems to be given in Chapter XIV of the Bhagavad-Gita. It is the three qualities that bring back the soul to rebirth; the Sattva, through attachment to knowledge and that which is pleasant; the Rajas, through the consequences produced from action; the Tamas, through heedless folly, sleep, and idleness. "And when the embodied self surpasseth these three qualities of goodness, action, and indifference, which are coëxistent with the body, it is released from rebirth and death, old age and pain, and drinketh of the water of immortality." If we inquire which of the human principles it is that binds man to rebirth, we find it is Kama swaying Manas, and we may see a direct correspondence between the three qualities and the relations existing between Kama and Manas; Rajas will correspond to the principle Kama considered generally as the basis of all action; Sattva will correspond to Kama dominated and ruled by Manas; and Tamas to Kama when Manas is its slave, debased and degraded. The other references in the Bhagavad-Gita to the three qualities also support this view. It is Kama that connects the Ego or real man with the lower principles and with earthly life and nature. Kama and the three qualities are the link between Man and Nature. In the ordinary man now one, now another, of the qualities is uppermost; in the majority the Rajas quality prevails, but by a right use of this quality the Sattva may be reached. By constant effort we may acquire more and more of the Sattva quality of light and truth until it is the main-spring in our lives, and from this we may pass to the mastery of all the qualities and so escape rebirth.

QUESTION 3. (a) (b) (c) The only point that it is necessary to refer to here is in regard to the sequence of, and relations between, the objects of the T.S.

The first has to do with right conduct, with ethics, and is for all; it is the one object that has to be subscribed to by all members and that all should endeavor to carry out. It has to do with our everyday life in the world, and should enter into all our relations with others.

The second and third objects, however, cannot be followed by everyone. Not everyone can take up the study of philosophy or of the deeper science of Man and Nature. Universal Brotherhood is a fact in and a law of Nature, and it is man's blindness to this that causes all the suffering and misery in the world. The origin, spiritual and physical, of the whole of humanity and of Nature is One, their destiny is also One. There is abundance of evidence from all sides to show that "no man liveth unto himself", and it should be our aim as members of the T.S. to make ourselves acquainted with this evidence, and in this way fit ourselves to help on the movement. A pursuit of the second object supplies another argument for the Brotherhood of Man. From it we discover the identity of source of all the great world-religions, and are led to an acknowledgment of the fountain-head of all, the Wisdom-Religion. Furthermore it supplies that element in the life of man which Western thought has failed to give, viz., a knowledge of the Soul and of the possibilities of consciousness on the inner, spiritual planes.

The first object teaches right living based on the fundamental relation of man to man; the second leads us to right thinking, it gives us a knowledge of ourselves; the third is the application of that knowledge to the hidden side of nature and the inner life of man; it is the preliminary step in occultism. The first and second objects are rightly preliminary to the third; before the student can safely take up the third object, he must first learn unselfishness, the living for others, the practical side of Universal Brotherhood; he must acquire charity of thought, impartiality, and freedom from bias, and be able to recognize Truth in whatever garb it may be presented; then he can rightly turn to Nature and seek to know her secrets and those of his own inner being.

The relation between Theosophy and Occultism was not clearly given in some instances. Properly speaking, Theosophy in its fullest sense includes Occultism, for it is the Wisdom-Religion and must include all knowledge; but as generally understood Theosophy is the presentation of Truth about Man and Nature; Occultism is the science of the hidden forces in Man and Nature and the development of latent powers. Theosophy is a collection of Truths, it is the statement of Truth, but if a student would verify this statement he must become an Occultist; real proof can be obtained in no other way.

LITERARY NOTES.

JUNE THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XXVII" with great vividness describes H. P. B.'s home life in the "Lamasery", the furniture of the rooms, various visitors and incidents, and several phenomena. It is a delightful number. Perhaps her use of the initials "H. P. B." had an even deeper significance than the one here suggested. "The Footsteps" is a well-told Occult story, possibly paralleled by more private experiences than the world yet wots of. Sometimes, but rarely, trash as worthless as "The Harp and Stream of Life; an Allegory" gets into print. Karma-Nemesis repays editors too tender-hearted for one stern "No" by avalanches of further rubbish, and one can foresee what is in store for Adyar from "Veroda". "The Panchamukhi" is most curious and interesting, and such a relic should be given safety in a museum. In "The Tree; a Book of Precepts" the editorial tenderness is again displayed, and again mistakingly.—[A. F.]

JUNE LUCIFER. Mr. E. T. Sturdy's "The Religious Systems of India" gives large information in pleasing style, making abundantly plain the distinctions between sacred books, schools, etc., but it perhaps identifies Buddhism too much with the Southern form of it. Is Patanjali's system really Hatha Yoga, as said on page 282? S. Stuart's "Occult Indications in Ancient Astronomy" exhibits a learning which does honor to the T. S. Fourteen pages of Éliphas Lévi seem a generous allowance, and Letter 63, which defends the temporal power of the Pope and his vicegerency, does look a little out of date. Worse yet are the prophecies about Italy on the next page. Still, they who wax sceptical as to Lévi's statesmanship must at least bow before Letter 48 with this impressive opening: "We approach the sublime and mysterious ternary. We enter into the arcana of the letter ghimel". Lucifer's feet, beyond the bandaged part, now leave a trail which may be traced far off in the empyrean.—[A. F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VII, No. 5. Mr. Herbert A. W. Coryn, whose "Hour in Borderland Occultism" put him at once in the very front rank of Theosophical writers, contributes "Theosophy and the Alcohol Question". Its basis is an abundant medical knowledge of the action of alcohol upon the various cells of the body, and from this is delineated the more serious effect upon the whole nature of a man as Occultism regards him. It is, of course, an able paper, but it would be still more valuable if pointing out the distinction between distilled and fermented drinks in operation, and how far Occultism tolerates the latter. The other paper is upon "The World we Live in", by R. Machell. The title is good, and so are parts of the contents, particularly the first two pages, but the thought is wandering and indefinite, lacking point, and the style needs finish. Re-written and polished under competent guidance, it would be excellent.—[A. F.]

TRANSACTIONS OF THE LONDON LODGE T. S., No. 21, is on "Vehicles of Consciousness" by W. Scott Elliot. Barring that it uses the term "Higher Self" in a sense which H. P. B. desired (Key, page 176) should be given to "Spiritual Ego", and that there is implication (page 10, line 25) that the dead remain on the astral plane till their next incarnation—though the actual fact is stated later on, this is a singularly clear and full discussion, with most ample analysis and careful discrimination and qualification. A terminal Note claims that the contents are based on information received from "those who can at will consciously function on both the Astral and Devachanic planes", "checked and verified by others who have developed and are developing similar faculties". The former class must be of Masters, since none others can so function, and this might seem to forestall criticism, but of course publication brings any work within the jurisdiction of reviewers and empowers them to act as such. Fortunately the pamphlet is so interesting and instructive, and in the main so good, that only the most exacting of the craft need fear the warning.—[A.F.]

THE NEW THEOLOGY, by Richard Harte, must be admitted very greatly inferior to Lay Religion. It has less merit, and its demerits are far more pronounced. Any avowedly critical work is truly effective as it is scrupulously impartial: this it is which makes Lecky's indictments so crushing. But in The New Theology Mr. Harte has allowed a partizan bitterness to become fanatical, and never even partially veils his fierce contempt for the suppositions that God is anything more than a theological chimera, that a clergyman can ever have been other than a selfish impostor, and that religion has a reality beyond old-wives' fables or emotional gush. A treatment of the loftiest interests and cravings of the human soul, reverence, devotion, prayer, communion of spirit, as if absurdities or humbugs, to be kicked aside with flippant jeer or angry exposure, shows essential incapacity for the delicate and respectful work of a religious reformer. A new Theology must be something more than abuse of old Theology; and can there be any Theology—Science of God—at all, when "God" is a term derided and spurned? Nor would its priests differ from their predecessors, if scornful anathemas constituted their preaching. Letter VII is very fine, a really noble instance of clear, concise, progressive, logical upbuilding, much the ablest part of the book, even though one cannot conceive how a Mahâtma may be made up of "component entities" such as ourselves (page 185), or how "when the conception of a Living Universe is reached, Science will become Theology and Life will become Religion" (page 195), since there is to be no "Theos" and consequently no "binding back" to Him. The argumentation through the book is variable; sometimes weak, as on page 231, sometimes strong, as on page 233. There are some telling illustrations, pithy phrases, and nice distinctions. "Monolatry", however, is used (page 31) as if it connoted more than mere "worship of one", whereas it does not. Mr. Harte's great powers, like those of other sectarian writers, will always be cramped until freed by his sympathetic identification with the modern spirit of Liberal Thought. A thinker may be a Pantheist, possibly not without sacrifice of logic, but certainly without sacrifice of tolerance; and his historical sense will assuredly be more evidenced if he perceives the incongruity of XIXth century polemics carried on with the acerbities of St. Jerome and with the conscious infallibility of a Church Council. Extremes always meet; and it is natural that he who cannot conceive of God, religion, or prayer, and he who cannot conceive of sincerity without them, should vie in mutual misrepresentations and denunciation. How Theosophy cools such disputants! And how delightful it would be if Mr. Harte and the editor of Church Bells should hear of Theosophy and embrace it! (Orderable through PATH, $1.00)—[A.F.]

THE BOOK OF THE DEAD, of the Egyptian Funeral Ritual is now being published in a new translation in English. Hitherto this work has been so expensive as to prohibit purchase except by the very wealthy, and the English translations were marked for their inaccuracies. Now, however, a new translation has been made by Dr. Charles H. S. Davis, and is in press. It will be the most complete edition of the Book of the Dead ever published, and will contain a preface, chapters on the Religious Beliefs of Primitive Peoples, the Egyptian Pantheon, Animal Worship in Ancient Egypt, the Mythology of Ancient Egypt, an Introduction to the Book of the Dead, photo-reproductions in fac-simile of the seventy-nine plates of the Great Turin Papyrus, giving the 165 chapters complete, and the twenty plates of the Louvre Papyrus, and a translation of the Book of the Dead with notes. The work will be published in one large quarto volume, size 9 by 11 inches, bound in cloth. The price will be $5.00, and orders should be sent to HARRY STEELE BUDD, 144 Madison Avenue, New York City. Mr. Budd is the accredited agent, for the publishers, in the Theosophical Society. Prospectus sent on application. (Adv't.)

Mirror of the Movement.

ATMA T.S. of New Haven, Conn., holds meetings every Monday evening at the home of its President, 286 Dixwell avenue. On July 9th, A. Welles. Wadhame of Aryan T.S. lectured at the residence of Mr. L. H. Herz upon "The Coming of the Serpent". Attendance was fair and a lively discussion followed. The library is gradually increasing through gifts and purchase, Isis Unveiled and the Secret Doctrine being the latest additions.

BURCHAM HARDING during the past month has been occupied at the Headquarters, New York, and has assisted in forming a class which meets weekly in the large hall. In the Fall it is proposed to lecture and form centers in the towns in the vicinity of New York. For these centres, "missionaries" will be required until they are self-sustaining. This new class is for mutual training, to acquire readiness in speaking and replying concisely and clearly to the usual preliminary questions. The subjects of the Correspondence Class are the basis for study, but other questions are allowed, each member speaking in turn. Several branches have adopted the subjects of the Correspondence Class for their weekly meetings, finding much profit from the well-defined course they afford. We should like to see every branch devote a night weekly to this study, as it is of the greatest assistance to individual members. Particulars can be had by writing Sec'y Correspondence Class, 144 Madison Ave., New York.

THE APRIL CONVENTION inadvertently passed over the Constitutional provision that three members of the Executive Committee should be selected from the city and vicinity of the General Secretary, and Mr. Alpheus M. Smith of Chicago has generously retired in order to make compliance possible. The Committee filled the vacancy by appointing Mr. William Main of Brooklyn. As now constituted, the Committee consists of two members from New York, one from Brooklyn, and one each from the Eastern States, the Central States, and the Pacific Coast, together with the General Secretary.

ARYAN T.S. AND BROOKLYN T.S. have decided to forego Sunday evening lectures in July and August, though maintaining weekly meeting. Lectures will be continued in the Harlem Branch.

AMRITA T.S., Lincoln, Neb., has a Bhagavad Gita class which meets at the house of the President, and a class for Theosophical study at the house of Mrs. Gerner.

BY SPECIAL ORDER OF APRIL CONVENTION the General Secretary was directed to print in one pamphlet the respective Constitutions of the Theosophical Society and of the American Section T.S., and to send a copy with each diploma hereafter issued. Provision was also made that any Branch of the American Section in good standing should receive a copy upon forwarding to the General Secretary a stamp for its mailing. The pamphlet is now printed and will be thus issued. It will be mailed to anyone, postpaid, for 10 cents.

OBITUARY. Mr. Edmund B. Sears, for seven years a member of the Chicago T.S., died June 29th, aged 49. An honorable and kindly man, of musical culture and scientific tastes, he deeply valued the teachings of Theosophy, and endeavored to both exemplify and dispense them.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

THE COUNTESS WACHTMEISTER reached Portland on June 10th and lectured that evening before the Willamette Branch on "Reminiscences of Mme. Blavatsky". On the 11th she lectured at the Headquarters upon "Theosophy", on the 12th upon "Magnetism and Hypnotism", on the 13th upon "India". Each evening the room was filled to overflowing, people standing. On each afternoon and evening the Countess received visitors at the Headquarters and conversed with them. The Portland people were captivated by her honest sincerity and her clear presentation of doctrine. On the 15th she lectured to a crowded audience in Victoria, B.C., upon "Karma and Reincarnation", answering questions afterwards. On the 16th she met inquirers and in the evening addressed the Branch. June 20th the Countess visited Boise City, Idaho Ter., and gave a lecture in the house of Mrs. E. E. Athey. On the 30th she reached Salt Lake City, and that evening addressed the Norman Ladies' Literary Club, thirty or forty members being present. On July 1st she addressed the Salt Lake Branch on "Magnetism and Hypnotism", and lectured that evening in Odd Fellows' Hall on "Theosophy". On the 2nd she lectured upon "H. P. Blavatsky and the Masters", attending a reception in the afternoon and meeting some fifty ladies, replying to questions. Through the rest of the week she received numerous calls, and on the 7th, at the request of some Mormon friends, lectured in the Assembly Hall upon "India". On the morning of the 8th about forty were present at the Branch meeting, and the hour was devoted to questions and answers. That evening she lectured upon "Magnetism and Hypnotism", extending her former remarks. At each lecture about three hundred people were present. On her way to Denver the Countess stopped at Colorado Springs, Colo., and formed a Branch of eight members. She reached Denver on July 13th, her arrival having been delayed by the strike riots. Three lectures were given at the Unitarian Church, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday evenings, all well advertised and well attended. Copious reports of interviews and lectures were given by the press, and she received a constant stream of visitors. Six persons joined the Branch at once. The Countess arrived in Kansas City on the 18th, had a Branch meeting that evening, and talked to editors. On the 22nd she went to Lincoln, Neb.

DR. GRIFFITHS lectured in Pomona, Calif., June 23rd, and so many were interested that two informal meetings were held the next day in private houses, each being well attended. Pomona is called a "Church Town", as it has a population of five thousand and supports eighteen churches and twenty-two congregations. Arrangements are now being made by interested residents to have the lecturer return and hold a second meeting. Lectures were given in Redlands and Colton on the 28th and 30th. On the 29th two lectures were given at Riverside, where is the new Branch. On the 1st and 3d of July Dr. Griffiths attended Branch meetings, and informal quiz meetings were held. The Keshava Branch is doing good work and bids fair to become one of the active Branches of the Coast. At Ontario arrangements had been made for a visit and lecture, Drs. Fargo and Bumstead having taken the matter in hand. Because of the railroad paralysis through strikes, two Keshava members drove Dr. Griffiths to Ontario on the 6th, where, although the night was sweltering hot and the lecture nearly two hours long, the attendance was so large that many were standing, and all remained to the end. The next evening a well attended quiz class was held. The Branch at Riverside promises to maintain the work thus begun at Ontario, and hopes to form a Branch there later on.

AUSTRALASIA.

AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND, enjoyed in May a paper by Mr. Swinnerton upon "Cremation" and by Mr. Hughes upon "The Mystery of Matter", and a lecture by Mrs. Draffin upon "Man, Know Thyself; or the God Within". Lectures have been given by Miss Edger, and undenominational services by Rev. S. J. Neill who was lately deposed by the Presbyterians.

SUPPORT OF THE T.S.

In April PATH I stated my intention to celebrate the anniversary of the fund by publishing the total receipts from each pledger to date. Owing to the amount of space occupied by Convention Proceedings, and particularly the making of arrangements for the accommodation of a still larger amount if found desirable, it was found impossible to do this. It is possible that something of the kind may be done later. All persons interested and who have the right to know are at liberty to address either the General Secretary or myself at any time, asking any questions desired. Following is my report to date :

New subscriber in the ten-cents-per-month class : M.E.A. Total per year, $1.20.

New subscriber in the twenty-five-cents-per-month class : E.G.A. Per year, $3.00.

New subscriber in the fifty-cents-per-month class : J.H.M. Per year, $6.00.

New subscribers in the one-dollar-per-month class : Dâna T.S., J.W.C. Per year, $24.00.

Total value of fund previously reported, $878.85 ; Amount pledged by new subscribers, $34.20 ; Total per year, $913.05.

THE NEUTRALITY OF THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY.

AN INQUIRY INTO CERTAIN CHARGES AGAINST THE VICE-PRESIDENT, HELD AT LONDON, JULY, 1894.

MINUTES OF MEETING OF THE GENERAL COUNCIL THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, AT NO. 19 AVENUE ROAD, LONDON, JULY 7, 1894.

Present: President Col. H. S. Olcott, Bertram Keightley, George R. S. Mead, and William Q. Judge.

Col. Olcott called the meeting to order, and Bertram Keightley was appointed Secretary. Council was informed that the meeting was called to consider certain points brought up by William Q. Judge, and other matters, to-wit:

The President read a letter from William Q. Judge, stating that in his opinion he was never elected Vice-President of the T.S., and was not, therefore, Vice-President of the T.S., whereupon the President informed the Council that at the General Convention at Adyar, in 1888, he then, exercising the prerogatives which he then held, appointed William Q. Judge as Vice-President of the T.S., and the name was then announced in the official list of officers of that year. That subsequently, at the General Convention in 1890, the last one of such General Conventions, said nomination was unanimously confirmed by vote on motion of Bertram Keightley, supported by H. S. Olcott: hence that although the official report of the Convention seems to be defective in that it did not record the fact and that Mr. Judge was thereby misled, the truth is as stated. The President then declared that W. Q. Judge was and is Vice-President de facto and de jure of the Theosophical Society.

Upon hearing the President's statement the Council then unanimously confirmed the President's decision.

Another point then raised by Mr. Judge was then taken into consideration, to-wit: That even if Vice-President, he, Mr. Judge, was not amenable to an enquiry by the Judicial Committee into certain alleged offences with respect to the misuse of the Mahatmas' names and handwriting, since if guilty the offence would be one by him as a private individual, and not in his official capacity: he contended that, under our Constitution, the President and Vice-President could only be tried as such by said Committee for official misconduct—that is, misfeasances and malfeasances. An opinion of counsel in New York which he had taken from Mr. M. H. Phelps, F.T.S., was then read by him in support of this contention. The matter was then debated. Bertram Keightley moved, and G.R.S. Mead seconded:

That the Council, having heard the argument on the point raised by William Q. Judge, declares that the point is well-taken: that the acts alleged concern him as an individual, and that consequently the Judicial Committee has no jurisdiction in the premises to try him as Vice-President upon the charges as alleged.

The President concurred. Mr. Judge did not vote. The motion was declared carried.

On Mr. Mead's motion, it was then voted that above record shall be laid before the Judicial Committee. Mr. Judge did not vote.

The President then laid before the Council another question mooted by Mr. Judge, to-wit: That his election as successor to the President—which was made upon the announcement of the President's resignation—became ipso facto annulled upon the President's resumption of his office as President. On motion, the Council declared the point well taken, and ordered the decision to be entered on the Minutes. Mr. Judge did not vote.

The President called attention to the Resolution of the American Convention of 1894, declaring that his action in suspending the Vice-President, pending the settlement of the charges against him, was "without the slightest warrant in the Constitution and altogether transcends the discretionary power given the President by the Constitution, and is therefore null and void". Upon deliberation and consideration of Sections 3 and 4, Article VI, of the General Rules, the Council decided (Mr. Judge not voting) that the President's action was warranted under the then-existing circumstances, and that the said Resolutions of protest are without force.

On motion (Mr. Judge not voting) the Council then requested the President to convene the Judicial Committee at the London Headquarters on Tuesday, the 10th of July, 1894, at 10 a. m.

The Council then adjourned at call of President.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

CONVENED UNDER A PRESIDENTIAL ORDER OF 1894 TO INVESTIGATE AND DISPOSE OF CERTAIN CHARGES PREFERRED BY MRS. ANNIE BESANT, F. T. S., AGAINST MR. WILLIAM Q. JUDGE, VICE-PRESIDENT T.S.

OPENING ADDRESS AND OPINION OF THE PRESIDENT-FOUNDER.

Gentlemen and Brothers: We have met together to-day as a Judicial Committee, under the provisions of Section 3 of Article VI of the Revised Rules, to consider and dispose of certain charges of misconduct preferred by Mrs. Besant against the Vice-President of the Society, and dated 24th March, 1894.

Section 2 of Article VI says that "the President may be deprived of office at any time for cause shown, by a three-fourths vote of the Judicial Committee hereinafter provided for (in Section 3), before which he shall be given full opportunity to disprove any charges brought against him; Section 3 provides that the Judicial Committee shall be composed of (a) members of the General Council ex officio, (b) two additional members nominated by each Section of the Society, and (c) two members chosen by the accused. Under the present organization of the Society, this Committee will, therefore, comprise the President-Founder, the General Secretaries of the Indian and European Sections, two additional Delegates each from the Indian, European, and American Sections, and two nominees of Mr. Judge—eleven in all. The accused, of course, being debarred from sitting as a judge, either as General Secretary of the American Section or as Vice-President. Section 4 of Article VI declares that the same procedure shall apply, mutatis mutandis, to the cases of the Vice-President and President, thus making the former, as well as the latter, amenable to the jurisdiction of the Judicial Committee for offences charged against him. Under this clause the Vice-President is now arraigned.

In compliance with the Revised Rules, copies of the charges brought by the accuser have been duly supplied to the accused and the members of the General Council, and the Sections and the accused have nominated their Delegates respectively.

I also suspended the Vice-President from office, pending the disposal of the charges by this Committee. Upon the receipt of a preliminary letter from myself, of date February 7th, 1894, from Agra, India, Mr. Judge, erroneously taking it to be the first step in the official inquiry into the charges, from my omission to mark the letter "Private", naturally misconceived it to be a breach of the Constitution, and vehemently protested in a public circular addressed to "the members of the Theosophical Society", and of which five thousand copies were distributed to them, to all parts of the world. The name of the accuser not being mentioned, the wrong impression prevailed that I was the author of the charges, and at the same time intended to sit as chairman of the tribunal that was to investigate them. I regret this circumstance as having caused bad feeling throughout the Society against its Chief Executive, who has been the personal friend of the accused for many years, has ever appreciated as they deserved his eminent services and unflagging devotion to the whole movement, and whose constant motive has been to be brotherly and act justly to all his colleagues, of every race, religion, and sex.

Three very important protests have been made by the accused and submitted to me, to-wit :

First : That he was never legally Vice-President of the T.S. That an election to said office of Vice-President has always been necessary, and is so yet. That he has never been elected to the office. That the title has been conferred on him by courtesy, and has been tacitly assumed to be legal by himself and others, in ignorance of the facts of the case. The legitimate inference from which would be that, not being Vice-President de jure, he is not amenable to the jurisdiction of a Judicial Committee, which can only try the two highest officers of the Society.

Second : That, even if he were Vice-President, this tribunal could only try charges which imply on his part acts of misfeasance or malfeasance as such official, whereas the pending charges accuse him of acts which are not those of an official but of a simple member ; hence only triable by his own Branch or Lodge (vide Section 3 of Article XIII) at a special meeting called to consider the facts.

Third : That the principal charge against him cannot be tried without breach of the constitutional neutrality of the Society in matters of private belief as to religious and other questions, and especially as to belief in the "existence, names, powers, functions, or methods of 'Mahâtâmâs' or 'Masters' " ; that to deliberate and decide, either pro or con, in this matter would be to violate the law, affirm a dogma, and "offend the religious feelings" of Fellows of the Society who, to the number of many hundreds, hold decided opinions concerning the existence of Mahâtâmâs and their interest in our work.

These points will be presently considered seriatim.

At the recent (Eighth) annual meeting of the American Section T.S., at San Francisco, in the first session of April 22nd, the following, with other resolutions, was unanimously adopted, to wit :

Resolved : That this Convention, after careful deliberation, finds that [the] suspension of the Vice-President is without the slightest warrant in the Constitution, and altogether transcends the discretionary power given the President by the Constitution, and is therefore null and void.

I now return to Mr. Judge's protests.

1. As to his legal status as Vice-President. At the Adyar Convention of the whole Society, in December, 1888, exercising the full executive power that I then held, I appointed Mr. Judge Vice-President in open Convention, the choice was approved by the Delegates assembled, and the name inserted in the published Official List of Officers. since which time it has not been withdrawn. At the Convention of 1890, a new set of Rules having come into force and an election for Vice-President being in order, Mr. Bertram Keightley moved and I supported the nomination of Mr. Judge, and he was duly elected. It now appears that official notice was not sent him to this effect, but nevertheless his name was duly published in the Official List, as it had been previously. You all know that he attended the Chicago Parliament of Religions as Vice-President and my accredited representative and substitute : his name is so printed in his report of the Theosophical Congress, and the Official Report of the San Francisco Convention of our American Section contains the financial statement of the Theosophic Congress Fund, which is signed by him as Vice-President Theosophical Society. From the above facts it is evident that W. Q. Judge is, and since December, 1888, has continuously been, de jure as well as de facto, Vice-President of the Theosophical Society. The facts having been laid before the General Council in its session of the 7th inst., my ruling has been ratified, and is now also concurred in by Mr. Judge. He is, therefore, triable by this tribunal for "cause shown".

2. The second point raised by the accused is more important. If the acts alleged were done by him at all—which remains as yet sub judice—and he did them as a private person, he cannot be tried by any other tribunal than the Aryan Lodge T.S., of which he is a Fellow and the President. Nothing can possibly be clearer than that. Now, what are the alleged offences? That he practiced deception in sending false messages, orders, and letters as if sent and written by "Masters"; and in statements to me about a certain Rosicrucian jewel of H.P.B.'s. That he was untruthful in various other instances enumerated. Are these solely acts done in his private capacity, or may they either of them be laid against him as wrong-doing by the Vice-President? This is a grave question, both in its present bearings and as establishing a precedent for future contingencies. We must not make a mistake in coming to a decision. In summoning Mr. Judge before this tribunal, I was moved by the thought that the alleged evil acts might be separated into (a) strictly private acts, viz., the alleged untruthfulness and deception; and (b) the alleged circulation of deceptive imitations of what are supposed to be Mahâtmic writings, with intent to deceive; which communications, owing to his high official rank among us, carried a weight they would not have had if given out by a simple member. This seemed to me a far more heinous offence than simple falsehood or any other act of an individual, and to amount to a debasement of his office, if proven. The minutes of the General Council-meeting of July 7th, which will presently be read for your information, will show you how this question was discussed by us and what conclusion was reached. To make this document complete in itself, however, I will say that in the Council's opinion the point raised by Mr. Judge appeared valid, and that the charges are not cognizable by this Judicial Committee. The issue is now open to your consideration, and you must decide as to your judicial competency.

3. Does our proposed inquiry into the alleged circulation of fictitious writings of those known to us as "Mahâtmâs" carry with it a breach of the religious neutrality guaranteed us in the T.S. Constitution, and would a decision of the charge, in either way, hurt the feelings of members? The affirmative view has been taken and warmly advocated by the Convention of the American Section, by individual Branches and groups of "Theosophical Workers", by the General Secretaries of the European and Indian Sections in a recently-issued joint circular, by many private members of the Society, and by the accused. As I conceived it, the present issue is not at all whether Mahâtmâs exist or the contrary, or whether they have or have not recognizable handwritings, and have or have not authorized Mr. Judge to put forth documents in their name. I believed, when issuing the call, that the question might be discussed without entering into investigations that would compromise our corporate neutrality. The charges as formulated and laid before me by Mrs. Besant could in my opinion have been tried without doing this. And I must refer to my official record to prove that I would have been the last to help in violating a Constitution of which I am, it may be said, the father, and which I have continually defended at all times and in all circumstances. On now meeting Mr. Judge in London, however, and being made acquainted with his intended line of defence, I find that by beginning the inquiry we should be placed in this dilemma, viz., we should either have to deny him the common justice of listening to his statements and examining his proofs (which would be monstrous in even a common court of law—much more in a Brotherhood like ours, based on lines of ideal justice), or be plunged into the very abyss we wish to escape from. Mr. Judge's defense is that he is not guilty of the acts charged; that Mahâtmâs exist, are related to our Society and in personal contact with himself; and he avers his readiness to bring many witnesses and documentary proofs to support his statements. You will at once see whither this will lead us. The moment we entered into these questions we should violate the most vital spirit of our federal compact, its neutrality in matters of belief. Nobody, for example, knows better than myself the fact of the existence of the Masters; yet I would resign my office unhesitatingly if the Constitution were amended so as to erect such a belief into a dogma; every one in our membership is as free to disbelieve and deny their existence as I am to believe and affirm it. For the above reason, then,

I declare as my opinion that this inquiry must go no farther; we may not break our own laws for any consideration whatsoever. It is furthermore my opinion that such an inquiry, begun by whatsoever body within our membership, cannot proceed if a similar line of defense be declared. If, perchance, a guilty person should at any time go scot-free in consequence of this ruling, we cannot help it; the Constitution is our palladium, and we must make it the symbol of justice or expect our Society to disintegrate. Candor compels me to add that, despite what I thought some preliminary quibbling and unfair tactics, Mr. Judge has travelled hither from America to meet his accusers before this Committee, and announces his readiness to have the charges investigated and decided on their merits by any competent tribunal.

Having disposed of the several protests of Mr. Judge, I shall now briefly refer to the condemnatory Resolutions of the San Francisco Convention, and merely to say that there was no warrant for their hasty declaration that my suspension of the Vice-President, pending the disposal of the charges, was unconstitutional, null, and void. As above noted, Section 4 of Article VI of our Constitution provides that the same rules of procedure shall apply to the case of the Vice-President as to that of the President; and, inasmuch as my functions vest in the Vice-President and I am suspended from office until any charges against my official character are disposed of, so, likewise, must the Vice-President be suspended from his official status until the charges against him are disposed of; reinstatement to follow acquittal or the abandonment of the prosecution.

It having been made evident to me that Mr. Judge cannot be tried on the present accusations without breaking through the lines of our Constitution, I have no right to keep him further suspended, and so hereby cancel my notice of suspension, dated the 7th February, 1894, and restore him to the rank of Vice-President.

In conclusion, Gentlemen and Brothers, it remains for me to express my regret for any inconvenience I may have caused you by the convocation of this Judicial Committee, and to cordially thank Mr. Sturdy, who has come from India, Dr. J. D. Buck, who has come from Cincinnati, and the rest of you who have come from distant points in the United Kingdom, to render this loyal service. I had no means of anticipating this present issue, since the line of defence was not within my knowledge. The meeting was worth holding for several reasons. In the first place, because we have come to the point of an official declaration that it is not lawful to affirm that belief in Mahâtmas is a dogma of the Society, or communications really or presumably from them, authoritative and infallible. Equally clear is it that the circulation of fictitious communications from them is not an act for which, under our Rules, an officer or member can be impeached and tried. The inference, then, is that testimony as to intercourse with Mahâtmas, and writings alleged to come from them, must be judged upon their intrinsic merits alone; and that the witnesses are solely responsible for their statements. Thirdly, the successorship to the Presidency is again open (vide General Council Report of July 7, 1894) and at my death or at any time sooner liberty of choice may be exercised in favor of the best available member of the Society.

I now bring my remarks to a close by giving voice to the sentiment which I believe to actuate the true Theosophist, viz., that the same justice should be given and the same mercy shown to every man and woman on our membership registers. There must be no distinctions of persons, no paraded self-righteousness, no seeking for revenge. We are all—as I personally believe—equally under the operation of Karma, which punishes and rewards: all equally need the loving forbearance of those who have mounted higher than ourselves in the scale of human perfectibility.

SUBSTANCE OF MINUTES OF A JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE
THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY

HELD AT NO. 19 AVENUE ROAD, LONDON, ON THE 10TH OF JULY, 1894.

Present: Colonel Olcott, President-Founder, in the chair; the General Secretaries of the Indian and European Sections (Mr. B. Keightley and Mr. G. R. S. Mead); Delegates of the Indian Section (Mr. A. P. Sinnett and Mr. E.

T. Sturdy); Delegates of the European Section (Mr. H. Burrows and Mr. W. Kingsland); Delegates of the American Section (Dr. J. D. Buck and Dr. Archibald Keightley); Special Delegates of Mr. Judge (Mr. Oliver Firth and Mr. E. T. Hargrove); Mrs. Besant and Mr. Judge were also present.

A letter was read by the chairman from the General Secretary of the American Section stating that the Executive Committee of that Section claimed that one of the Delegates of that Section should have an additional vote on the Committee, in view of the fact that the General Secretary himself would not vote, or that an extra Delegate be appointed.

Resolved: That a substitute be admitted to sit on the Committee in the place of the General Secretary.

Mr. James M. Pryse was nominated by the other American Delegates and took his seat.

The Chairman then declared the Committee to be duly constituted, and read his address.

G. R. S. Mead reported that certain Minutes of proceedings by the General Council of the Theosophical Society were communicated to the present Committee for its information, and they were read accordingly.

Resolved: That the President be requested to lay before the Committee the charges against Mr. Judge referred to in his address.

The charges were then considered by the Committee, and the following resolutions were passed.

Resolved: That although it has ascertained that the member bringing the charges and Mr. Judge are both ready to go on with the inquiry, the Committee considers, nevertheless, that the charges are not such as relate to the conduct of the Vice-President in his official capacity, and therefore are not subject to its jurisdiction.

Resolved: That this Committee is also of the opinion that as a statement by them as to the truth or otherwise of at least one of the charges as formulated against Mr. Judge would involve a declaration on their part as to the existence or non-existence of the Mahâtmas, it would be a violation of the spirit of neutrality and the unsectarian nature and Constitution of the Society.

Four members abstained from voting on this second Resolution.
The following were then adopted:

Resolved: That the President's address be adopted.

Resolved: That the General Council be requested to print and circulate the Minutes of the proceedings.

STATEMENTS MADE AT CONVENTION BY MRS. ANNIE BESANT AND WILLIAM Q. JUDGE

AT THE EVENING SESSION, JULY 12TH, 1894, IN BLAVATSKY T. S. HALL, LONDON.

---

MRS. BESANT'S STATEMENT.

Read by herself.

I speak to you to night as the representative of the T. S. in Europe, and as the matter I have to lay before you concerns the deepest interests of the Society I pray you to lay aside all prejudice and feeling, to judge by Theosophical standards and not by the lower standards of the world, and to give your help now in one of the gravest crises in which our movement has found itself. There has been much talk of Committees and Juries of Honor. We come to you, our brothers, to tell you what is in our hearts.

I am going to put before you the exact position of affairs on the matter which has been filling our hearts all day. Mr. Judge and I have agreed to lay two statements before you, and to ask your counsel upon them.

For some years past persons inspired largely by personal hatred for Mr. Judge and persons inspired by hatred for the Theosophical Society and for all that it represents have circulated a mass of accusations against him, ranging from simple untruthfulness to deliberate and systematic forging of the handwritings of Those who to some of us are most sacred. The charges were not in a form that it was possible to meet, a general denial could not stop them, and explanation to irresponsible accusers was at once futile and undignified.

Mr. Judge's election as the future President of the Society increased the difficulties of the situation, and the charges themselves were repeated with growing definiteness and insistence, until they found expression in an article in the Theosophist signed by Messrs. Old and Edge. At last the situation became so strained that it was declared by many of the most earnest members of the Indian Section that if Mr. Judge became President with these charges hanging over him unexplained, the Indian Section would secede from the T.S. Representation to this effect was made to me, and I was asked as well known in the world and the T.S. and as a close friend and colleague of Mr. Judge to intervene in the matter.

I hold strongly that whatever may be the faults of a private member, they are no concern of mine, and it is no part of my duty, as a humble servant of the Lords of Compassion, to drag my brother's faults into public view, nor to arraign him before any tribunal. His faults and mine will find their inevitable harvest of suffering, and I am content to leave them to the Great Law which judges unerringly and knits to every wrong its necessary sequence of pain.

But where the honor of the Society was concerned in the person of its now second official (as he then was thought to be, its President-elect), it was right to do what I could to put an end to the growing friction and suspicion both for the sake of the Society and for that of Mr. Judge; and I agreed to intervene privately, believing that many of the charges were false, dictated and circulated malevolently, that others were much exaggerated and were largely susceptible of explanation, and that what might remain of valid complaint might be put an end to without public controversy. Under the promise that nothing should be done further in the matter until my intervention had failed, I wrote to Mr. Judge. The promise of silence was broken by persons who knew some of the things complained of, and, before any answer could be received by me from Mr. Judge, distorted versions of what had occurred were circulated far and wide. This placed Mr. Judge in a most unfair position, and he found my name used against him in connection with charges which he knew to be grossly exaggerated where not entirely untrue.

Not only so, but I found that a public Committee of enquiry was to be insisted on, and I saw that the proceedings would be directed in a spirit of animosity and that the aim was to inflict punishment for wrongs believed to have been done rather than to prevent future harm to the Society. I did my utmost to prevent a public Committee of Enquiry of an official character. I failed, and the Committee was decided on. And then I made what many of Mr. Judge's friends think was a mistake. I offered to take on myself the onus of formulating the charges against him. I am not concerned to defend myself on this, nor to trouble you with my reasons for taking so painful a decision; in this decision for which I alone am responsible, I meant to act for the best, but it is very possible I made a mistake, for I have made many mistakes in judgment in my life, and my vision is not always clear in these matters of strife and controversy which are abhorrent to me.

In due course I formulated the charges and drew up the written statement of evidence in support of them. They came in due course before the Judicial Committee, as you heard this morning. That Committee decided that they alleged private, not official, wrong doing, and therefore could not be tried by a Committee that could deal only with a President or Vice-President as such. I was admitted to the General Council of the T.S. when this point was argued, and I was convinced by that argument that the point was rightly taken. I so stated when asked by the General Council, and again when asked by the Judicial Committee. And this put an end to the charges so far as that Committee was concerned.

As this left the main issue undecided and left Mr. Judge under the stigma of unproved and un rebutted charges, it was suggested by Mr. Herbert Burrows that the charges should be laid before a Committee of Honor. At the moment this was rejected by Mr. Judge, but he wrote to me on the following day asking me to agree with him in nominating such a Committee. I have agreed to this, but with very great reluctance, for the reason mentioned above: that I feel it no part of my duty to attack any private member of the T. S. and I think such an attack would prove a most unfortunate precedent. But as the proceedings which were commenced against Mr. Judge as an official have proved abortive, it does not seem fair that I, responsible for those proceedings by taking part in them, should refuse him the Committee he asks for. But there is another way which I now take, and which, if you approve it, will put an end to this matter; and as no Theosophist should desire to inflict penalty for the past—even if he thinks wrong has been done—but only to help forward right in the future, it may, I venture to hope, be accepted.

And now I must reduce these charges to their proper proportions, as they have been enormously exaggerated, and it is due to Mr. Judge that I should say publicly what from the beginning I have said privately. The President stated them very accurately in his address to the Judicial Committee: the vital charge is that Mr. Judge has issued letters and messages in the script recognizable as that adopted by a Master with Whom H. P. B. was closely connected, and that these letters and messages were neither written nor precipitated directly by the Master in whose writing they appear; as leading up to this there are subsidiary charges of deception, but these would certainly never have been made the basis of any action save for their connection with the main point.

Further I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not charge and have not charged Mr. Judge with forgery in the ordinary sense of the term, but with giving a misleading material form to messages received psychically from the Master in various ways without acquainting the recipients with this fact.

I regard Mr. Judge as an Occultist, possessed of considerable knowledge and animated by a deep and unswerving devotion to the Theosophical Society. I believe that he has often received direct messages from the Masters and from their chelas, guiding and helping him in his work. I believe that he has sometimes received messages for other people in one or other of the ways that I will mention in a moment, but not by direct writing by the Master nor by His direct precipitation, and that Mr. Judge has then believed himself to be justified in writing down in the script adopted by H. P. B. for communications from that Master, the message psychically received, and in giving it to the person for whom it was intended, leaving that person to wrongly assume that it was a direct precipitation or writing by the Master Himself, that is, that it was done through Mr. Judge but done by the Master.

Now personally I hold that this method is illegitimate and that no one should simulate a recognized writing which is regarded as authoritative when it is authentic. And by authentic I mean directly written or precipitated by the Master Himself. If a message is consciously written it should be so stated; if automatically written, it should be so stated. At least, so it seems to me. It is important that the very small part generally played by the Masters in these phenomena should be understood, so that people may not receive messages as authoritative merely on the ground of their being in a particular script. Except in the very rarest instances, the Masters do not personally write letters or directly precipitate communications. Messages may be sent by Them to those with whom They can communicate by external voice, or astral vision, or psychic word, or mental impression, or in other ways. If a person gets a message which he believes to be from the Master, for communication to any one else, he is bound in honor not to add to that message any extraneous circumstances which will add weight to it in the recipient's eyes. I believe that Mr. Judge wrote with his own hand, consciously or automatically I do not know, in the script adopted as that of the Master, messages which he received from the Master or from chelas, and I know that, in my own case, I believed that the messages he gave me in the well-known script were messages directly precipitated or directly written by the Master. When I publicly said that I had received after H. P. Blavatsky's death letters in the writing H. P. Blavatsky had been accused of forging, I referred to letters given to me by Mr. Judge, and as they were in the well-known script I never dreamed of challenging their source. I know now that they were not written or precipitated by the Master, and that they were done by Mr. Judge, but I also believe that the gist of these messages was psychically received and that Mr. Judge's error lay in giving them to me in a script written by himself and not saying that he had done so. I feel bound to refer to these letters thus explicitly, because, having myself mistaken, I in turn misled the public.

It should be generally understood inside and outside the Theosophical Society that letters and messages may be written or may be precipitated in any script, without thereby gaining any valid authority. Scripts may be produced by automatic or deliberate writing with the hand, or by precipitation, by many agencies from the White and Black Adepts down to semi-conscious Elementals, and those who afford the necessary conditions can be thus used. The source of messages can only be decided by direct spiritual knowledge or, intellectually, by the nature of their contents; and each person must use his own powers and act on his own responsibility in accepting or rejecting them. Thus I rejected a number of letters, real precipitations, brought me by an American not an F.T.S., as substantiating his claim to be H.P.B.'s successor. Any good medium may be used for precipitating messages by any of the varied entities in the Occult World; and the outcome of these proceedings will be, I hope, to put an end to the craze for receiving letters and messages, which are more likely to be sub-human or human in their origin than super-human, and to throw people back on the evolution of their own spiritual nature, by which alone they can be safely guided through the mazes of the super-physical world.

If you, representatives of the T.S., consider that the publication of this statement, followed by that which Mr. Judge will make, would put an end to this distressing business, and by making a clear understanding get rid at least of the mass of seething suspicions in which we have been living, and if you can accept it, I propose that this should take the place of the Committee of Honor, putting you, our brothers, in the place of a Committee. I have made the frankest explanation I can: I know how enwrapped in difficulty are these phenomena which are connected with forces obscure in their workings to most; therefore how few are able to judge of them accurately, while those through whom they play are not always able to control them. Now I trust that these explanations may put an end to some at least of the troubles of the last two years, and leave us to go on with our work for the world, each in his own way. For any pain that I have given my brother in trying to do a most repellent task, I ask his pardon, as also for any mistakes that I may have made.

ANNIE BESANT.

[The above statements as to precipitated, written, and other communications have been long ago made by both H. P. Blavatsky and Mr. Judge in Lucifer, the Path, and elsewhere, both publicly and privately.—A.B.]

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE'S STATEMENT.

Read by himself.

Since March last charges have been going round the world against me to which the name of Annie Besant has been attached, without her consent as she now says, that I have been guilty of forging the names and handwritings of the Mahâtmas and of misusing the said names and handwritings. The charge has also arisen that I suppressed the name of Annie Besant as mover in the matter from fear of the same. All this has been causing great trouble and working injury to all concerned, that is, to all our members. It is now time that this should be put an end to once for all, if possible.

I now state as follows:

1. I left the name of Annie Besant out of my published circular by request of my friends in the T.S. then near me, so as to save her and leave it to others to put her name to the charge. It now appears that if I had so put her name it would have run counter to her present statement.
2. I repeat my denial of the said rumored charges of forging the said names and handwritings of the Mahâtmas or of misusing the same.
3. I admit that I have received and delivered messages from the Mahatmas and assert their genuineness.
4. I say that I have heard and do hear from the Mahâtmas, and that I am an agent of the Mahâtmas; but I deny that I have ever sought to induce that belief in others, and this is the first time to my knowledge that I have ever made the claim now made. I am pressed into the place where I must make it. My desire and effort have been to distract attention from such an idea as related to me. But I have no desire to make the claim, which I repudiate, that I am the only channel for communication with Masters; and it is my opinion that such communication is open to any human being who by endeavoring to serve mankind affords the necessary conditions.

5. Whatever messages from the Mahâtmas have been delivered by me as such—and they are extremely few—I now declare were and are genuine messages from the Mahâtmas so far as my knowledge extends; they were obtained through me, but as to how they were obtained or produced I cannot state. But I can now again say, as I have said publicly before, and as was said by H. P. Blavatsky so often that I have always thought it common knowledge among studious Theosophists, that precipitation of words or messages is of no consequence and constitutes no proof of connection with Mahâtmas; it is only phenomenal and not of the slightest value.

6. So far as methods are concerned for the reception and delivery of messages from the Masters, they are many. My own methods may disagree from the views of others, and I acknowledge their right to criticise them if they choose; but I deny the right of any one to say that they know or can prove the ungeniueness of such messages to or through me unless they are able to see on that plane. I can only say that I have done my best to report—in the few instances when I have done it at all—correctly and truthfully such messages as I think I have received for transmission, and never to my knowledge have I tried therewith to deceive any person or persons whatsoever.

7. And I say that in 1893 the Master sent me a mes-age in which he thanked me for all my work and exertions in the Theosophical field and expressed satisfaction therewith, ending with sage advice to guard me against the failings and follies of my lower nature; that message Mrs. Besant unreservedly admits.

8. Lastly, and only because of absurd statements made and circulated, I willingly say that which I never denied, that I am a human being full of error, liable to mistake, not infallible, but just the same as any other human being like to myself or of the class of human beings to which I belong. And I freely, fully, and sincerely forgive any one who may be thought to have injured or tried to injure me. To which I sign my name.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. B. Keightley then arose and offered the following resolutions:

Resolved: That this meeting accepts with pleasure the adjustment arrived at by Annie Besant and William Q. Judge as a final settlement of matters pending hitherto between them as prosecutor and defendant with the hope that it may be thus buried and forgotten, and:

Resolved: That we will join hands with them to further the Cause of genuine Brotherhood in which we all believe.

These were seconded by J. D. Buck.

Col. H. S. Olcott, acting as chairman, then put the Resolutions to the meeting, which crowded the hall, and they were carried unanimously with loud applause.

EUROPEAN SECTION, ANNUAL CONVENTION.

The Convention of the European Section was held at 19 Avenue Road, London, in the Blavatsky T. S. hall on July 12th and 13th, 1894. The first meeting opened at ten o'clock a.m. with the hall crowded. Col. H. S. Olcott called the meeting to order, G. R. S. Mead being Secretary. The chair then made a short speech calling for adherence to truth, all personal feelings to be laid aside. In all cases we had stow. Tolerance to all failings should be observed. William Q. Judge then arrived and was greeted with prolonged applause. Col. Olcott then took up the matter of the charges against the Vice President and read his decision, that of the Council and of the Committee, printed on another page, and declared the suspension of the Vice-President revoked. The General Secretary then read his report, which was adopted, as also that of the Treasurer. Officers for next year were elected: General Secretary, G. R. S. Mead, with Executive Committee, Treasurer, and Auditors. This brought the first session to a close at 12.30, when adjournment was taken to 3.30 p.m. at same place.

SECOND SESSION, JULY 12.

Col. H. S. Olcott took the chair at 3.40, called the Convention to order, and asked that the American delegates should speak. William Q. Judge addressed the meeting and said the American Section only desired to ask for brotherhood, as the T. S. was founded on it and was meant for it and for nothing else. (Applause.) Dr. J. D. Buck next spoke as second American delegate, and said that his only instruction was to try and preserve the solidarity of the T. S., and that he believed that which brought him there was most important for the T. S. (applause). The Indian Section was represented by B. Keightley, who spoke in the same strain. He referred to the difference between work here and in India; as there the doctrine of spiritual unity was taken for granted, while here it was not, and hence difference in propaganda. A real spiritual revival was needed there. (Applause.)

General Secretary was ordered to employ more help in his work. It was resolved to enlarge Library at No. 17. The disposition of funds for the Religious Parliaments by William Q. Judge was approved. Resolved that the matter of altering the General Rules should lie on the table until next year.

Mrs. Isabel Cooper-Oakley moved a vote of thanks to William Q. Judge for his exertion in carrying on the Theosophical Congress at the Chicago Parliament, and it was carried unanimously with applause.

Dr. A. Keightley moved an expression of the cordial gratitude and thanks of the Convention to Mrs. Besant in her recent tour in India. Carried with applause.

A proposition was received from Dr. Hübbe-Schleiden to permit an affiliation with T. S. of eight hundred or more persons in a society he has there, no fees to be paid, as the people are poor. It was referred to a committee.

EVENING SESSION, JULY 12

Col. Olcott opened the meeting about eight o'clock p.m., and numerous short speeches were made by different members defining Theosophy. At about nine o'clock the President announced that Mrs. Besant and Mr. Judge had something to say to the meeting. Mrs. Besant then read her statement, followed by one by Mr. Judge, all being printed entire with the resolution which was then passed by acclamation. This terminated the meeting.

MORNING SESSION, JULY 13.

This session was well attended and was devoted to considering questions of administration. It was resolved that the proposal of the German society to affiliate on terms quite different from other members should go to the Executive Committee. It was held that to admit eight hundred people at once who were not drilled in Theosophy or the T. S. would be to inject perhaps an element of friction; but that the same liberal policy should hold as in the case of the Scandinavian sub-section. Discussion on propaganda then ensued and filled the remainder of the session.

EVENING SESSION, JULY 13.

This was opened at quarter after eight o'clock. Discussion took place in regard to using the word "brother" or "sister". Views for and against were expressed. Colleague, comrade, and other titles were suggested, but the matter was not acted on. Many speakers took up Theosophy in general, among them Mr. W. Kingsland, Dr. A. Keightley, Mr. H. Burrows, G. R. S. Mead, William Q. Judge, and Annie Besant. The President closed the Convention at five o'clock p.m. Three years ago he did not think he would be here again. Nothing but our treachery could destroy the Society. As a veteran, he would encourage all. This meeting is but the center of great occult force that will go over the whole Society. We have seen a cloud pass over the sky, but it has gone, as always before has been our fortune.

EXTRA MEETING, JULY 14.

At half after eight o'clock, Col. Olcott by request exhibited a great many of the objects phenomenally produced by H. P. Blavatsky. A good audience assembled in the hall of the Blavatsky T. S. The exhibition was accompanied with a running explanation. It was intensely interesting. Two remarkable letters going as far back as 1870 in the "K. H." hand-writing were shown. One of these was by mail to the family of H. P. B. This ought to destroy the entire theory elaborately built up by the Psychical Research Society. Col. Olcott ended by saying that all he had shown and told, taken with the proceedings lately ended (apparently meaning the Judicial Committee), ought to prove that messages from the Masters must stand on their own merits.

MAHATMAS.

MANY Theosophists are accustomed to accept as authoritative such instruction as they believe has been imparted by the beings known as Mahatmas, in whose existence they have good reason for belief, and whom they regard as the teachers and guides of our race in all that tends toward its evolution from the material plane to spirituality. This confidence, naturally, is not shared by those whose habits of life and education have trained them to look only upon the materialistic side of everything—generally with the dominant, if not the sole, idea of seeing “how much there is in it” in the way of financial profit. Pseudo-scientists, whose mental vision is bounded by the limitations of the microscope and spectroscope, deny the existence of the Mahatmas; and shallow, indifferent ignorance echoes, with added jibes and jeers, their interested repudiation. Of course, when “science” and “religion” agree upon anything, the majority of mankind—too much “civilized” to do any thinking for themselves—contentedly accept such conclusion as right, without taking the trouble of independent consideration as to whether both “science” and “religion” may not both be wrong.

But there really are very good reasons for confidence in the existence of the Mahatmas, reasons not at all based upon sentiment or fancy, but upon sound philosophy. It is perfectly well understood that they are not another order of beings, but have been, and are, simply men. That does not necessarily imply that they have corporeal bodies. The real man is not the form which was born, is liable to cold, hunger, sickness, wounds, and death. It is the immortal spiritual soul, with such associate principles as are necessary to establish its individuality, which constitutes the man, even during normal earth-life. The strength and worth of that soul are what determine the true value of the man, not the density of his body. And the power he exercises over his fellow man, upon material things, and in shaping his own destiny, lies in the forces of his soul, not in the energy with which he can strike a physical blow or the distance he can kick.

The Mahatmas are simply "Great Souls" [Maha, great; Atma, soul] who have become great by their wondrous attainments of higher knowledge than is possessed by other men. Command over all the secrets of matter is but a small part of their wisdom. They have gained mastery over the mighty mystery of death, and that yet greater mystery, life; and in so doing have learned how, in their own persons, to rise superior to the laws of matter bounding the existence of our race. Capable of carrying their consciousness to planes of being infinitely beyond the material, they have won clear perception of the tremendous scheme of evolution which is the sustaining principle of the universe and all it contains, attained comprehension of its laws, and become possessors of the power to follow its course, with lucid apprehension of all its details, not only through ages past, and with all-comprehending knowledge of the present, but through æons yet to come made themselves partakers of the divine consciousness. Yet, with all this, they have not ceased to be men, "the elder brothers" of our race, as they have been well characterized by those privileged to know them. Whether they temporarily assume corporeal bodies, or clothe their individualities with less gross matter, is wholly dependent upon their own will; but in neither case would their presence necessarily challenge the observation of any except those to whom they might choose to reveal themselves, since as corporeal men they would appear just like other men, and if embodied in more tenuous matter would be invisible. As a matter of fact, though their influence is constantly felt in every upward movement of humanity, they rarely mingle among men. Keenly susceptible as they have become to the high vibrations of the mental plane, the fin de siècle life, thrilling with selfishness and sensuality, full of base ambitions, vicious impulses, and material energies, would be not only offensive but positively painful to them. One may imagine with what disgust and distressful pity a man would be filled who, in moving amid a throng of his fellow-creatures, should be intensely conscious of their respective real physical conditions, their disorders, pains, defects, and rottennesses, the secrets they carefully hide from all eyes but their own and the doctor's. Well, carry that fancy from the physical to the mental plane, and, in so doing, intensify it an hundredfold, and it will afford some idea of what a being gifted with the Mahatma's powers would experience in personal contact with the naked minds of men engaged in the "struggle for survival of the fittest". And it is well for men that the Mahatmas are not in more familiar association and contact with them, for those beings are centres and transmitters of tremendous forces belonging to other planes than ours, liable to impel exceedingly dangerous vibrations in human organisms, except under the rare conditions when an "elder brother" voluntarily undergoes the martyrdom of another re-incarnation that he may move among men as one of them, the more effectively to act directly as their teacher and spiritual guide or "Savior" at a cyclic period when such manifestation is the most practicable aid which may be given.

In all races and in all ages since recorded time began, the knowledge has existed that there lived and moved upon this earth such beings as the Mahatmas. As "wise men", "Adepts", "serpents of wisdom", "magicians", "prophets", "masters", "Rishis", "demi-gods", "Avatars", "elder brothers", "Christs", and by many other titles, all expressive of super-human greatness, they have been variously known. And the same characteristics and powers have always been ascribed to them. They possessed what was regarded as super-natural command over the forces of nature, and were able to hold communion with disembodied spirits, angels, and demons, exercising control over the latter; generally they secluded themselves from their fellow-men, living lives of isolation and indifference to what other men regarded as the desirable things of life; at the same time, they were ever ready and powerful, when sought, to bestow benefits, and their influence was always exerted for good. They knew the future, and recognized personalities among them were known to have been unchanged by lapse of time long as even tradition ran through ages past, in many instances. There were understood to be gradations among them, he who was wisest and best ranking highest. They were at once loved and feared. Sometimes they were known to lay down the burden of mortal life, but more often they simply suddenly disappeared, and, in either case, superstitious folks said the devil had no doubt taken them.

This consensus of belief respecting those beings, so agreeing in all its essentials, cannot be intelligently regarded as merely a common delusion. It is cumulative testimony to a fact which cannot be gainsaid and which only the unwise will undervalue. More, it speaks an inherent recognition by man of the perfectibility of being, of the evolution of humanity from the low level of its animal life, and the not much higher stand-point of the hedonist, step by step upward to divinity.

We cannot help seeing about us personalities whom—without any egotism—we must recognize as lower in mind and morals than ourselves; and others to whom we cannot in justice deny attainments far beyond us, mental and spiritual. No two human beings, indeed, stand upon exactly the same level, and is it reasonably supposable that these gradations stop at a certain point within the limit of acquirement in a single human life, even under the best imaginable auspices? Certainly not. Huxley pronounced it impertinent to assume that human beings do not exist as much higher in intellectuality than the most cultured minds of Europe as those are above a black beetle. By those to whom the Mahatmas are personally known—and there are such to-day in India, Europe, and America—it is recognized that there is not an equality of development among those exalted beings, the greater wisdom and spirituality of some elevating them to higher planes and endowing them with greater powers than those attained by others, and that such progression extends far beyond the range of normal human comprehension to where the most advanced mingle with orders of beings yet higher who are their “elder brothers”, and even beyond those to who can say what—to us unimaginable—heights, ever approaching yet without attaining to the perfect wisdom of the inscrutable and inconceivable “Source and Container of All”.

Our race would be infinitely richer than it is to-day, even in the domain of material science, had it not rejected the wisdom freely offered many centuries ago by these “elder brothers”, who taught in full much which modern scientists are now pluming themselves upon suspecting. The atomic theory, the genesis of worlds, the impermanence yet indestructibility of matter, a true astronomy, the septenary composition of man, the powers of mind and will—with their demonstrations now known under the names of hypnotism, telepathy, etc.—the control of natural forces (some of them still unknown to our modern science), were all set forth in the ancient books of the Masters thousands of years before Atlantis sank beneath the sea, together with infinitely much more, the least of which the Inquisition would have burned a man for knowing, or would to-day make a scientist famous by its supposed "discovery".

At a time so remote that the records were written in a language not the common speech of men anywhere within profane historic knowledge, the Mahatmas of that period predicted accurately, for this present time, the conditions existent in the world to-day. Looking with clear vision down the long vista of coming centuries, they beheld the collective Karma the human race would make for itself and saw when and how the awful debt would have to be paid. The psychic disturbances and mental perturbations now agitating the world; the mighty achievements of material science; the culmination of man's long-continued oppression of his fellow-man in unjust legislation, unequal and injurious class conditions of society, contending interests between the powerful few and the suffering many, and the consequent poverty, recklessness, aggression, violent reprisals, savage acts of authoritative repression, and the alarming increase of insanity and crime at this point of the Kali Yuga, all were foretold by the Masters. And they also predicted, at the same time, that which in the light of their sublime philosophy is seen as a direct product of the operation of such evil mental forces among the sons of men effecting re-active vibrations on the material plane of Nature, however modern science may now rail at the idea of such connection or relation. They foresaw the tremendous meteorologic and seismic disturbances which, during several years past, have been steadily increasing in numbers, magnitude, and terrible effects, and are destined to become still more appalling until the end of the cycle.

Even if it be contended that those prophecies were not by men, but by higher intelligences who used particular men as their messengers, it must still be admitted that such intermediaries certainly possessed qualifications other than those common to their race, which brought them nearer to those intelligences and more directly under their influence. Such specialization could not have been by accident. The one thing which does not exist in all the vast universe and is not even within the power of the highest gods to cause, is chance. Men who rise to the sublime height of the Mahatmas do so by their own "Will and Endeavor". Only by many successive lives entirely devoted to cultivation of the higher powers of the soul and renunciation of Self, is the goal attained. The soul so prepared has to reach a point where it has by proven merit conquered the right to enter at once an eternity of rest and ineffable bliss, and must there possess the strength of self-sacrifice to voluntarily renounce that boon in order to devote itself to the advancement of the human race, encouraging and aiding humanity to follow the path which leads eventually to liberation from the bonds of sorrow and death.

At stated times these self-sacrificing ones, wearing mortal forms, appear among men as leaders and teachers, in such characters leaving their impress upon succeeding ages, as have Gautama Buddha and Jesus Christ, and other "Saviors" who preceded them, teaching the same lessons they taught. More often they apply their energy and power, unseen, to the control of forces which, in harmony with Karmic influences, sway the mental and moral energies and consequently the destiny of the race. In so operating they do not necessarily come into contact with human beings, except such as have by their self-advancement upon the path risen to capability of service as their immediate messengers or agents. The spread of the Theosophic movement, all over the world, in a few years, with such depth of interest as it has evoked, such responsive welcome as it has won from the hearts of men, and such powerful influence as it has already exerted upon thought and literature, is the latest evidence of the continued application of the forces at command of the Masters—or Mahatmas—for the benefit of humanity.

A STUDENT'S NOTES AND GUESSES.

THE SURVEY.

EVERYONE has heard of survey by "triangulation". Did you ever see a geodetic map, representing, not merely topographical details, but also the mathematical skeleton upon which these details were clothed? Such a map shows the station points, the radiating lines of sight which were taken, and the intersection of those radiating lines as they met at various points whose relative positions were to be determined.

To understand this more clearly, the plan of operations may be sketched.

In the first place a theodolite is set up at the point where work is to be commenced. This instrument is essentially a telescope combined with a finely graduated circle, which serves to determine the angles between the different directions in which the telescope is pointed.

The telescope is sighted on some distant spot which is to be located on the map. The intersection of spider-lines in the instrument, as seen against the distant object, determines the exact line of sight. The telescope is turned to another definite point on the horizon, and the angle between these two lines of sight determined by reading the degrees and minutes of the included arc of the stationary graduated circle. This process is repeated as point after point is sighted upon, and the angle, and consequently the direction, is each time carefully recorded. As many points are sighted, and angles taken, as are deemed necessary for the work in hand. Theoretically everything could be sighted.

If the work stopped here, it is evident that no map could be made, even of the visible area, by plotting out the notes obtained from a single standpoint. Imagine a sheet of paper before you on which you select a point to represent that which your instrument has just occupied. You lay out from this center, which we will call O, a line representing your first sight—to point A. Call this line O A. In like manner you lay out O B, O D, etc., corresponding to the directions in which you have seen the points B, C, D, etc. How far out on these lines will you locate A, B, C, etc.? It is evidently impossible to say. "A" may be a mountain peak, "B" a spire, etc. You may guess that "A" is twenty miles away and "B" five, but even this guess must be based on previous experiences with similar objects, at various measured distances.

The observer at a single stand-point is at the centre of a spherical picture which encompasses him; his sight may be telescopic, he may measure angles with absolute accuracy, yet from these data alone dimensions in space cannot be known.

The surveyor shifts his point of outlook: his theodolite, set up at another spot, is sighted back to that which he just occupied. Starting from that line, he again sights on all the points whose directions were noted from the first station. That is to say, if we call the second station "P", he first takes the sight P O, then P A, P B, P C, etc., each time noting the angle formed with the line P O. He is at the center of a second sphere of observation, which, so far as its objects are identical with those of the first, enables him to locate them in space, in a way which he could not do from a single station.

For, let us again imagine the surveyor with the paper before him on which he had marked the first station "O" and from it drawn a set of radiating lines corresponding to the directions of A, B, C, etc. The second station, P, has been noted from O before shifting the instrument, and O, as before said, noted from P in relation to all other directions. The map-maker now makes the line  $OP$  on the paper, of a length corresponding to the scale upon which the map is to be drawn. (This is simply a matter of convenience and in no way affects its relative proportions.) From the point on the paper which represents  $P$ , he lays out the directions in which he has seen the points  $A, B, C, D$ , etc. The same thing has already been done from  $O$ , and the result is a series of triangles having a common base  $OP$ , and with apexes at different points  $A, B, C$ , etc., corresponding accurately, in their distribution and distances from each other, with the points which were sighted from the two stations; for the direction in which  $A$  was seen from  $O$  can intersect the direction in which  $A$  was seen from  $P$  only at the actual point  $A$ ; and the triangle  $AP O$ , on the map, must correspond with the relative positions of the three topographical points.

If the stations  $O$  and  $P$  are elevated, a considerable tract of country can be mapped.

The positions of all points are determined by relation to two, the triangle being the fundamental element which determines both limitation and actual knowledge.

But the survey may be destined to extend for hundreds of miles, and ultimately be connected with all others, thus covering the whole globe.

Points will be visible from  $O$  which cannot be seen from  $P$ , and vice-versâ. These cannot be mapped from those stations, because they are not seen from both. But some which are visible from  $O$ , and not from  $P$ , can be seen from  $A$  (or some other of that series) the position of which has become accurately known. Making  $A$ , then, a new station for the theodolite, this second set of points can be as accurately determined as the first set, and the line  $OA$  will be a base line to this set, just as  $OP$  was to the first. But the relative lengths and directions of these two lines are known from observations made at the first two stations; therefore the second set of points, observed from  $A$  and  $O$  but not seen from  $P$ , are accurately linked to the first and form a single system with them. In this manner, step by step, as new centers of observation are chosen, the survey is extended. The horizon of each overlaps that of one or more of the others; each is the center of radiant lines of perception; each is useless by itself, but defines truth when connected with the others.<sup>1</sup>

Let us imagine the theodolite as a center of consciousness, which receives rays from all points just as every point in space does.

If we look at a little polished globe, or a drop of quicksilver, we will see objects, in all directions, perfectly reflected. This will be true however minute the globule. It forms the central point of a sphere of indefinite dimensions.

Imagine oneself condensed into a conscious drop of quicksilver, a point of pure perception. Angular measurement would be the only dimensional consciousness possessed. The distant mountain, the neighboring tree, the drifting clouds, the waving grass, would all seem to be within. The mountain would be insignificant compared with the tree, the clouds would grow larger and smaller as they drifted past, and all would be a panorama within, from which there would be no separateness. There would be neither joy nor pain, as we know them, for we cannot read into the point the complex emotions, sensations, and contrasting thoughts which are due to our present multiplex and simultaneous perceptions.

As the point, conscious center or drop, call it what we may, drifted from place to place, the panorama would shift, just as it would on a drop of quicksilver similarly floated about.

All this, or whatever would be reflected, would seem spontaneous and within, to the point, just as the pictures shift and melt away in a dream.<sup>1</sup>

It is possible, in a measure, to realize this by concentrating the attention on the sense of sight. Fix your eyes on a distant landscape, forget your extended limbs and their sensations, forget your experiences of distance in connection with certain visual angles, and you will find presently that the picture seems within you (as in fact it is), and that you can understand why the infant grasps at the moon and the blind man, when first restored to sight, receives from it no sense of distance. As the usual mental attitude is resumed, the hills seem pushed back and the landscape to be thrown out from within.

To the point the whole would not seem separate, for that would be to realize annihilation; the consciousness of the point is the consciousness of the whole, and yet not of the whole in that due proportion which corresponds to reality but in that which corresponds to perspective.

To return to the illustration of the quicksilver globule. That which it mirrors is the whole, not as a map, but with a perspective which corresponds to a certain position.<sup>1</sup>

Now suppose that instead of one, you are two conscious centers linked together by bonds of simultaneous and co-ordinate perception. You have now the element of knowledge which the surveyor gains by two stations. Every point in space is now a third point to these two, the apex of a triangle whose dimensions are felt within yourself.

But with this first step comes the distinction between station points and points only, between the "That" and the "Thou".

The great Survey begins.

The surveyor in his map brings into simultaneous co-ordination the sight of different centers. From the base lines of co-ordinate centers of monadic perception a map springs into being, a miniature of the truth, a microcosm which duplicates the macrocosm.

Through linked centers of life the self-conscious is born of the monadic

NEMESIS.

IN a note to p. 305 of the second volume of the Secret Doctrine, Mme. Blavatsky points out the difference between the Greek idea of Nemesis and the Aryan Karma, which is often thought to be exactly the same thing. But the conception of Nemesis varied with different poets at different epochs, and from the purely abstract idea of the inevitable punishment of sin became anthropomorphised into a goddess to be worshipped and to be placated by prayer and submission. "If we would connect Karma with Nemesis", says Mme. Blavatsky in the passage referred to, "it has to be done in the triple character of the latter as Nemesis, Adrasteia, and Themis. For while the latter is the goddess of Universal Order and Harmony (who, like Nemesis, is commissioned to repress every excess and keep man within the limits of Nature and righteousness under severe penalty), Adrasteia—the inevitable—represents Nemesis as the immutable effect of causes created by man himself. Nemesis, as the daughter of Diké, is the equitable goddess, reserving her wrath for those alone who are maddened with pride, egotism, and impiety." It is, then, Adrasteia, or "the inevitable", who would answer best to the Eastern conception of Nemesis, or Karma, as Eternal Law working out its necessary consequences. "Every act rewards itself", says Emerson, "or, in other words, integrates itself, in a twofold manner; first, in the thing, or in real nature; and secondly, in the circumstance, or in apparent nature. Men call the circumstance retribution. The causal retribution is in the thing, and is seen by the soul. The retribution in the circumstance is seen by the understanding; it is inseparable from the thing, but is often spread over a long time and so does not become distinct till after many years. Crime and punishment grow out of one stem. Punishment is a fruit that unsuspected ripens within the flower of the pleasure which concealed it. Cause and effect, means and ends, seed and fruit, cannot be severed; for the effect already blooms in the cause, the end preëxists in the means, the fruit in the seed."

Emerson was thoroughly in sympathy with the teachings of the Oriental philosophy, and nowhere more completely so than in this passage from his essay on Compensation. For he not only points out to us that a deed and its consequences are one, but seizes that more occult view that the real thing is in the soul, and is perceived by the soul. It is in what we are that the reality lies, and what we do is but the impress that the seal of our nature prints upon the world without. If that seal be as the head of a god, so much the better for the world, and, in reversion, for ourselves; but that seal has been modelled by the forces of our own soul, and we only are responsible for the image that it bears. No subterfuge will avail us, no shirking and no dallying alter the preëdained result of the forces we have chosen to set in motion. "The world is full of judgment-days", says Emerson elsewhere, and we are continually being judged, not only for our sins, but for our blunders. "You should have known better", says stern Nature, when we transgress her rules and suffer the consequences and try to plead ignorance as an excuse. And deep in our inmost souls we know that she is right. "Nothing can work me damage except myself", says St. Bernard; "the harm that I sustain I carry about with me, and never am a real sufferer but by my own fault." And if the believer in only one life upon earth could realise this, how much more should those who have made the doctrine of reïncarnation their own appreciate the idea of more remote causes for suffering than can be traced in one earthly existence! Far back in the mists of time, by some initial choice of good or evil, did we begin to create that Nemesis which surrounds us to-day, built up year after year and life after life the palace or the prison of the soul. For choice, within certain limits, we have always, and it is ours to weave the black thread or the white at will into the web of our future destiny. "Karma-Nemesis guards the good and watches over them", says the Occultist, "in this as in future lives, and punishes the evil-doer, aye, even to his seventh rebirth. So long, in fact, as the effect of his having thrown into perturbation even the smallest atom in the Infinite World of harmony has not been finally readjusted. For the only decree of Karma—an eternal and immutable decree—is absolute Harmony in the world of matter as in the world of Spirit." (S.D., i, 643).

So that we see that our Nemesis is no offended Deity, punishing with anger an infringement of his arbitrary decrees, but the striving of the universe to right itself, to repair the injuries that our heedless or wilful actions have effected in the harmony of the whole. If, then, the corner-stone of the universe is that spiritual unity which manifests itself in universal brotherhood, the more we can do to make that brotherhood a material reality, the more nearly we shall approach the harmony of the spiritual world, which is Life and Love, not Death and Selfishness. And as Emerson has shown us, the real thing is in the soul, the causal retribution there. Can any punishment that earthly justice can inflict upon a man be half so terrible as that which comes from within, the torments that spring from his own fear, his own remorse? Not long ago, Felix Adler gave a magnificent discourse on "The Penalties of Sin", every word of which might find an echo in all right-thinking minds. The report I read (for I was not so fortunate as to hear it) said that he concluded by stating the difference between the present generation and its forefathers in respect to the doctrine of sin. "Our forefathers were haunted by the sleepless eye of God, which they believed to be ever fixed upon them, piercing every veil and wall. They believed that God would punish them, either immediately or at the last judgment. . . . But now man has become his own accuser, and the judgment-seat is transferred to his own breast. In his own brain is the prototype of the universal laws. In the name of those universal laws he pronounces sentence upon himself.

"The more our moral nature unfolds, the more difficult does it become to satisfy the awful divinity within our bosom. The most agonising pain which the modern man can suffer, as many know to their bitter cost, is self-condemnation. The highest boon to which we can aspire is to be able to dwell in peace with the God within us."

Surely every Theosophist would reëcho these words of the great ethical teacher. And should we not agree with him also when he said that the true aim of punishment was reformation, not vengeance, and that the pangs of conscience were to be regarded as the beginning of a process of spiritual regeneration? For what is the voice of conscience but the voice of the higher Ego in man, of that diviner Self who is ever striving to reach the lower nature and bring it up into closer relations with the God within us? If we refuse to listen to that voice, if knowing the right we still the wrong pursue, we are knotting another mesh of that great net of Destiny in whose folds we shall some day struggle unavailingly, like captive birds. Our struggles will be all in vain, for the meshes of Nemesis hold fast, but neither Nemesis nor vengeance wove them, but we ourselves of our own free choice. The criminal sets in motion long years (it may be long lives) beforehand, the train of causes that one day lands him in a jail, but imprisonment will do him no good unless it go hand-in-hand with reform. What men call the vengeance of the law is but too often the right name for its punishments; it is the revenge of the community for its violated peace and order that is embodied in the verdict of the jury and the sentence of the judge, the strong arm of the law stretched out to slay and not to save. When the idea of universal brotherhood shall have become a more living reality, all prisons will be reformatories in the truest sense of the word, and the wrong-doer will be taught to listen to the voice in his own soul, and helped to obey its dictates and to struggle back towards the right. The way of the transgressor is hard, but how doubly hard when he has to retrace his painful footsteps with all the forces of his vitiated nature battling against him, all the demons of the sinful past rising up to oppose his progress! Byron was said to have had every gift but the faculty of knowing how to use them, and he has left an ample record of the torments inflicted by a misspent life. Could there be anything more terrible than the "Incantation" in Manfred, which summons the elements of his own character to be his torturers?

The Voice says to him :

From thy false tears I did distil
 An essence which has strength to kill ;
 From thine own heart I then did wring
 The black blood in its blackest spring ;

From thine own lip I drew the charm
 Which gave all these the chiefest harm ;
 In proving every poison known.
 I found the strongest was thine own !

By thy cold breast and serpent smile,
 By thy unfathomed gulfs of guile ;
 By the perfection of thine art
 Which passed for human thine own heart ;
 By thy delight in others' pain,
 And by thy brotherhood of Cain.
 I call upon thee ! and compel
 Thyself to be thy proper Hell !

So much for Nemesis as "the just indignation of the gods". But justice has good gifts as well as evil in her well-balanced scales, and the soul can decree itself a nobler mansion as the swift seasons roll, and can lay the cornerstone today. Built up of lofty thoughts and noble purposes, founded upon the rock of steadfast resolution and unflinching courage, crowned with the fair white dome of love and truth, that edifice shall rise, a mansion not built with hands, but eternal in the heavens. And if we fashion our lives thus, Nemesis shall wear for us not the terrible aspect of the avenging Furies, but the smile that Wordsworth saw upon the face of Duty.

Stern lawgiver ! yet thou dost wear
 The Godhead's most benignant grace ;
 Nor know we anything so fair
 As is the smile upon thy face ;
 Flowers laugh before thee on their beds ;
 And fragrance in thy footing treads ;
 Thou dost preserve the stars from wrong,
 And the most ancient heavens thro' thee are fresh and strong.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

THIS month's face is that of ERNEST TEMPLE HARGROVE, who, although not known to the whole T.S., has made himself quite well acquainted with very many in the American Section. He came to the eighth Convention at San Francisco in April, 1894, travelling across the continent with the General Secretary, and after the Convention all the way up to Seattle, lecturing meanwhile at various places. For that reason and also because he is a friend, we give his counterfeit presentment.

Mr. Hargrove is the second son of James Sidney Hargrove, one of London's best known solicitors. His name has been for a long time connected with literature, several members of it being mentioned in England's Dictionary of National Biography as authors of considerable repute. His father's family comes from Yorkshire; on his mother's side he is Scotch, she being an Aird. The best known representative of this line is and has been for some years the member of Parliament for one of the London Constituencies. There is also a fighting streak in his veins, such men as Lieutenant General Hargrove, Governor of Gibraltar during the war in the early part of the eighteenth century, and Sir Martin Frobisher who fought against the Armada, standing to him as ancestors.

After being educated at several preparatory schools he went to Harrow, where he is said to have spent most of his time reading novels, but at this date he does not regret it. When eighteen years of age he left Harrow and studied for the Diplomatic Service; was then offered the choice of going to Cambridge University or travelling abroad. Choosing the latter he went to Australia and visited Tasmania, making a long tour through New Zealand, where some time was spent among the Maories, returning home by way of Ceylon. Considerable time was then spent in the office of a Charter Accountant where he was sent to get a general idea of business. He then decided to become a barrister, and is now a member of the Middle Temple.

Mr. Hargrove first heard of Theosophy during the time of the great discussion in the London Daily Chronicle. Being at a seaside holiday resort, he saw a placard on a wall with the large heading "Theosophy" advertising a lecture by Mrs. Besant. He did not go to the lecture, but by seeing the word "Theosophy" his whole inner and outer life were changed. Books were then bought on the subject, and he was admitted as a member-at-large without even having the acquaintance of another member. Since then most of his days and a good many of his nights have been spent at the London Headquarters, helping in the General Office with correspondence, with the Vahan, with certain Lucifer reviews, and lecturing at various lodges. He was also Treasurer of the Blavatsky Lodge. Since he was nine years old he has travelled a great deal in Europe and other places, and thus has had most of the edges knocked off his distinctive character as an "insular Englishman". To prove this he says he is a great reader of the PATH and that he has learned more from it than from other sources. For the Society he has written under various noms de plume, but not under his own name. He stands six feet two in his stockings, but having grown rather fast he thinks he is rather weedy but hopes under the action of Karma he may fill up in time.

OCCULTISM AND TRUTH.

TO STUDENTS OF OCCULTISM.

"There is no Religion higher than Truth."

—Motto of the Theosophical Society.

THE inevitable mystery which surrounds Occultism and the Occultist has given rise in the minds of many to a strange confusion between the duty of silence and the error of untruthfulness. There are many things that the Occultist may not divulge; but equally binding is the law that he may never speak untruth. And this obligation to Truth is not confined to speech; he may never think untruth, nor act untruth. A spurious Occultism dallies with truth and falsehood, and argues that deception on the illusory physical plane is consistent with purity on the loftier planes on which the Occultist has his true life; it speaks contemptuously of "mere worldly morality"—a contempt that might be justified if it raised a higher standard, but which is out of place when the phrase is used to condone acts which the "mere worldly morality" would disdain to practise. The doctrine that the end justifies the means has proved in the past fruitful of all evil; no means that are impure can bring about an end that is good, else were the Good Law a dream and Karma a mere delusion. From these errors flows an influence mischievous to the whole Theosophical Society, undermining the stern and rigid morality necessary as a foundation for Occultism of the Right Hand Path.

Finding that this false view of Occultism is spreading in the Theosophical Society, we desire to place on record our profound aversion to it, and our conviction that morality of the loftiest type must be striven after by every one who would tread in safety the difficult ways of the Occult World. Only by rigid truthfulness in thought, speech, and act on the planes on which works our waking consciousness, can the student hope to evolve the intuition which unerringly discerns between the true and the false in the supersensuous worlds, which recognizes truth at sight and so preserves him from fatal risks in those at first confusing regions. To cloud the delicate sense of truth here is to keep it blind there; hence every Teacher of Occultism has laid stress on truthfulness as the most necessary equipment of the would-be Disciple. To quote a weighty utterance of a wise Indian Disciple:

Next in importance, or perhaps equal in value, to Devotion is TRUTH. It is simply impossible to over-estimate the efficacy of Truth in all its phases and bearings in helping the onward evolution of the human Soul. We must love truth, seek truth, and live truth; and thus alone can the Divine Light which is Truth Sublime be seen by the student of Occultism. When there is the slightest leaning towards falsehood in any shape, there is shadow and ignorance, and their child, pain. This leaning towards falsehood belongs to the lower personality without doubt. It is here that our interests clash, it is here the struggle for existence is in full swing, and it is therefore here that cowardice and dishonesty and fraud find any scope. The 'signs and symptoms' of the operations of this lower self can never remain concealed from one who sincerely loves truth and seeks truth.

To understand oneself, and so escape self-deception, Truth must be practised; thus only can be avoided the dangers of the "conscious and unconscious deception" against which a MASTER warned His pupils in 1885.

Virtue is the foundation of White Occultism; the Pâramitâs, six and ten, the transcendental virtues, must be mastered, and each of the Seven Portals on the Path is a virtue which the Disciple must make his own. Out of the soil of pure morality alone can grow the sacred flower which blossoms at length into Arhatship, and those who aspire to the blooming of the flower must begin by preparing the soil.

LONDON, July, 1894.

The general propositions found in the above as to morality and the higher type of Occultism are so old and have been so widely spread, so often dwelt on in the work of the Theosophical Society, that one would hardly suppose any member was unacquainted with them; but a good thing cannot be too often repeated, and hence all must instantly concur. The circular was issued in London for distribution, and a copy having been sent to New York it is published according to the desire of the signers.

PERHAPS the first great difficulty which confronts the student of the Secret Doctrine arises from the lack of method which seems to prevail throughout the work. But if in spite of this he can at all familiarize himself with the subject matter, he will almost certainly come to the conclusion that, although from a literary standpoint this lack of method certainly exists, yet from the standpoint of a student of Theosophy it is a great gain. For there is, so it seems to the writer, a deeper method in the seeming lack of it than could have been obtained in any other way. The student, however, at the very outset is warned and may know what to expect, and if he is wise he will lay his plans accordingly. H. P.B. herself speaks of "the necessity under which the writer (H. P.B.) has labored to be ever explaining the facts given from the hoariest Past by evidence gathered from the historical period. No other means was at hand, at the risk even of being once more charged with a lack of method and system."<sup>1</sup> And she has been so charged by those who forget the reason which she herself gave for such lack of method. In considering this we come to another very important matter which must be taken into account in our study of the Secret Doctrine, and a knowledge of which to a great extent reveals the deeper method underlying the seeming lack of it.

The Secret Doctrine is based upon Stanzas from the "Book of Dzyan", a book hitherto unknown to Orientalists, and but little known in the East. These stanzas "give an abstract formula which can be applied, mutatis mutandis, to all evolution: to that of our tiny earth, to that of the chain of planets of which that earth forms one, to the Solar Universe to which that chain belongs, and so on, in an ascending scale, till the mind reels and is exhausted in the effort."<sup>2</sup>

Consider for a moment! In what language could such an abstract formula be written; how could it be expressed? It could only be in a language which is perfectly symbolical, and whose symbols, while primarily representing abstract ideas and being subject to mathematical law, are yet capable of being applied to all the departments of Nature and thus of having as many interpretations. Such a language or writing was "the early hieroglyphic cypher, still preserved in some Fraternities, and named in Occultism the Senzar".<sup>1</sup> In regard to this language it is stated that there was a time when it was "known to the Initiates of every nation, when the forefathers of the Toltec understood it as easily as the inhabitants of the lost Atlantis, who inherited it, in their turn, from the sages of the Third Race, the Manushis, who learned it direct from the Devas of the Second and First Races".<sup>2</sup>

Such was the ancient "Mystery" language, the language of symbolism, which has been preserved to a greater or less extent in the languages in which the ancient scriptures of the World were originally written, and which was the foundation of the Jewish Kabala. Students of the Kabala and of the symbolism of the ancient religions have arrived at the conclusion that all have not only sprung from one primeval teaching but that all bear record to the one primeval "esoteric" language. It is claimed in the Secret Doctrine that from one small volume written in this ancient sacerdotal tongue were derived the books of Kiu-ti, the book of Shu-king, China's primitive bible, the sacred books of Thoth-Hermes, the Puranas, the Chaldean Book of Numbers, and the Pentateuch.<sup>3</sup> So that, since it is the aim of our author to prove the identity of source and symbolism of all the religious teachings of the World, it is inevitable that constant reference to, and quotations from, them must be made. This in itself makes the study of the Secret Doctrine a difficult matter, in that it is the cause, to a great extent, of the seeming lack of method and introduces so many apparent side-issues. But the great difficulty does not lie here, but in the different interpretations which can be put upon all these ancient writings.

The Mystery language has seven keys, symbology has seven departments, and these or at least some one or more of them must be known to some degree if the ancient scriptures are to be understood. But how many understand even one of the keys and can use it? We can to some extent apply the "three fundamental propositions" to all our studies in the Secret Doctrine; we may also be able in some degree to make use of the law of correspondence and analogy for the elucidation of some of its propositions; but further knowledge, knowledge of the science of symbology, is required for the full solution of its problems. Hence it is most important for the student to bear this in mind, and to study with a view to acquiring knowledge of this most ancient science. The work under consideration is not the Secret Doctrine itself, except in so far as much that is there given out has hitherto been secret for the West; it touches only the outer fringe and lifts but a corner of the veil of the true Secret Doctrine which must ever remain hidden from the profane. At the same time, however, it gives the student clues by following which he may learn the A, B, C, of the Mystery language of the Initiates, and so take the first step toward comprehending those depths of knowledge which is in their possession, but which is also the heritage of every man.

In these preliminary articles the writer can do little more than call the attention of the Student of the Secret Doctrine to this most important part of his studies. An important point to notice is the fact that the Science of Symbology depends upon, and is indeed only an application of, the Law of Correspondences, and so ultimately depends upon the "three fundamental propositions". Hence, although we have found what at first sight seem to be different keys to the study of the Secret Doctrine, these are in reality but different aspects of one key which may be applied to all the departments of nature.

Throughout the Secret Doctrine the attention of the student is again and again definitely called to the way in which he may arrive at an understanding of its truths, and of those contained in all the ancient religions and mythologies, in which the deepest mysteries of man and nature have found expression. If therefore he will keep this in mind and follow the hints given him he will find evidence accumulate in support of its statements on every side. In support of the above it will be sufficient to give only two quotations from the Secret Doctrine: others can be easily found by the student himself.

Every old religion is but a chapter or two of the entire volume of archaic primeval mysteries—Eastern Occultism alone being able to boast that it is in possession of the full secret, with its seven keys.<sup>1</sup>

As truly stated by Ragon, 'the ancient Hierophants have combined so cleverly the dogmas and symbols of their religious philosophies that these symbols can be fully explained only by the combination and knowledge of all the keys'. They can be only approximately interpreted, even if one finds out three of these seven systems: the anthropological, the psychic, and the astronomical. The two chief interpretations, the highest and the lowest, the spiritual and the physiological, they preserved in the greatest secrecy until the latter fell into the hands of the profane.<sup>2</sup>

The true value of the Secret Doctrine can only be known by those who read it with reference to the purpose for which it was written, and it has been the writer's aim to point out the main guide-posts, which, however, are no discovery of his, but to which the Secret Doctrine itself is continually directing attention. So far as the method of study is concerned, this will depend largely upon the previous training and capabilities of the student, but by far the greater number of students of the Secret Doctrine recommend, after a general reading, study by topics, for the information on any one subject is, from the very nature and purpose of the book, scattered throughout its two volumes.

The Secret Doctrine is a mine of knowledge and information. Much information can be obtained by a mere reading, but its great treasures do not lie on the surface; they must be dug out, and its pearls can only be had for the diving. It is no wonder that those who look upon this latter part of the XIXth Century as the flower of the Ages should find such difficulty in reading this work, or that they should complain of its lack of method, for "this work is written for the instruction of students of Occultism"<sup>1</sup> and "the rejection of these teachings may be expected and must be accepted beforehand".<sup>2</sup>

The intelligent study of the Secret Doctrine requires persistence and effort, and it is well to realize this at the outset. It may be that the conclusions which the student may reach to-day will be modified, if not completely changed, in the future; indeed, this is inevitable if progress is to be made. For man's outlook is limited, and it must be that, as his horizon widens, new factors will arise which will modify previous conclusions; but if he can make sure of his "fundamentals" and hold to them, he will have a sure guide which will not fail him in any of his investigations of the mysteries of man and nature.

THE COLOR OF THE ANCIENT ARYANS.

THE INNER AND THE OUTER MAN AND THEIR COLORS.

IN an article somewhat curiously termed "The Red Rajputs" published in the October number of the Asiatic Quarterly, the following passage is quoted from the Mahabharata:

The color of Brahmans is white; of the Kshattryas red; of the Vaishyas yellow; of the Shudras black.

The above does not mean that the Brahmins were white like the Europeans, the Kshatryas copper-colored like the Red Indians, the Vaishyas yellow like the Jews, and the Shudras black like the negroes. The four castes could not differ so much in color for the simple reason that long before the Mahabharatic period intermarriages were common and the offspring admitted into that caste, generally or broadly speaking, to which the father belonged.

“Ajam ekam lohita Shukta Krishnam” say our Shastras about Prakriti, the root of the physical or material universe. “The unborn one is red, white, and black, for the gunas (attributes) composing it”, called sattwa, rajas, and tamas, correspond to those colors thus:

Sattwa, white color, shining, wisdom, light;

Rajas, red color, reflecting energy, motion;

Tamas, black color, covering ignorance, darkness.

They correspond to many other things, as may be found in the Puranas, but the above will do for the present. Now in the Brahmins Sattwa-gunam or quality predominates, in the Kshatryas rajas, in the Shudras tamas. The color yellow in our Shastras corresponds to gross matter, and the Vaishyas were engaged in worldly pursuits. The Brahmin represents the wisdom of the nation, the Kshatryas the energy of it, the Vaishyas its material prosperity, and the Shudras obedience and order.

As said in the Bhagavad-Gita, anger and desire are the result of rajogunam, and the Inner Man becomes red when they predominate. Thus in the Shanti Parvan of the Mahabharata quoted in the article but not correctly translated:—

This manifested Universe is all Brahm, it was originally created by Brahma, the color was due to Karma; those twice born who forsaking their own dharma (or law and duty) became fond of kamic enjoyments, sharp, prone to anger, hasty and red-limbed, fell into Kshatryaship.

Varna means color as well as caste; the one is the cause of the other; the skin may be as white as snow, but if rajo-gunam be dominant the Inner Man will be red. Even now our astrologers say of what varna the babe is, no matter whether it is fair or dark, no matter of what caste it may be, according to the positions of the planets at the time of birth. Such varna refers to the Inner Man and not to his physical envelope.

In the following I will try to show the distribution of colors from the beginning.

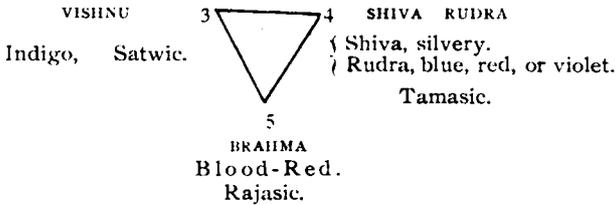

I.
NIRGUNA PLANE.

(Above the three gunas or qualities.)

|---------------------------|-----------------------|
| 1 MAHESWARAColorless. | 2 NARAYANAGolden. |

II.
SAGUNA PLANE.

(Saguna means with the gunas, Nirguna without or above them.)

III.
THE PATH OF RENUNCIATION.

(Nirritti Marga.)

THE SEVEN RISHEES FROM THE
MANAS OF BRAHMA.
Color not given.

IV.
THE PATH OF EVOLUTION,
(Pravritti Marga.)
(5) BRAHMA

THE SEVEN RISHEES CREATED OR EVOLVED
THREE MORE RISHEES ENDING WITH DAKSHA. THEY CREATE.
Color not known.

V.
CREATION.

BRAHMA BECOMES MANU SYAMBHUVU, and creates men in general.

The Seven Rishees create Brahmans and devas of white color.
Daksha incarnates and becomes Prachetas
by falling into generation.

VI.
SEXUAL CREATION.

Prachetas Daksha creates men in general. Some of the Brahmans fall into generation. People multiply, and are divided by a Manu into the four castes according to their qualifications.

The foregoing will further show that the colors spoken of cannot be the color of the skin. For a Western man who tries to materialize everything and thinks himself liberal-minded and scientific if he can but rise above the pigmy conception of Biblical creation said to have begun a few thousand years back, it is very difficult to perceive that the real meaning of passages in the Shastras can often be learnt after you begin to live a real Hindu life, after you learn to meditate long and intensely, after you have a growing faith in our Shastras. Love them and they will repay your patience and labor; study hurriedly, partially, and materialize the teachings, and you will find them self-contradictory, ridiculous, absurd, and what not. Make your choice, for it is said, "The Sun suffers not in splendor if all the blind unanimously say that there is no Sun".

VAST WORKS OF THE PAST.

THE objection is often urged against Theosophical theories that they were produced by Eastern nations, and if we are to judge by India of to-day these beliefs will result in stagnating human effort. But the facts do not support the objection. Indeed, if we think of the present works of man in the West and make any comparison with the older days, we must conclude that ours are the most fragile and will the sooner yield to the destroying touch of time. What modern work is to be compared to the pyramid of Ghizeh in Egypt? None in respect to any of the elements involved. Which of our huge buildings will last for more than ten thousand years? In Chicago the place where most, perhaps, the tall buildings are found in one spot, they say the foundation is really mud, and even now the tallest tower of all must come down and other buildings show signs of weakness. As light convulsion would wreck them all. And what of our records both of literature and science? All will wither, disappear, be eaten up by moth and worm, and after a time not a line be left. What do we record on our inscriptions on buildings when we make any? Only some unimportant names of builder, contractor, or official in the municipality. There are no sentences of art or science or philosophy. And even the foundation stones contain but silly remains and small things of no use to future men. Most of our energy is devoted to getting mere coin that must soon or late be lost or given up, be melted, and altogether done away with. Yet though the Egyptians, who long ago left the scene, held beliefs that we might regard as superstitious, they made buildings and inscriptions and pictures which confront us to-day as the mute proofs of the mightiness of a nation that rules its life by theories we do not accept.

But in India and the rest of the East is where the objection is directed. Even there the facts are to the contrary. What of their tanks for watering towns and fields ; of their great temples ; of their awe-inspiring underground constructions ; of those buildings cut out of the solid mountain with mathematical precision. Can these be the work of people whose beliefs tend to stagnate human effort ? I think not.

The caves of Ellora and Elephanta contain immense images and carvings which would do credit to this day. The caves of Kailas are 401 feet deep and 185 feet wide. Man made these. Inside is a conical pagoda 100 feet high, with a music gallery, five large chapels, a large court, and a colonnade. Three immense elephants are there cut from the stone. An image of Lakshmi reposes with two elephants standing on their hind legs as if pouring water over her. A passage then opens right and left. Thirty feet on there are two obelisks carved, being 41 feet high and 11 feet square. Thirty feet more and you find a great pagoda carved inside and out. There are sixteen pillars, twenty-two pilasters, and five entrances. The roof is carved to represent cross beams, and each pillar is different from the other.

At Ajunta are twenty-seven cut caves, the inscription seeming to give the date of 200 years B.C. What is the temple of Solomon to all this ?

Then look at India's tanks. We would call them reservoirs. That of Lingamputti is a great triangle  $2\frac{1}{2}$  miles long, 1 broad at the base, and 200 years old. Bhusrapatanam tank is 13 miles in circumference ; Guntoor 8 miles ; Gurgi 12 miles ; Shengamalla 11 miles ; Duraji 9 miles. Chambrambakam was twenty miles, and watered sixty-eight villages. Vivanam has a dam 12 miles long. At Hyderabad is a great tank about 20 square miles, watering the city.

All over the East are immense works of the past which we could not duplicate, and which our sordid civilization would not permit us to think of "wasting" money upon. If we seek further and inquire of the works of the mind, the ancient astronomy confronts us. Were it not for it, our astronomers might now be wondering what was the meaning of the backward motion of the sun in the Zodiac, if they knew anything at all about it. It is fair, then, to say that there is no force at all in the objection to Theosophical thought as an Eastern product on the ground that it will or might inhibit effort. On the contrary, it will broaden our civilization and make us create works as great if not greater than those of the past. But we must not ignore the past, for to do so is to incur a sure if mysterious retribution, because that past belongs to ourselves and was a part of our own doing and begetting.

CORRESPONDENCE.

T. S. HEADQUARTERS.

The following letter was sent from New York on August 3rd 1894.

EDITOR THEOSOPHIST,

Dear Sir and Brother:—I beg to call your attention to a very important and vital mistake which has been made by Brother Keightley in paragraph 5 of his letter to the Indian Section, published in Supplement to July Theosophist, and beg to request that this letter be given the same publicity in the journal as was given to his.

In that paragraph, page xxxvii, he asks the Indian Section to make an emphatic protest against what he called "the proposal of the American Section to remove the Headquarters of the Theosophical Society as such away from the sacred soil of India". This extraordinary request must have been made without consideration of the full report of the last American Convention. At that Convention the Countess Wachtmeister, as delegate for the Indian Section, made a proposition for such removal and went into the matter at some length, but the proposal was voted down so far as the American Section is concerned by a resolution which you will find on page 34 of our report; and that resolution was drawn up by myself. We did not wish to consider the matter at all; my personal view is that no such removal should be made, and that idea I hitherto definitely expressed in writing to the President and Mr. Keightley over a year ago; but it would have been discourteous to have paid no attention to the proposition brought forward by the delegate of the Indian Section, and consequently the resolution, which is the third one on the page cited, was drawn in such terms as to politely dismiss the matter. I am in a position to state that at the time this resolution came up I took the same position privately in respect to the matter, stating that I did not think the General Headquarters of the Society should be removed from India: the question of removing the Indian Section Headquarters was one with which we have nothing to do as a Section. And the American Section wishes the Indian Section to clearly understand that it has taken no position in respect to the General Headquarters, except as stated in the Report in which it has stated that it is premature to consider any such change.

The resolution reads as follows:

RESOLVED, That in our opinion it would be premature at the present time to consider any question relating to the removal of the Indian General Headquarters, deeming it advisable to leave such matters to be adjusted when the time for action shall have arrived.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE.
General Secretary.

ST. PAUL, MINN., U.S.A., 7th August, 1894.

Dear Sir:

I have just seen a number of the July Theosophist, and in a letter from Bertram Keightley to the members of the Indian Section there is an error which I should wish to rectify. He states in paragraph 5, "I shall then also ask you to record a most emphatic protest against the proposal of the American Section to remove the Headquarters of the Theosophical Society as such away from the sacred soil of India, the Mother-Land of spiritual science and philosophy". Take away the words "American Section", replace them by "the Countess Wachtmeister", and the paragraph is correct. All who are interested in this subject and who wish for a fuller explanation should turn to the transactions of the American Convention held in April, 1894, in San Francisco.

It is quite true that I made this suggestion to the American Convention, because I think that Adyar is useless to the Society as a whole, being in such a remote corner of the globe. Thus it is only during one month in the year that any real activity takes place in Adyar, that is, during the time of the Convention.

We have so few years left before the end of the century that it seems advisable to me that the President of the T. S. should be in a locality and a position where he could do more effectual work for the Society.

CONSTANCE WACHTMEISTER.

[Note. The foregoing is a copy of the letter sent to the Theosophist by the writer, publication in PATH being requested by her. The Editor of the PATH is not in any way committed to the idea of removing Headquarters from India, but has always thought such removal would be unwise because it is better for many reasons to have the Headquarters in the East. The duties of the President might require constant traveling over the world, but as his executive functions go with his person the Headquarters need not follow his wanderings. W.Q.J.]

LITERARY NOTES.

"GREAT MEN ARE NOT ALWAYS WISE, neither do the mighty understand judgment." The T.P.S. has begun publication of a series of what it calls "Lotus Leaves", the first number being The Voice of the Silence. It is of convenient size and good type, but nevertheless open to the following criticisms: (a) the notes, here called "Glossary", are not at foot of page but at end of book, thus involving perpetual turning of leaves for reference; (b) type of notes is same as that of text, and the figures are too faint; (c) H.P.B.'s work has a title of its own which should not be obscured by a different one invented by the publishers; (d) the cover is somewhat flimsy; (e) a new and improved edition of the Voice having lately been printed in America, with foot-notes on page and other excellences, to issue still another in England, especially if inferior, is wasteful of money and quite needless. One edition can serve both countries.—[A.F.]

JULY THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XXVIII" narrates remarkable instances of "Maya" effected by H.P.B. and one upon her, and of the strange way in which money for her support came at crises. Dr. du Prel's article on "Clairvoyance" is very fine indeed, the analysis through the first two pages being masterly. "N.D.K." in "Eccentric Genius" makes some most just remarks on the respective conduct of admirers and enemies towards brilliant men, and on the danger and error of hero-worship. It is also, no doubt, true that "the study and part acquirement of spiritual knowledge is no guarantee that the moral nature of a particular student may not show undesirable lapses", though better proof may be needful than that adduced,—"Eastern literature gives us instances of saints and Rishis committing deplorable errors". Maybe it is a "deplorable error" to have so low an estimate of Rishis and so high an estimate of Eastern literature. Surely the Theosophist has published enough specimens of that literature amply illustrating its singular confusion of fancy with fact and the sensations it gives anyone with a germ of the historic sense! Poor H.P.B. is of course brought out in exemplification of the thesis, possibly from that motive of dispassionate justice which must ever animate the true Theosophist, possibly—well, otherwise. In "Avatars" Mr. P. N. Sinha makes this forceful statement: "To my mind, the Theosophical movement in its devotional aspect (I mean its later-day exposition by Mrs. Besant) is essentially akin to the spiritual movement inaugurated by Sri Chaitanya",—a great religious preacher regarded by his followers as an incarnation of Vishnu.—[A.F.]

JULY LUCIFER might almost be called a female number, since three of its ablest articles, besides the "Watch Tower", are by women,—“States of Conscientiousness”, Sarah Corbett, “The Rationale of Dreams”, Charlotte E. Woods, “The Meaning and the Use of Pain”, Mrs. Besant. An editorial foot-note to the first reminds that no views of contributors compromise the T.S., but certainly the main body of the paper is so just and instructive, indeed so peculiarly judicious and common-sense, that a few collateral speculations are altogether pardonable. The last two pages are delightful in their illustrations from sound experience. It is a pity that “The Rationale of Death” could not have appeared entire in one number, so good is it, and Eliphas Levi’s panegyric on the Pope, the Immaculate Conception, and the pentagram as an antidote to vertigo when traced on doors, be postponed to the Greek Kalends. In the gentle spirit of large-viewing wisdom warmed by the tenderest compassion for human sorrows with which we can imagine an angel brooding over humanity and yearning to enlighten it, Mrs. Besant expounds the meaning and use of Pain. Strong and kindly, clear and resolute in probing to the source, yet infinitely sympathetic and soothing, hopeful, generous, inspiring, she teaches us why we suffer, how we may surpass suffering, and of the ultimate happiness for all. Dr. Wilder concludes “The Religions of Ancient Greece and Rome” in the same charming spirit and diction as he began it. Mrs. Besant was to leave for Australia at the end of July.—[A.F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VII, No. 6. “The Language of Symbols”, by S. G. P. Coryn, is a philosophical treatment of the importance naturalness, essence, and utility of symbols, the method of their study, and their significance as connecting different planes by correspondence. It is rich in thought, and the first paragraph is a fine example of melodious flow in composition. And yet, perhaps, its estimate of the value of symbolism in religion is excessive. Ornate ritual has never conserved true and living faith; it has chilled and formalized religion; and the remedy for agnosticism or materialism is not a spectacular worship, but a revived truth. Mr. Coryn is probably wrong in thinking that the power of Romanism is increasing, certainly wrong if he refers to educated and thinking men. “On the Higher Aspect of Theosophical Studies” is by Mohini M. Chatterji, reprinted from the Theosophist of March, 1885. It is able and sagacious, subtle in its reasoning and elevated in its conceptions, possibly open at times to criticism—as when Devachanees are said to be without self-consciousness, but certainly from a pen which has been a sad loss to the T.S.—[A.F.]

MERCURY is a new “Theosophical journal issued in the interest of children and young people”, and gives instructive teachings, methods of work, games, apothegms, poetry, news of Lotus Circles, etc. The editor is Mr. William J. Walters, Room 35, 1504 Market street, San Francisco, Calif., and the subscription 50 cents per year. What an excellent thing it is that we are to have a Theosophical periodical for the young; what grand opportunities it offers for real ability and sagacity; and how fitting that it should originate with those marvellous people on the Pacific Coast whose energy, ingenuity, and progressiveness are the despair of us on the Atlantic! It is always said that one of the most difficult things on earth is to talk interestingly to children, but the Californians invented Lotus Circles and are now supplying them with matter. The editor solicits simple articles from children’s friends in all parts of the world: no worthier appeal could well come for anything!—[A.F.]

TRANSACTIONS OF THE LONDON LODGE, No. 22, is “The Culture of the Soul”, by Mrs. Annie Besant. Premising that in the East soul-culture is a definite science and not simply a vague aspiration, the speaker, following the teaching of the Upanishads, explains that the obstacles are the external world, the senses, and the mind, and that the two methods of overcoming them are Hatha Yoga and Raja Yoga. Each is described and the latter commended. The whole lecture is of course edifying and soulful and uplifting, and the concluding paragraphs are as if inspired. The last few pages might well have been amplified, so important a topic needing fuller exposition and additional directions. (Orderable through PATH; 35 cents)—[A.F.]

THE LAMP is still another Theosophical venture. It is a magazine of 16 pages published by the Toronto T.S. and edited by Albert E. S. Smythe, F.T.S., of Toronto, Canada. Price 25 cents a year. The first number at hand is adorned (if you like) with a picture of Claude Falls Wright, who is now in Toronto. A frightful pun is made in the personal notes, on Judge, Wright, and right—irrexcusable. On the whole the issue is breezy and useful. 5,000 copies will be the edition and many will be given away each month.

Mirror of the Movement.

AMERICA.

BUFFALO T.S., Buffalo, N.Y., was chartered on August 21st with 26 charter-members. This Branch is largely the result of Claude F. Wright's work as Lecturer, and begins with vigorous energy as to meetings, Library, and every good scheme. It is the 91st Branch on the American roll. The President-elect is Mr. William A. Stevens, and the Secretary Mrs. Mary A. D. Newton, 644 Plymouth avenue.

THE COUNTESS WACHTMEISTER'S visit to Kansas City was one of remarkable success. With only two days' notice and most of the members out of town, the first lecture was crowded, persons standing everywhere and filling up the corridors. The second lecture was given in Scottish Rite Cathedral upon "H. P. Blavatsky and the Theosophical Adepts." The Countess was never more eloquent or interesting. The third lecture was in the same place and upon "Magnetism and Hypnotism", nearly five hundred people being present. One of the staunchest Spiritualists in Kansas City proposed a vote of thanks to her for the instruction and pleasure she had given, and wished her God speed. The Kansas City papers gave very full accounts of her, together with portraits. On July 22d she went to Lincoln, Neb., for a two days' stay. The Universalist Church, seating five hundred persons, was filled to overflowing each evening, many having to turn away. In addition to the two lectures the Countess held an afternoon and an evening meeting in parlors, both well attended and with lively discussions. On the 24th she departed for Omaha. After the visit to Omaha she passed three days in Sioux City, Ia., the 27th, 28th, and 29th. The lectures on "Theosophy" and "The Difference between Magnetism and Hypnotism" were free and were attended by more than 300; but a much smaller audience was present at the pay lecture on "H. P. Blavatsky and the Theosophical Adepts". The Countess held receptions four hours each day, thereby doubling the good results of the lectures. These lectures were given in the hall of the Y.M.C.A., which was conceded with some reluctance, it having been refused to the Christian Scientists, the Spiritualists, and the Unitarians, but the Secretary afterwards stated that the lectures were unobjectionable and that he was glad the hall had been allowed. The Countess did much for the Dana T.S., which will enter upon its next year's work with renewed vigor and enthusiasm. From Sioux City the Countess went to Sioux Falls, S.D., arriving on the 30th, but a severe wind-storm postponed the lecture to the following evening, when about fifty persons assembled for the lecture. On August 2d the Countess went to Laverne, Minn., held a meeting in the afternoon at a private residence, and received four applications for membership. A free lecture was given that evening to a crowded house. After the lecture she left for Minneapolis. At Minneapolis and St. Paul there was great interest. A large church was taken at Minneapolis and about one thousand people attended the lecture. Two other lectures were given. St. Paul also gave crowded audiences. The Countess spoke to the Scandinavians in Swedish after one lecture, and that may result in a Branch. At Lake City, near by, there was a gathering on the lawn at Mr. Underwood's. Good notices appeared in the papers and the lecture there was well attended. The Countess reached Milwaukee on the 9th, and after receptions and interviews lectured in the evening, doing likewise the next day. Both lectures received long and favorable notice from both English and German papers. On the 11th she reached Chicago, remaining till the 17th. Besides three public lectures, one in a crowded church, she addressed the Wachtmeister T.S. (the Swedish Branch), the Englewood Branch, a closed meeting of all Chicago Theosophists, and a special meeting of the Leagues, held receptions on two afternoons, and throughout her stay answered innumerable questions and gave invaluable information.

SALT LAKE BRANCH has established permanent headquarters and reading-room in Room 505, Progress building. Public lectures are now given every other Sunday, a good attendance of visitors being always present. Private branch meetings are held the remaining Sundays, and in addition it is intended to shortly organize an evening class for study. The Branch has recently abolished all local dues on account of times being so hard, and expenses are met by voluntary contributions. Several new members have been gained.

CLAUDE FALLS WRIGHT lectured before the Aryan T.S. Sunday, June 24, on "Other Worlds than Ours". On Thursday 28th he left for Boston. Three weeks were spent there, during which, in addition to numberless private meetings, he delivered one public lecture in Malden and several to the Boston Branch. On Sunday, July 8th, he lectured to a large audience on "Vibrations", and on the 15th to another large audience on "If Christ came to Chicago". Wednesday, July 18th, he left for Syracuse, N.Y. That evening he addressed a meeting in Mrs. Olcott's drawing-room. July 19th he gave a public lecture on "Reincarnation". July 20th in the Universalist Church he gave a public lecture on "Occultism". "Dreams", "Concentration", "Brotherhood", and "Occult Development" were the subjects of further lectures. He likewise visited Baldinsville and there addressed a number of persons. On Saturday, July 28th, he left for Buffalo, and Sunday, the 29th, he addressed a meeting on "Dreams". On Monday the 30th, at Genesee Parlors, he delivered an address on "Reincarnation". Tuesday he spoke there on "Occultism". Thursday he addressed a large audience on "Concentration", and "Universal Brotherhood" was the title of a lecture the next evening. These meetings were all crowded and increasing in size; on Saturday, August 4th, therefore, a Branch was formed, no less than twenty-six persons signing the charter. On Sunday he left for Cassadega Lake Spiritualists' Camp, and lectured there on "Reincarnation" and "Occultism", returning to Buffalo on Tuesday the 7th. On Wednesday he spoke in the Genesee Parlors on "Madame Blavatsky". Saturday the 11th he arrived in Toronto, Canada. On Sunday he lectured there on "The Theosophical Society". On Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday following he gave public lectures in Broadway Hall, with audiences of about five hundred. On Sunday, August 19th, he lectured there on "Concentration" to a very full house. This is merely the sum of Mr. Wright's public lectures; in addition he has had many private interviews and held parlor meetings constantly. Considerable stir has been made in the papers everywhere that he has been.

IN SPITE OF THE SUMMER WEATHER the work in Chicago has progressed steadily. A new League has been organized by members of the Chicago Branches for the purpose of carrying forward vigorous propaganda work in every direction. It promises to be particularly valuable as an instrument through which all new ideas and plans of any kind relative to Theosophy may be tested, and as a means of placing work within reach of every Branch member. During July the following lectures on Theosophy were given in Chicago: Theosophy and its Mission in the West, Mr. R. D. A. Wade; Budahas of Compassion, Mr. G. M. Willis; The Power of Thought and Self-Control, Miss Eva F. Gates; The Spiritual Nature in Man, Mrs. R. D. A. Wade; and Mans' Place in Nature, Mr. David Gibson.

SUPPORT OF THE T. S.

While deeply grateful to all who have aided me in the carrying out of my plan for the formation of a permanent fund for the prosecution of the Great Work, I am not at all satisfied with results to date. And I cannot but think that only ignorance of the existence of such a plan has prevented its much more rapid growth. I now again request that every member not only forward to me his pledge but that each one form himself into a committee of one for the purpose of spreading information covering the plan and its details. When every F. T. S. in America is fully informed on the subject, then I must, of course, be satisfied with results; but until that time there is work for all to do. I have but one new subscriber to report, J. C. S., in the 25 ct-per-month class. I want more by next month.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

SEATTLE T. S. had Sunday evening lectures in August: Chelas, Yogis, and Adepts, B. A. Welbon; Our Moon, Frederic G. Plummer; Theosophy in Daily Life, Thos. A. Barnes; Astral Bodies, Mrs. Anna L. Blodgett.

DR. GRIFFITHS gave lectures on July 10th and 12th at Santa Ana, Calif., and a "Quiz" on July 13th, all under auspices of Alaya branch. Mrs. S. A. Smith, the Secretary, arranged for a meeting at her residence in Orange, at which the lecturer spoke to a good number. There is a prospect that a study class there will be conducted by Mrs. Smith. From July 14th to 20th the lecturer had a busy week at San Diego. The branch now maintains a headquarters, library, and lecture hall at 7th and E streets, very near the centre of the city. The hall is large, well lighted, furnished with organ, piano, pictures, etc., and seats about two hundred. The rooms are open to the public every afternoon, and an air of earnestness pervades the headquarters. Nearly every evening furnishes some branch work, one important department being the Training Class presided over by Dr. Park, a skilled parliamentarian. Special attention is given to parliamentary proceedings, thus training all the members to conduct public meetings. Such training classes are now a leading feature of many Pacific Coast Branches. Originally started at San Francisco by Abbott Clark, a sense of their value soon spread to other branches. On the 15th Dr. Griffiths lectured on "Brotherhood"; 16th, attended and addressed the Training Class; 17th, lectured on "High Lights of Theosophy"; 18th, held branch and private meetings; 19th, lectured on "Theosophy and Heredity"; 20th, held a "Quiz" meeting. Large audiences attended every lecture. On the afternoon of July 20th a reception and informal meeting was held at the house of Mrs. Hattie Wright. Dr. Griffiths spent Sunday, July 22d, in Los Angeles, and lectured in the Headquarters upon "Theosophy and Heredity" to a crowded house. By special invitation of the Lecture Bureau of the Soldiers' Home near Santa Monica, the lecturer addressed a large number of veterans in the public hall of that institution upon "General Theosophy", and on the 24th lectured upon "Theosophy and Karma" in the seaside town of Santa Monica. On the 25th he attended the regular sessions of Los Angeles Branch and explained the objects and methods of Training Classes. Upon his suggestion a Training Class was organized as an adjunct of branch work. The Unity Club of Pomona, Calif., invited Dr. Griffiths to lecture before it, and he did so on the 26th. Compton was next visited and a lecture given there to a fair audience on the 29th. There is more interest than ever in Theosophy on the part of a large number of Southern Californians, and Los Angeles Branch has its hands full in visiting adjoining towns, lecturing, and doing other T. S. work. As elsewhere, the work falls upon a few. During his last trip in Southern California Dr. Griffiths has visited twenty-six towns, given thirty-six lectures, and held twenty-three meetings. He returned to San Francisco July 31st, after an absence of three months, and will visit Washington and Oregon during August and September. The first two weeks in August were passed in and near San Francisco, attending branch meetings and training classes, lecturing, etc. At the opening of the Oakland T. S. Headquarters, August 3d, Dr. Griffiths spoke upon "Facts and Prophecies of the T. S.", and on the 5th in the State's Prison, upon "Karma and Reincarnation". He lectured August 12th upon "New Phases of Brotherhood" in San Francisco, and on the 18th sailed for Victoria, B. C.

BLAVATSKY HALL, Los Angeles, had lectures each Sunday evening in July, on August 5th one by Mrs. L. E. Giese on Some Phases of Karma, and one by Dr. G. F. Mohn on August 12th upon The various Astral Bodies. Los Angeles is becoming quite a Theosophical centre for Southern California. Work is being done in Pasadena, Ontario, Riverside, Santa Ana, Pomona, Santa Monica, Compton, and Soldiers' Home from this centre. Several lectures have been given at the last two places, and applications from others have come which will be duly filled. The public meetings are well attended, and have the peculiar feature of an entirely new audience each time. Every encouragement is felt.

SHELTON SOLAR T.S., Shelton, Wash., was chartered in July with 9 charter-members. It is the 90th Branch on the American roll. The President is Mrs. Delia F. Kneeland, and the Secretary Mrs. Mary E. Cyphert.

ENGLAND.

"HANDS ACROSS THE SEA."

Some of the English Lodges of the T.S. are already in correspondence with Lodges in other countries, and in order to promote an extension of this very praiseworthy idea the undermentioned plan is submitted to the attention of Theosophists of all countries, as being one which will tend towards the solidarity of the T.S.

It is proposed to open a register for the names of those Lodges that are wishful to enter into correspondence with Lodges in other countries, so that they may be placed in communication. It will be readily seen that many Lodges might be overwhelmed with applicants, while others, less widely known but equally desirous of international communication, might be overlooked. By means of the register system, with all names recorded, this would be obviated. The agency of the General Secretaries of Sections is not used, as they are at present in a state of over-work. There will be no officialism about this scheme: the only duties of the Registrar being to place Lodges in communication with each other and record the fact, and his sole desire being to strengthen the "linked Battalions of the T.S." Will those who think the time ripe for some such effort towards realization of the first object of ours communicate with the undersigned, and will those Lodges that are already in communication with one or more Lodges in other countries notify, in order to avoid confusion?

This notice will be sent to Theosophical papers in India, Europe, America, and Australia, where Lodges might appoint their own registrars, thus facilitating matters still further.

O. FIRTH, Pres. Bradford Lodge.

HAWTHORNE HOUSE, Baildon, Nr. Shipley, Yorks, ENGLAND.

COL. H. S. OLCOTT made a tour after the Convention, going up to the Northern Branches. The trip was in every way successful and beneficial, and the Colonel says he received the greatest kindness everywhere. On August 8th he went to Dublin for a lecture on the 9th. On the 10th he returned to London, expecting to leave there August 24 on the S.S. Peninsular for India. The Buddhist Defense Committee of Ceylon have asked Col. Olcott to try and get them justice from the Government in the matter of the annoying Quarter Mile Clause about Schools, and that occupied some time in London.

GEORGE R. S. MEAD has not yet fully recovered, and expected to go on a much-needed vacation.

QUIET STEADY WORK has been going on in Auckland, N. Z., during the past month. The attendance at the open lodge meetings has been satisfactory. Papers have been read by Mrs. T. E. Hughes, Mr. Stuart, Mr. Sanders, and Mr. Swinnerton. On Sunday evening, June 24th, Mr. W. H. Draffin gave a splendid lecture upon "The Religion of the Future". On July 8th in the Choral Hall Mrs. Sara Draffin lectured upon "Brotherhood and the service of Man the basis of true progress" to a good audience. The Secret Doctrine class keeps up remarkably well.

To answer every question is impossible; many questions lead to various answers.—

T.S. SOLIDARITY AND IDEALS.

THE time seems to have come for me to say a word or two about the constitution and ideals of the Theosophical Society, so that they may be made perfectly plain to the thousands of new colleagues who have entered our membership within the past five years. The American public, out of whose bosom the Society evolved, is entitled to the first word on this subject from their compatriot, whose love for India and absorption in the Society's life have never quenched his patriotic feeling for the land of his forefathers.

After the lapse of nineteen years, the small group of friends who casually met in the drawing-room of H. P. Blavatsky, in Irving Place, New York City, has expanded into a Society with nearly four hundred chartered Branches in the four quarters of the globe; known of all men; discussed, complimented, reviled, and misrepresented in almost all languages; denounced usually, but sometimes praised, in the pulpit and the press; satirized in literature, and grossly lampooned on the stage. In short, an important factor in modern thought and the inspiring cause of some high ideals. Like every other great movement, it has its centers of intensest activity which have developed amidst favoring environments, and as, in other cases, the evolutionary forces tend to shift its swirl from place to place as these conditions change. Thus, for instance, India was the first center where the thought-engendering power accumulated, and our movement overspread the Great Peninsula from North to South, from East to West, before it flowed westward. What was done at New York was but the making of the nucleus, the bare launching of the idea. When the founders sailed away to Bombay in December, 1878, they left little more than the name of the Society behind them ; all else was chaotic and unmanifested. The breath of life entered its infant body in India. From the great, inexhaustible store of spiritual power garnered up there by the Ancient Sages, it came into this movement and made it the beneficent potentiality it has become. It must be centuries before any other country can take its place. A Theosophical Society with its base outside India would be an anomaly ; that is why we went there.

The first of the outflowing ebb went from India to America in 1885-6. Ceylon came into line six years earlier, but I count Ceylon as but an extension of India. After America came Europe. Then our movement reached Burmah, Japan, and Australasia. Last of all, it has got to South Africa, South America, and the West Indies.

What is the secret of this immense development, this self-sowing of Branches in all lands? It is the Constitution and proclaimed ideals of the Society ; it is the elastic tie that binds the parts together : and the platform which gives standing-room to all men of all creeds and races. The simplicity of our aims attracts all good, broad-minded, philanthropic people alike. They are equally acceptable to all of that class. Untainted by sectarianism, divested of all dogmatic offensiveness, they repel none who examine them impartially. While identified with no one creed, they affirm the necessity and grandeur of the religious aspiration, and so bid for the sympathy of every religious-minded person. The Society is the open opponent of religious nihilism and materialistic unbelief. It has fought them from the first and won many victories among the best educated class. The Indian press testifies to its having stopped the tendency towards materialism which was so strong among the college graduates before our advent. This fact is incontestable, the proofs are overwhelming. And another fact is that a drawing together in mutual goodwill has begun between the Hindû, Buddhist, Pârsî, and Mussulman Fellows of the Theosophical Society ; their behavior towards each other at the Annual Conventions and in the local Branches shows that. It is a different India from what it was prior to 1879, and the late tour of Mrs. Besant lightened up the sky with prophetic brightness.

Some wholly superficial critics say that Theosophy suits only the most cultured class, that they alone can understand its terminology. No greater mistake could be made; the humblest laborer and the average child of seven years can be taught its basic ideas within an hour. Nay, I have often proved to adult audiences in Ceylon that any ordinary child in the school I might be examining or giving the prizes to could, without preparatory coaching, be got to answer on the spur of the moment my questions, so as to show that the idea of Karma is innate. I will undertake to do the same with any child of average cleverness in America or Europe. He will not know the meaning of the word, but instinct will tell him the idea it embodies. It all depends on the way the questions are put to him. And I may add that the value of our public lectures and our writings on Theosophy follows the same rule. If we fail with an audience, it is because we do too much "tall talking", make our meaning too obscure, indulge in too stilted language, confuse the ideas of our hearers, choose subjects too deep for a mixed public, and send our listeners away no wiser than they were before we began. They came for spiritual nourishment and got dry bran without sauce. This is because we do not think clearly ourselves, do not master our subjects properly, and being actually unfit to teach and knowing it, wander about through jungles of words to hide our incompetency. What we most need is the use of common sense in discussing our Theosophy, plain, clear exposition in plain language of our fundamental ideas. No one need try to persuade me that it cannot be done, for I know the contrary.

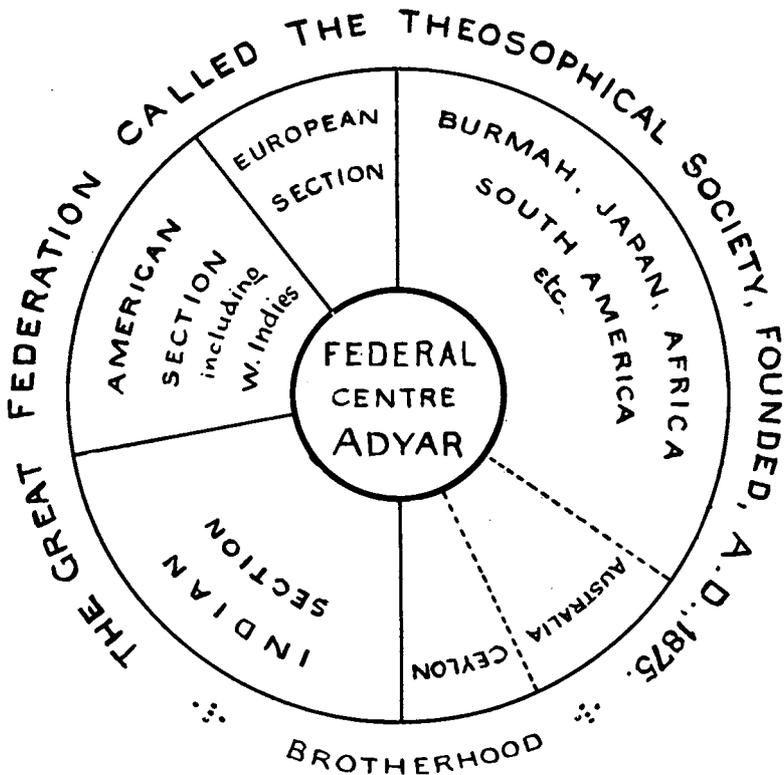

One reason for our too general confusion of ideas is that we are prone to regard Theosophy as a sort of far-away sunrise that we must try to clutch, instead of seeing that it is a lamp to light our feet about the house and in our daily walks. It is worth nothing if it is but word-spinning, it is priceless if it is the best rule and ideal of life. We want religion to live by, day by day, not merely to die by at the last gasp. And Theosophy is the divine soul of religion, the one key to all bibles, the riddle-reader of all mysteries, the consoler of the heart-weary, the benign comforter in sorrow, the alleviator of social miseries. You can preach its lesson before any audience in the world, being careful to avoid all sectarian phrases, and each hearer will say that is his religion. It is the one Pentecostal voice that all can understand. Preaching only simple Theosophy, I have been claimed as a Mussulman by the followers of Islam, as a Hindû by Vaishnavas and Shaivites, as a Buddhist by the two sections of Buddhism, been asked to draft a Pârsî catechism, and at Edinburgh given God-speed by the leading local clergyman, for expressing the identical views that he was giving out from his pulpit every Sunday! So I know what many others only suspect, that Theosophy is the informing life of all religions throughout the world. The one thing absolutely necessary, then, is to cast out as a loathsome thing every idea, every teaching which tends to sectarianize the Theosophical Society. We want no new sect, no new church, no infallible leader, no attack upon the private intellectual rights of our members. Of course this is reiteration, but all the same necessary; it ought to replace a "Scriptural text" on the wall of every Theosophist's house.

Hypocrisy is another thing for us to purge ourselves of; there is too much of it, far too much among us. The sooner we are honest to ourselves the sooner we will be so to our neighbors. We must realize that the Theosophical ideal of the perfect man is practically unattainable in one life, just as the Christ-idea of perfection is. Once realizing this, we become modest in self-estimate and therefore less inflated and didactic in our speech and writings. Nothing is more disagreeable than to see a colleague, who probably has not advanced ten steps on the way up the Himâlayan slope towards the level of perfection where the great Adepts stand and wait, going about with an air of mystery, Burleighan nods, and polysyllabic words implying that he is our pilot-bird and we should follow him. This is humbug, and, if not the result of auto-suggestion, rank hypocrisy. We have had enough of it, and more than enough. Let us all agree that perhaps none of us is now fit for spiritual leadership, since not one of us has reached the ideal. Judge not, that ye be not judged, is a good rule to observe, in this Society especially; for the assumption of perfection or quasi-perfection, here and there, has deceived us into believing that the ideal can be reached, and that whoever does not show that he has reached it is fair game for the critic and the (moral) torturer.

Those who fancy that a vegetable diet, or daily prayers, or celibacy, or neglect of family duties, or lip-professions of loyalty to the Masters, are signs of inward holiness and spiritual advancement, ought to read what the Gîtâ, the Dhammapâda, the Avesta, the Koran, and the Bible say on that subject. One who in spiritual pride reproaches another for doing none of these things is himself the slave of personal vanity, hence spiritually hemiplegic.

Let us keep, cling to, defend, glory in the ideal as such; let nothing tempt us to debase it or belittle it; but let us have the manly honesty to admit that we do not embody it, that we are yet picking the shells on the beach of the unfathomed and uncrossed great ocean of wisdom; and that we, though celibates, vegetarians, "faithists", psychics, spiritual peacocks, or what not, are not fit to condemn our neighbor for being a husband, an affectionate father, a useful public servant, an honest politician, or a meat-eater. Perhaps his Karma has not yet fructified to the stage of spiritual evolution. Or who knows but that he may be a Muni, "even though he leads the domestic life". We can't tell. One of the curses of our times is superficial criticism. How true the saying of Ruskin that "any fool can criticize"!

One thing that will help our good resolutions is to throw more of our strength into the Theosophical Society, instead of giving it all to our personalities. By forgetting ourselves in building up the Society, we shall become better people in every respect. We shall be helpers of mankind a thousandfold more than by the other plan. When I say the Society I do not mean a Branch or a Section—that is to say, a small fragment or a large piece of it. I mean the Society as a whole—a great federation, a large entity, which embraces us all and represents the totality of our intelligence, our goodwill, our sacrifices, our unselfish work, our altruism; a fasces composed of many small rods that might be separately broken, but which, bound together, is unbreakable. The activity at the Headquarters of any given Section is apt to blind the eyes of new members and make them fancy that the Section is the chief thing, and the Federation but a distant mirage. From the office windows of Madison Avenue or Avenue Road, Adyar seems very far away, and the fact of its being the actual center of the whole movement is sometimes apt to be forgotten. This is not due to ill-will, but to the complete autonomy which has been conceded to the Sections. Perhaps the real state of the case may be best shown at a glance by the foregoing simple diagram.<sup>1</sup>

The plan shows three fully-formed Sections, the Indian, American, and European; the sizes of the segments indicating the respective numerical strength in Branches. The dotted lines show Ceylon and Australasia as inchoate Sections, and the broad field remains to be covered hereafter with sectional organizations. The periphery of the whole is the Theosophical Society, which contains all Sections and territories and binds them together with its protecting rim.

The heart, or evolutionary center, is Adyar, or whatever other place may have the Executive Staff in residence; just as Washington is the heart of our American Union, London that of the British Empire, Paris that of France, and every other capital of any nation that of that particular government. The boast of all Americans is that the Federal Government lies like eider-down upon the States in times of tranquillity, yet proves as strong as tempered steel at a great national crisis. So in the lesser degree is the federal constitution of the Theosophical Society, and in that sense have I ever tried to administer its business. We have passed through the recent crisis with ease and safety because of our Constitution, and it is due to that that we are to-day stronger and more united than ever before. Behind us is a wrack of storm-clouds, before us the sun of peace shines. I call upon every loyal member of the Society to do what he can to strengthen its solidarity. To do which he need not desert his household and flit away to some Headquarters ; in doing the work that lies nearest to hand and creating a new center of Theosophical activity about himself, he is furthering the cause which our Society represents probably better than if he went, uninvited, to join a staff where he might be but a supernumerary.

COMMUNICATIONS FROM "SPIRITS";

THEIR SOURCES AND METHODS.

I.

THE complexity of this subject makes treatment of it difficult. So little is known, and challenge of power to know is so natural, that any treatment must be unsatisfactory. Those "spirits" whose existence as active entities wholly in the spiritual world is claimed by the votaries of the worship of the dead, have not told us clearly anything of lasting value. They have had in America distinctly forty years to give the information in, but disagreeing among themselves and not showing in any way a concert of mental action by way of explanation, nothing has as yet resulted from the very sphere where, if anywhere, the knowledge ought to exist. If it be true, as is asserted for them, that those who have reported are conscious, intelligent spirits, then all of them who while reporting to man have failed to lead him to a right conclusion are blameworthy. Some of these entities or intelligences or spirits or whatever they are have, however, made through their mediums assertions of fact about nature and occult physiology which are in my opinion true, but they have not been accepted. Independently speaking in the air, using trance mediums and writings, they have at various times spoken of and described the astral light ; have upheld reincarnation ; have sustained the teachings of Swedenborg, and in many ways indicated a complete agreement with Theosophical explanations of occult nature ; they have shown that materializations of spirits cannot be possible, and that the sometimes really coagulated forms are liable to be frauds of a pious nature, inasmuch as they are not the bodies of the dead nor in any sense whatever their property, that they are over and over again simply surfaces or masses on which pictures of dead or living may be reflected, being thus a spirit-conjurer's trick beyond our power. But they have found no favor, and the cult does not, as a whole, think along those lines. If, then, the "spirits" themselves failed to get credence, how shall I gain any? The scientific world, on the other hand, knows not these realms, and believing not in either Theosophical or Spiritualistic explanations accords no belief to the one or the other. So we will have to be satisfied with just saying what is in mind, trusting to fate and time alone.

Many factors have to be admitted as present in this question. Some of them may be described, but many must as yet remain untouchable.

First. There are the minds (a) of the medium, and (b) of the sitter or sitters or enquirers. Neither can be left out of account. At once this should show how vast is the theme, for it is well known that the mind and its powers are but little known.

Second. Occult psychological powers and faculties of all concerned. This would include the subconscious or subliminal mind of the hypnotic schools.

Third. Physical memory, which is automatic, racial, national, and personal. This is present at all times. To overlook it is simply blindness. To trace it is extremely difficult, requiring a trained mind and trained inner sense. It is that memory which causes a child to catch at a support even just at birth; it is the guide in sleep when often we do acts for preservation or otherwise; it brings up the hate that a man of one race may feel for another race after centuries of oppression or repulsion; it causes the cat, no matter how young, to arch back and expand the tail the moment a dog is near. To say that man, the one who is the last great product of all the material evolution, has not this physical memory would be folly. But I have not heard that the spirits have told of this, nor described it, nor indicated how it may be traced, nor to what extent it acts in the simulation of conscious intelligence.

Fourth. Forces in their law and method wholly unknown to medium or sitters. These constitute the moving power, the writing force, the reflecting power, and all the vast number of hidden powerful forces behind the veil of objective matter.

Fifth. Entities of some kind or another, unseen but present, whether elementals, elementaries, shades, angels, nature-spirits, or what not.

Sixth. The Astral Light, the Ether, the Akâsa, the Anima Mundi.

Seventh. The Astral Body of medium and sitter. I have purposely put this by itself, for it has its own automatic action as much as has the physical body. With it must be also noted its memory, its idiosyncrasies, whether it is new for the person in question or whether it is one that has been used for more than one life, though each time in a different body. For if it be new to the present body, its memories and powers and peculiarities will be different from those of one that has actually been through several lives. It is not so rare in fact that the astral body is an old one; many mediums have strange powers because they have several distinct astral memories due to so much prior experience in one astral body. This alone would furnish a field for study, but we have not heard of the "spirits" telling about it, though some have shown that they experience these multiform personalities.

Lastly, there is the great fact well known to those who have studied this subject from its occult side, that the personal inner self centered in the astral body has the power not only to delude itself, but also to delude the brain in the body and cause the person to think that a distinct other personality and intelligence is speaking to the brain from other spheres, when it is from the astral self. This is for some people extremely difficult to grasp, as they cannot see how that which is apparently another person or entity may be themselves acting through the means of the dual consciousness of man. This dual consciousness acts for good or for the opposite in accordance with the Karma and character of the inner, personal self. It sometimes appears to a sensitive as another person asking him to do this, that, or the other, or exhorting to some line of conduct, or merely wearing some definite expression but being silent. The image seems to be another, acts as another, is to all present perception outside the perceiving brain, and no wonder the sensitive thinks it to be another or does not know what to think. And if the present birth happens to be one in which strong psychic power is a part of the nature, the delusion may be all the greater.

Having briefly analyzed to begin with, let us now go further.

During the history of Spiritualism, many communications have been made to and through mediums upon many subjects. Facts have been given that could not be known to the medium, some lofty ideas have also had expression, advice has emanated, prophecies have been issued, some of the questions that vex the soul have been treated.

That facts of death, kind of death, place where wills might be found have been told, unexecuted purpose of the dead expressed, personal peculiarities of the former person shown, have all been too easily accepted as proof of identity. These things are not proof. If they are, then a parrot or a phonograph may prove identity with a man. The possibilities are too many in other directions for this sort of proof to be final or even competent. The living clairvoyant may, by taking the requisite mental steps, become so absorbed in the person clairvoyantly brought up—both being alive—as to accurately reproduce all the other person's peculiarities. Consequently the same thing done in respect to a deceased may be possible in the same way for a clairvoyant entity on the other side of death reporting to us. But, at the same time, it is the fact that the astral body of the deceased does now and then consciously have a part in such reports by reason of unfinished separation from earth and its concerns, or from gross materiality. In other cases where the astral "shell", as some call it, is involved, it is galvanized by nature spirits or by the power of living beings once men who are condemned by their own character to live and function in the denser part of the astral envelope of the earth.

The very moment we go to a medium, who always forms the condensing focus for these forces and that realm, we begin to draw to us the astral remains of all persons whom we think of or who are enough like us or the medium to fall into the line of attraction. Thus we have in the sphere of the focus those we knew and those we never heard of and who never heard of us when they were alive. Elemental sprites which act as the nerves of nature come also, and they, condensed or plunged into the human astral shells, give a new life to the latter and cause them to simulate intelligence and action sufficient to delude all who are not positively trained in these matters. And this sort of training is almost unknown as yet here; it does not suffice to have followed on the proceedings of hundreds of séances or hundreds of experiments; it consists in actual training of the inner senses in the living man. If the astral shape is coherent it will render a coherent report, but that is what also a phonograph will do. If it be partly gone or disintegrated it will, like a damaged phonograph cylinder, give a confused report or suddenly stop, to be replaced by another, better or worse. In no case can it go beyond facts known before to it, or those known to the inner or outer sense of the medium or sitter. And as these astral shells form the greater part of what come to a medium, this is the reason that forty long years of dealing with them have resulted in so little. It is no wonder, then, that the "astral shell" theory has been over-worn by many Theosophists, causing Spiritualists to think that to be the only explanation which we have. A judicious fear also has contributed to the much dwelling on this theory, for with it come up all the actual and very present dangers to mediums and sitters. These galvanized things necessarily are devoid of conscience, and hence cannot but act on and from the very lowest plane of morals and life, just as may happen to be the left-over material memory of the astral person; and that will vary in accord with the essence of the former life and not with its appearance. Hence we may have the shade of Smith or Jones who seemed to their neighbors to have been good men but who in reality always had low or wicked thoughts and strong desires which law or convention prevented them from giving full expression to. In the astral world, however, this hypocrisy is absent, and the real inner character will show itself or have its effect. And in any case whatever, the material shade of the best of men will not be as good as the man tried to be, but will have all the follies and inner sinfulness of his inheritance against which he struggled when living. Therefore it cannot be that these astral remnants are beneficial to us, no matter who was the person they once belonged to. They are but old clothes, and not the spirit of the man. They are less divine than the living criminal, for he still may be a complete trinity.

But good thoughts, good advice, good teaching, high ideas, noble sentiments have also come from this other world, and it cannot be that "astral shells" have given them. If they were sifted out and tabulated, it would be found that they are not different from what living men have said of their own free will and intent. They are not new save as to means of communication. The strangeness of method very often serves to more deeply impress them on the mind of the recipient. But yet this extraordinary means has now and again led men to give them out as something new in all time, as very wonderful, as a revelation, when the unprejudiced observer sees that they are the opposite, are old or trite, and sometimes mixed up with gush and folly, the product of either one side or the other as might happen. This has cast a stigma on the cult of Spiritualism and made the profane to laugh.

We have therefore to consider such communications which were valuable at the time or to a person, and beneficial in their effect. For were we to refuse to do so, the weapon thus forged will cut the Theosophist who so often is found to be a believer—as I am myself—in communications from Masters or Mahâtmas who are no less spirits, but rather more so, because they are still in bodies of one sort or another.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

THIS picture is one of the later ones taken of H.P.B., not very long before her departure. She is sitting in an English wheel-chair, a kind commonly used all about London, and elsewhere in England, for invalids. The scene is in the garden of the Headquarters at Avenue Road, and the background is formed by a large drooping tree. James M. Pryse stands at her right hand, holding what seems to be a cigarette or tobacco-box. On her left is George R. S. Mead, and him she is holding by his left arm—fortunately for George. All the likenesses are good, and as the photograph was made by an amateur the plate was never retouched. It is somewhat remarkable in that H.P.B. looks so young, leading one not aware of the fact to suppose the plate was retouched before printing. We have a number of pictures of H.P.B. taken many years ago, long before the Theosophical Society was heard of, and purpose reproducing them in these papers either singly or together.

SEEKING THE SELF.

EVERY new mind is a new classification." Every incarnate soul presents us with a new aspect of that Self by reason of which we exist. Yet here is one who has in fact, if not in theory, set around himself a barrier. Within it certain of his fellows have been honored with admission. From them he can learn; others he can only teach. Perhaps those so highly favored are students of older date than he himself; perhaps they are scholars of recognized achievements. What indeed is to be learned from one who cannot even talk good English? Another, hearing that "within oneself the key to the mystery lies hidden", delves within his own mind in search of its secret workings. He is enough for himself, he thinks. He will expound to those unhappy seekers after the objective as much of what he has discovered as they can understand. He has not learned their language; but then how could he? Yet a third will study Nature, will roam the fields, will watch the lilies grow, will listen to the music of the wind as it croons amidst the trees. Man, he says, has become diseased, and is no longer a natural growth, but one of Nature's great mistakes. Or perhaps The Ancients alone were possessed of the occult truth. Nothing worth the hearing or the reading has been written for some two thousand years. This age is matter-sodden; the spirit has gone out of it. Then he buries himself in musty volumes of a bygone age, seeking in them the Light of lights.

Barriers all. Why such false limits to the unlimited? Is not the Self in our midst to-day as yesterday and forever? Is not man, corrupt or incorrupt, Its chief expression, Its long-worn vesture? And if one could judge of a city by one inhabitant, it could only be after many travels through many lands and with a perfect knowledge of race and type and history.

Wise indeed is he who finds his teacher everywhere. In stone and star and scroll, in man and child, in the present and the past—in boundless Nature. Who would exile Life from any point in space? Is there an atom that is not conscious? And is there not Motion and that which moves, both in ourselves and everywhere without? The fall of a leaf, the chance word of friend or foe—both show us the workings of forces which as the agents of law might help in the downfall of nations.

We must interpret other minds by ours; but we must learn to understand our own by those around us. Mind is something more than our own mind. Only a fool in his pride will think that that man at any rate can teach him nothing. There is naught existing from which we have not much to learn. Nor need we make such haste to teach. Many, like live volcanoes, perpetually pour forth a stream of smothering verbiage; not waiting to be asked, seeking but an ear into which to turn their surplus energy. Their word must be heard. Of ignorance in themselves they rarely have time to think. An answer is always ready, though not of necessity correct.

Yet it is possible to teach by proper learning. If we seek in all things their lesson, we give whilst we receive. We admit no barriers; we turn to each and all and listen, looking for the Self. It speaks. The poorest, meaning thing on earth knows something we do not know. By causing its expression, by receiving in humility some simple fact, some glimpse of truth, we teach. Whether it be from man or beast or mineral, we give strength to its inner life. We have called forth that which lay hidden; we have helped in the birth of a thought.

The true learner is a teacher of wisdom. All that he takes he bestows; all that he gives is returned to him with increase. But this give and take is not his doing; it is the movement of that Law upon which he waits.

We have but one tireless Friend, who, though forsaken, forsaketh not ; who, throughout long neglect, standeth at hand, waiting but a call to lighten our hearts of their burdens. His memory doth not fail. When thy friends abandon thee, when they ask of thee a price for their friendship thou canst not pay, this Friend stands as forever unshaken and ready. Yet, oh my brother, if in thy loneliness thou turnest to the faithful One, forget not that he standeth also by those who do not stand by thee. Behind them he is hidden. Then turn not thy face from their sight, lest thou shouldst lose the vision of this thy Comforter and Companion. His homes are not numbered. He answereth thy cry from strange places, though thou callest him from out the chamber of thy heart.

CONVERSATIONS ON OCCULTISM.<sup>1</sup>

STUDENT. What is Occultism ?

Sage. It is that branch of knowledge which shows the universe in the form of an egg. The cell of science is a little copy of the egg of the universe. The laws which govern the whole govern also every part of it. As man is a little sopy of the universe—is the microcosm—he is governed by the same laws which rule the greater. Occultism teaches therefore of the secret laws and forces of the universe and man, those forces playing in the outer world and known in part only by the men of the day who admit no invisible real nature behind which is the model of the visible.

Student. What does Occultism teach in regard to man, broadly speaking ?

Sage. That he is the highest product of evolution, and hence has in him a centre or focus corresponding to each centre of force or power in the universe. He therefore has as many centres or foci for force, power, and knowledge as there are such in the greater world about and within.

Student. Do you mean to include also the ordinary run of men, or is it the exceptions you refer to ?

Sage. I include every human being, and that will reach from the lowest to the very highest, both those we know and those beyond us who are suspected as being in existence. Although we are accustomed to confine the term "human" to this earth, it is not correct to confine that sort of being to this plane or globe, because other planets have beings the same as ours in essential power and nature and possibility.

Student. Please explain a little more particularly what you mean by our having centres or foci in us.

Sage. Electricity is a most powerful force not fully known to modern science, yet used very much. The nervous, physical, and mental systems of man acting together are able to produce the same force exactly, and in a finer as well as subtler way and to as great a degree as the most powerful dynamo, so that the force might be used to kill, to alter, to move, or otherwise change any object or condition. This is the "vril" described by Bulwer Lytton in his Coming Race.

Nature exhibits to our eyes the power of drawing into one place with fixed limits any amount of material so as to produce the smallest natural object or the very largest. Out of the air she takes what is already there, and by compressing it into the limits of tree or animal form makes it visible to our material eyes. This is the power of condensing into what may be known as the ideal limits, that is, into the limits of the form which is ideal. Man has this same power, and can, when he knows the laws and the proper centres of force in himself, do precisely what Nature does. He can thus make visible and material what was before ideal and invisible by filling the ideal form with the matter condensed from the air. In his case the only difference from Nature is that he does quickly what she brings about slowly.

Among natural phenomena there is no present illustration of telepathy good for our use. Among the birds and the beasts, however, there is telepathy instinctually performed. But telepathy, as it is now called, is the communicating of thought or idea from mind to mind. This is a natural power, and being well-understood may be used by one mind to convey to another, no matter how far away or what be the intervening obstacle, any idea or thought. In natural things we can take for that the vibration of the chord which can cause all other chords of the same length to vibrate similarly. This is a branch of Occultism, a part of which is known to the modern investigator. But it is also one of the most useful and one of the greatest powers we have. To make it of service many things have to combine. While it is used every day in common life in the average way—for men are each moment telepathically communicating with each other—to do it in perfection, that is, against obstacle and distance, is perfection of occult art. Yet it will be known one day even to the common world.

Student. Is there any object had in view by Nature which man should also hold before him ?

Sage. Nature ever works to turn the inorganic or the lifeless or the non-intelligent and non-conscious into the organic, the intelligent, the conscious; and this should be the aim of man also. In her great movements Nature seems to cause destruction, but that is only for the purpose of construction. The rocks are dissolved into earth, elements combine to bring on change, but there is the ever onward march of progress in evolution. Nature is not destructive of either thing or time, she is constructive. Man should be the same. And as a free moral agent he should work to that end, and not to procuring gratification merely nor for waste in any department.

Student. Is Occultism of truth or of falsehood; is it selfish or unselfish; or is it part one and part the other ?

Sage. Occultism is colorless, and only when used by man for the one side or the other is it good or bad. Bad Occultism, or that which is used for selfish ends, is not false, for it is the same as that which is for good ends. Nature is two-sided, negative and positive, good and bad, light and dark, hot and cold, spirit and matter. The Black magician is as powerful in the matter of phenomena as the White, but in the end all the trend of Nature will go to destroy the black and save the white. But what you should understand is that the false man and the true can both be occultists. The words of the Christian teacher Jesus will give the rule for judgment: "By their fruits ye shall know them. Do men gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles?" Occultism is the general, all-inclusive term, the differentiating terms are White and Black; the same forces are used by both, and similar laws, for there are no special laws in this universe for any special set of workers in Nature's secrets. But the path of the untruthful and the wicked, while seemingly easy at first, is hard at last, for the black workers are the friends of no one, they are each against the other as soon as interest demands, and that may be anytime. It is said that final annihilation of the personal soul awaits those who deal in the destructive side of Nature's hall of experience.

Student. Where should I look for the help I need in the right life, the right study ?

Sage. Within yourself is the light that lighteth every man who cometh here. The light of the Higher Self and of the Mahâtma are not different from each other. Unless you find your Self, how can you understand Nature ?

ON THE SOURCES OF THE "SECRET DOCTRINE".

IT has often been my fortune to be asked upon what authority the statements in the Secret Doctrine were made, and I thought it might be useful to many members of the T.S. to have the few passages of the book itself that refer to its origins put into a more compact and easily-handled form. At the same time we must never forget the two points upon which H.P.B. herself laid so much stress; first, that nothing was to be accepted by the student simply and solely upon authority, however exalted, but only that to which his own soul testified as the truth; and second, that a large part, even of the esoteric teaching, was allegorical. Bearing these two statements in mind, we have as it were a touchstone wherewith to prove all things and to hold fast that which is good.

In the introductory chapter to Vol. I the author speaks of the "Wisdom Religion" as the inheritance of all the nations, the world over, and states that Gautama's metaphysics and secret teachings form but a very small part of the esoteric wisdom of the world since the beginning of our humanity, while he limited his public instructions to the purely moral and physiological aspect of the Wisdom Religion, to Ethics and Man alone. Things "unseen and incorporeal" the great Teacher reserved for a select circle of his Arhats, who received their initiation at the famous Saptaparna cave near Mount Baibhâr. These teachings, once transferred from this inner circle into the outer world of China, Japan, Siam, and Burmah, soon became greatly changed and corrupted, while early in the present century one key to the ancient symbolism having been discovered, its outer and grosser meaning was eagerly seized as explaining everything, and the literature of phallicism threatened to usurp the place of all other symbolism. And this, says H.P.B., is perhaps "the true reason why the outline of a few fundamental truths from the Secret Doctrine of the archaic ages is now permitted to see the light".

The main body of the doctrines given is found scattered through hundreds and thousands of Sanscrit manuscripts, some already translated, more or less badly, others still in the vernacular. These are accessible to the scholar, while a few passages, taken from oral teaching or from the Commentaries, will be found difficult to trace. However, one fact is certain, says Mme. Blavatsky, that the members of several esoteric schools—the seat of which is beyond the Himalayas, and whose ramifications may be found in China, Japan, India, Tibet, and even in Syria and South America—claim to have in their possession all the sacred and philosophical works, whether in manuscript or in type, in whatever language or whatever character, that have ever been written, from the ideographic hieroglyphs down. And that these works have been carefully preserved in subterranean crypts and cave-libraries in the mountains of Western Tibet and elsewhere, where there are said to be hidden collections of books far too numerous to find room even in the British Museum.

The documents have been concealed, it is true, but the knowledge itself has always been made known to the chosen few through the medium of the great Adepts and teachers. More than one great scholar has stated that there never was a religious founder who had invented a new religion or revealed a new truth. They were all transmitters, not original teachers, and handed on fragments of the truths they had learned, couched in the symbolism of their own special nation.

The teaching of the Secret Doctrine antedates the Vedas, and much of it has only been transmitted orally. The present instalment is based upon the Stanzas of the Book of Dzyan, a volume written in Senzar, the secret sacerdotal tongue, once known to the Initiates of every nation. For this language, besides having an alphabet of its own (says H.P.B. in the preface to the Voice of the Silence), may be rendered in several modes of ideographic writing, common and international property among initiated mystics and their followers. Dan (in modern Chinese and Tibetan phonetics, Ch'an) is the general term for the esoteric schools and their literature. In old books the word "Janna" is defined as "to reform one's self by meditation and knowledge", a second, inner birth. Hence Dzyan (Djan, phonetically), the Book of Dzyan. The only original copy now in existence, says Isis Unveiled (vol. 1, p. 1), is so very old that modern antiquarians would not even agree upon the nature of the fabric upon which it is written. Tradition says that its contents were dictated to the first men of each race by the Divine Beings whose duty it was to instruct them. The old book, having described cosmic evolution and explained the origin of everything on earth, including physical man, gives the true history of the races from the First down to the Fifth, our present race, and stops short with the death of Krishna, which occurred about 4995 years ago.

It is the original work from which the many volumes of Kin-ti were compiled, and not only this and the Siphrah Dzenionta (the most ancient Hebrew document on occult learning), but even the Sepher Jezireh, the book of Shu-King (China's primitive bible), the sacred volumes of the Egyptian Thoth-Hermes, the Purânas of India, the Chaldean Book of Numbers, and the Pentateuch itself, are all derived from that one small parent volume, upon which an enormous mass of commentaries, glosses, etc., have been written. In the Secret Doctrine as we have it, certain portions of the stanzas of the Book of Dzyan are printed, and extracts are also given from the Chinese, Tibetan, and Sanscrit translations of the original Senzar Commentaries and Glosses.

In addition we are told (1, 208) that it is from the Divine Teachers before-mentioned that infant humanity got its first notions of all the arts and sciences, as well as of spiritual knowledge, and it is they who laid the foundation-stones of those ancient civilizations that are so puzzling to our modern scholars. The Druidical circles, the dolmans, the temples of India, Egypt, and Greece, the towers and the 127 towns in Europe which were found "Cyclopean in origin" by the French Institute, are all the work of initiated Priest-Architects, the descendants of those primarily taught by the "Sons of God", justly called the "Builders".

The Secret Doctrine (1, 272) is the accumulated Wisdom of the Ages, but such is the power of occult symbolism that the facts which have actually occupied countless generations of initiated seers and prophets to marshal, to set down, and explain, are all recorded in a few pages of geometrical signs and glyphs. It is useless to say that the system in question is no fancy of one or several isolated individuals, but is the one uninterrupted record covering thousands of generations of seers, whose respective experiences were made to test and to verify the traditions passed orally by one race to another of the teachings of the Divine Instructors who watched over the childhood of humanity. And for long ages the "Wise Men" of the Fifth, our own, Race passed their lives in learning, not teaching, in checking, testing, and verifying in every department of Nature the traditions handed down to them, by the independent visions of great Adepts; that is, men who have developed their physical, mental, psychic, and spiritual organizations to the utmost possible degree. No vision of one Adept was accepted till it was checked and confirmed by the visions—so obtained as to stand as independent evidence—of other Adepts, as well as by centuries of experiences.

In fact, the history of the world since its formation and to its end is "written in the stars", that is, is recorded in the Zodiac and the Universal Symbolism whose keys are in the keeping of the Initiates (II, 438). The records of the temples, zodiacal and traditional, as well as the ideographic records of the East as read by the Adepts of the Sacred Science, are not a whit more doubtful than the so-called ancient history of the European nations, now edited, corrected, and amplified by half a century of archæological discoveries, and the very problematical reading of the Assyrian tiles, cuneiform fragments, and Egyptian hieroglyphics. So are our data based upon the same inscriptions in addition to an almost inexhaustible number of secret works of which Europe knows nothing, and plus the perfect knowledge by the Initiates of the symbolism of every word so recorded.

It was a correct inference of Barth from the study of the Rig Veda, that this Scripture has been compiled by Initiates (II, 451). The whole of the Secret Doctrine is an endeavor to prove this truth. The ancient Adepts solved the great problems of science, however unwilling modern materialism may be to admit the fact. The mysteries of Life and Death were fathomed by the great master-minds of antiquity; and if they have preserved them in secrecy and silence it is because these problems formed part of the sacred Mysteries, and because they must always have remained incomprehensible to the vast majority of men, as they do now.

Such are the statements, in a more or less condensed form, of the sources of that most extraordinary book known as the Secret Doctrine, taken from the two volumes of the work itself, as well as from the introductory chapters of the Voice of the Silence and Isis Unveiled.

SUPERSENSUOUS PLANES AND MIND.

THEOSOPHY affirms the existence of supersensuous planes in the Macrocosm, each of which bears its part in the composition of the Microcosm (man), and occultism—or, in other words, advanced science—demonstrates beyond question the intimate relations between them and the material one which is the field of our mundane experiences. Evidence of their existence is also found in a proper understanding of the operations of the mind. These may be broadly classed as imagination, perception, reception, retention, recollection, ratiocination, and impulsion. That this classification is crudely general may be admitted, but it is sufficiently definite for present purposes, which do not include an exhaustive analysis of the infinitely complex functions of the mind, a work in which even so close and careful a reasoner as Raue found himself hampered by the limitations of a volume of almost six hundred pages.

Ultra-materialists—whom it would be better perhaps to call corporealists—affirm that all thought is a product of molecular modes of motion, mere expression of activity in brain-tissue cells, and point to the discernible effects of mental action upon the gray matter of the brain as evidence in support of their hypothesis. This is as correct as it would be to say that the copper of the etcher's plate originates the picture which, in lines and dots, is bitten into its surface by the acid skilfully applied by the artist in conformity to the requirements of the ideal in his mind. The fact of the matter is that the gross matter of which the brain is composed, whether gray or white, great or small in quantity, and much or little convoluted, is of itself as little capable of originating thought, or even sensing an impression, as a stone would be, or the brain itself if the life-principle were separated from it. But within that brain, present in every molecule and even atom of it—yet as far beyond the corporealist's discovery as the conditions of life on Sirius—is the astral brain, which is also matter, but of such tenuity in its atomic constitution that it may not be, in any way, apprehended by our gross senses.

The functions of that astral brain are perception of sensations and their translation to the mind, and the application of the conative forces resultant from such mental cognition to the direction, through the gross brain, of subservient physical impulse. What, then, is the gross brain? Simply a cellular aggregation of molecular matter having such specialized differentiation as enables it to store up, as impressions, the vibrations conveyed to it by the astral brain, holding them as latent vestiges of sensation and, when required, translating them to the lower rate of vibrations appreciable by the denser molecular matter of the body, so becoming the immediate motor force for action. The capacity for development with which it came into being was a matter of Karmic award, being prescribed by its environment, the hereditary influences upon it, and various other circumstances which it is not necessary now to particularize, all having their effect in determining its quality—as the sun, air, soil, and moisture govern the growing plant—but nothing endowing it, in any degree, with the power of starting vibrations, or—in other words—originating thought. Even the primitive forces, the capacity for mere sensory perceptions, do not belong to the gross brain but to the astral brain, in which it is not unreasonable to suppose they inhere as unconsciously-cherished remainders from the exceptionally strong range of impressions naturally resultant from preceding existences, subject to the needs and desires of the corporeal form.

Those who affirm the capacity of gross matter to generate thought assume to find support for their hypotheses in the waste, by mental energy, of the gray tissue of the corporeal brain, but they might as well ascribe to flowing blood the cutting of the vein from which it issues. The waste is an effect, not a cause. All energy is destructive, or, to speak more accurately, is reconstructive, and "the power which builds, unbuilds, and builds again" is ceaselessly at work. Molecular disintegration is hastened by all activity in every sort of tissue, and, if a proper balance is maintained, the work of molecular reàrrangement is proportionately hastened by nutrition. Some scientists now affirm that cholesterin—a fatty salt found in the bile, lungs, and brain, and for which until very recently nobody saw any particular use—is the especial nutriment of the grey matter of the brain. Will the corporealists affirm that it is the cholesterin which does the thinking; that an heroic impulse or poetic thought is flattened crystals, insoluble in water but solvable in alcohol and ether, having well defined angles of crystallization and obtainable in quantity from gall-stones? The gentlemen who study mind from the standpoint of matter know a little about the physical brain, but not all, by any means, even of that. Is there one of them who knows the use of the pineal gland—which Descartes affirmed to be "the seat of the soul"—or can account for the gray sand found in it, not present in idiots or infants, scant in old age, and most abundant in middle-age brains of notable mental vigor?

The primitive forces already spoken of manifest themselves in the earliest moments of an infant's existence and do not cease while life lasts. They all tend towards experience of and repletion with external stimuli which correspond to their nature, and all experiences of sensation thus perceived are recorded in the plastic substance of the molecular brain as vestiges which may be stirred from latency to manifestation either by repetition of the stimuli primarily causing them, by contrasting stimuli, or by a strenuous effort of the mind, consciously or unconsciously applied, as conative vibrations, through the astral medium. Evidently the depth of such latent impressions must be proportioned to the strength and frequency of the experiences of like stimuli of which the vestiges are resultants. Hence it is but natural that the larger number of vestiges accumulated from the lower, or animal, senses —which are most productive of experiences in corporeal life—should eventually predominate in strength over those of the higher or intellectual range. And this affords an explanation of the power of Kama—or animal desire—in controlling our lives, so that a pessimistic good man has been moved to declare that “man is born to evil as the sparks fly upward”. It also, if we reflect upon the extensions of this influence, enables us to comprehend the seeming mystery of the formation, during life, of the Kama-rûpa, the wholly animal soul which becomes perceptible after death as an objective entity. And it makes apparent why and how men’s characters are so often stamped upon their bodily features and forms. All the sensualities and vices that stain men’s souls stamp themselves first in deep impressions upon the plastic brain, and thence find expression in the outward form to every part of which that brain extends its influence. It is erroneous to suppose that the brain is all lodged in the cavity of the skull. It is in the spine and the nerve ganglions, and practically throughout all the extensions of the nervous system. Virchow characterized the new-born child as “an almost purely spinal being”, and Pfluger’s experiments upon frogs demonstrated that consciousness of sensations, capacity to locate them, and power to direct corporeal action were all retained by the unfortunate batrachians upon which he experimented, after their skulls had been emptied of brain matter. The transference of consciousness of a still higher range from the brain to the solar plexus, under certain abnormal nervous conditions, may also be cited as an additional evidence of the diffusion of the specialized matter responsive to astral vibrations. So throughout the entire man runs his gross brain, and coëxtensive with it his astral brain, energizing it, directing its formative work of giving outward demonstration, in all his physical being, of what he has made of his soul.

Perception of sensations and their retention as vestiges for stimulation of conative force at the command of recollection—which is a mandatory vibration in the mind—may then be said to be powers located in the astral brain and its tool, the gross organ. But beyond these is the higher range of faculties, ratiocination, reception of purely mental impressions—either from purely subjective concepts or by reflection from the mentality of another—and finally the power of impulsion of mental force upon others. All these must necessarily, to be made potential, find translation through the lower rate of the astral medium to the still further diminished rate of the gross brain, if eventual manifestation on the material plane is sought, but not otherwise.

That sensory perception is an attribute of the astral brain and not of the corporeal is sufficiently evidenced by its highest manifestation in the experience of the many who possess the power of "seeing on the astral plane" either normally or under the abnormal stimulus of some phase of hypnotic control. The entities seen by so-called "spiritualistic mediums", and which they mistake for spirits of the dead, are on the astral plane. Charcot, Binet freres, James, and many other investigators have shown the ability of a hypnotee to become a witness of things which were not within the range of physical perception and, being outside the knowledge of any person whose mentality could have reached the subject, could only have been sensed through perception of astral vibrations. And the state of statuvolism, or self-induced trance is simply an excitation of the astral percipiency to an abnormal degree.

These phenomena must not be confused with others, very closely related yet altogether different, in which the compelling force of one mentality exerted upon another is very clearly demonstrated. The mind of every human being, in proportion to its development, possesses individual capacity in ability to reason, to draw deductions from vestiges of perceptions at its command, or impressions of a higher range, and thus to elect for itself between good and evil. It is this which constitutes its moral responsibility and determines its evolutionary progress, whether downward under the domination of its Kamic control or upward to spiritual life. But it is likewise susceptible, in greater or lesser degree, to the vibrations projected upon its plane by other minds, affecting and in some cases even paralyzing that power of ratiocination. This is the case when it is subjected to the will of another mentality exercising upon it hypnotic control, when it is rendered mentally—and it would justly seem—morally irresponsible. It may, on the other hand, be sufficiently forceful to impel such vibrations on the mental plane, in the same way take from others their mentality temporarily and even, to some extent, permanently. Herein lies the awful danger attendant upon the practice of hypnotism, for both the "hypnotist" and the "sensitive".

JAMES H. CONNELLY.

WOULD UNIVERSAL LANGUAGE AID UNIVERSAL BROTHERHOOD?

ONE language for all men would greatly help their progress to brotherhood; but diversity of language is an obstacle in the path. The T.S. ought therefore to have a common medium of intercommunication, able to stand of its own strength side by side with mother speech, supplementing but not supplanting it. It ought, moreover, to be of speedy acquirement; for life is short and we have many other things to learn.

Such a medium exists in the invention of John Martin Schleyer. It is as universal and as well established as is mathematical, chemical, or musical notation.

Why not adopt English or some other natural language? Consider the difficulties. Natural language, evolved out of fusion and confusion, still retains a mass of irregularities and idioms which, though they charm the philologist, distress the student and exhaust his time and energy. The majority of beginners drop a foreign language on encountering the irregular verb. The gem of English scintillates many a ray, but not for foreigners; they find our language as difficult as we find theirs. Translation is often neglected, and at best is slow and imperfect. Unfathomed literatures bear many a gem unseen. Would you hide from the major portion of humanity the jewels that sparkle on the brow of Truth? You have only to refract them through a natural idiom.

Why not, then, adopt this invented language? There is no reason why not. Consider the advantages: a common speech in international conventions, correspondents in all parts of the world, increased literature for students, increased clientage for authors, wider dissemination of doctrine. In less than a year after its adoption, the Theosophical world would be solidified. Babel would cease. Workers would reorganize and complete the path to the sky.

Is it not a kind of outlandish jargon? By no means. It is not English, you know; but its every sound is found in our language except that of dotted u, which is quickly acquired by the practice of saying "ye" with the mouth adjusted for saying "you".

Is it difficult? On the contrary, it is ridiculously easy. It has no artificial genders, no irregularities of any kind. There is but one declension and but one conjugation.

Is it serviceable? Very. It can express any thought; for it is extremely flexible. Nouns, for instance, have tense forms when capable of tense meanings.

How long will it take to learn it? That depends. The question resembles: How long will a shoe wear? Premising the intellectual activity of a Theosophist, it will require no more than five seconds to learn declension, five minutes to learn conjugation, five hours to learn the whole grammar; and after five days' practice one can speak and correspond.

What is it called? Volapuk, which means World-Speech.

S. KADEMAL.

Boston.

NOTE.—With the merits of Volapuk we have but little to do, and not knowing it cannot criticise its structure or use for present business purposes. The article above is interesting as raising the question whether a language universal which was manufactured would aid universal brotherhood; and another one, would any language aid it? As it is seemingly clear that violations of universal brotherhood grow out of the character and not the language of the violators, it would seem to follow that no new language would prevent the violation. We see that peoples who have one language are at war with each other and kill one another. The American revolution arose among and against those who all had English as their one language and at that time very well understood by the revolutionists. Now if they had Volapuk it would not have been different. The war and strife and blood grew out of regulations having their foundation in character, for the ideas of the English caused those governmental regulations that set the fathers on fire; yet both sides used English as their universal tongue. Evidently it was character, idea, rule, regulation, and the like that made the occasion for conduct opposed to brotherhood, on whichever side you put the onus of the violation. Races like the Chinese have a common mode of writing which people of vastly different tongues can read universally, but they are and have been plunged in war; would any other common language have made the slightest difference? I think not. While it is true that a universal language would be a good thing, still is also true that the average level of intelligence is low and that the highly-cultivated person is far above the average. The universal tongue would have to be limited to the low level of the mediocre average so as to be understood by all, or else the cultured ones would have to deal in another set of terms to express their higher ideas; this would be tantamount to a newer language than the first, and so on ad infinitum. When, however, the race is entirely raised up to a right level of morals, conduct, character, aspiration, and ideal, then we will be ready with profit to have the universal tongue. The confusion of tongues grew out of change of nature due to evolutionary differences in races, and each made its own language, based fundamentally on national character. Meanwhile it would seem that Volapuk will be confined to a limited circle of the human family.

The universal method of writing used in the occult lodges forms no ground for the argument in the article by Mr. Kademal, because the use of that language is preceded by a change of conduct, ideal, and character. This universal method actually exists to-day and in several forms, while it is probably true also that a still older system was used in the very ancient records to some of which H.P.B. had access; but still and again the characters of those who used that form were noble, high, world-dominating, and not such as the average of this century.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DEAR PATH:—I have a suggestion to make. Not long ago at the British Museum I saw a list of books treating of Cagliostro. There were about twenty-five, and doubtless the Museum contains many more telling of the three other agents of the Brotherhood in the last century—St. Germain, Mesmer, and St. Martin. The libraries of Paris would furnish even more material. Out of this mass of matter a good French scholar could be enabled to gather sufficient material for a large book that would be extremely interesting and have a large sale. I have had the pleasure of reading many accounts of these men, from books in the Astor Library. They gave details as to the character, methods, incidents, phenomena, and errors of the leaders of the movement of that day, which would not only be entertaining, but instructive, to all of our members. Perhaps the recital of errors of the movement in the last century would enable us to avoid them in this. I trust that some capable Fellow in Europe will undertake the task.

JOHN M. PRYSE.

LITERARY NOTES.

AUGUST THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XXIX" is of H. P. B.'s personal traits and habits and peculiarities, a most vivid account and of intense interest. Nothing about her should be lost, and Col. Olcott is doing what no one else can. Her reduction of flesh by mesmerized water, her great musical skill and her beautiful hands, the former marvellous when she was taken possession of by one of the Mahâtâmâs, her strange costume at the theater, the gold chain for the Newfoundland dog, the explanation of her unconventionality, and her singular ideas of loyalty and accuracy,—all are delightfully described, and the concluding paragraph of this Leaf is one of the Colonel's finest. The remarks on vegetarian diet are of preëminent common-sense, wisdom, and practicality. Dr. DuPrel's "Clairvoyance" will, one must certainly hope, be published as a book when complete, to match his great work on Dreams. There are several long articles distinctively Eastern in quality, but of unusual sense and intelligibility, really meritorious.—[A. F.]

AUGUST LUCIFER. "The Rationale of Death" concludes: it is a singularly fine paper, particularly so in its description (p. 486-7) of post-mortem stages, though one may question the preceding assertion that the same molecules of a man's body reappear incarnation after incarnation. "Devotion and the Spiritual Life", by Mrs. Besant, is a publication of her lecture delivered before the Blavatsky Lodge during the Convention week. Éliphas Lévi has performed a doctrinal somersault, and now "goes for" Roman Catholic doctrine after a fashion not inferior to Col. Ingersoll's. Yet the Colonel would hardly have described Antichrist as the "misbegotten" child of an "impotent eunuch"! Mr. Mead contributes a short essay, "Onward", with mysterious references and muffled allusions, so portentous in tone and yet so Delphically indefinite that the agitated reader, filled with vague terrors, cries out at last "Why doesn't he say out what he means?" The Report of the European Section Convention is very interesting. There are now 46 Lodges and 50 Centers in Europe; the Section Library has 1400 books; the H. P. B. Memorial Fund is being used to produce A Modern Panarion, a collection of her fugitive writings. The reviewer in Lucifer should remember that omitting an important word from a quotation alters the sense: see page 525.—[A. F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VII, No. 7, contains a profound metaphysical article on "Consciousness" by R. B. Holt, with many references and quotations. An occasional sentence is intelligible to ordinary readers and reviewers, but the rest baffles both. Hence no criticism is possible, though there survives a pleased satisfaction that the Theosophical Society is evolving writers who can hold their own among the Teutonic and Anglican discourses upon the incomprehensible, and can even compete without shame with Eastern thinkers in that field. "The Heresy of Separateness" is reprinted from Lucifer. It does not perceive that "charity" has to do with motives, not with facts, and that shutting one's eyes to facts is no tribute to truth either in our own souls or in the world without. The doctrine that to perceive an evil is as bad as to commit it may beguile a few old women of both sexes, but not level-headed thinkers and reasoners.—[A. F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VII, No. 8, is on "The Myth of Prometheus". The decision of the T. P. S. to discontinue Siftings after next February, deplorable as it would be if Dr. Herbert Coryn contributed further, could not be regretted if future issues were like No. 8. There are some very sensible reflections in the middle part, but the mass of it is mere matter taken from the Secret Doctrine et al., most quoted and the rest borrowed. "Madame Blavatsky says" occurs thirteen times, besides other introductory formulæ or only quotation marks. This habit of perpetual drafts upon the S. D. and incessantly using its terms and ideas is becoming unspeakably wearisome to readers of Siftings, not merely because it is generally used with the complacent air of one who is armed with a conclusive weapon, but because all people get tired of having any single idea drummed into them in season and out of season. Human nature rebels. One does want some intelligent and independent thought, something more than a hash from H. P. B., "Shun the man of one book" is as true as ever. If "students of the Secret Doctrine", of whom we hear so much, could realize how tiresome their speech and pens are apt to become, Theosophical literature would be improved, Theosophical brains be more than receptacles, and some contemptuous expressions from other no less devoted friends of H. P. B. be saved.—[A. F.]

THE WEALTH OF INDIA, a monthly magazine solely devoted to the English translation of the best Sanskrit works. This publication, of which the first volume of twelve parts has been received, has so far been devoted to the translation of the Srimadbhagabatam and to the Vishnu Purâna, the most complete of all the Purânas. The translation is very readable, but it is to be regretted that so often enumerations of objects or qualities are cut short by "etc." It is much to be commended that native Hindû publishers are doing their part towards putting their own sacred Scriptures into the hands of English and American readers.—[J. H. F.]

THE UNKNOWN WORLD is a new English monthly of 48 pages "devoted to the Occult Sciences, Magic, Mystical Philosophy, Alchemy, Hermetic Archæology, and the Hidden Problems of Science, Literature, Speculation, and History". It announces as its sphere whatsoever "lies behind the mountains of our ignorance", and promises the fullest and most competent investigation into White and Black Magic, Necromancy, Divination, Astrology, Witchcraft, Elementals and Elementaries, the Illuminati, Esoteric Freemasonry, the Mysteries, the Mystics, etc., discarding extracts from contemporary literature. The threefold division of Mysticism is stated to be Transcendental Science, Transcendental Philosophy, and Transcendental Religion. A series of papers on Alchemy is begun, also one by Edward Maitland on "The New Gospel of Interpretation"; Mr. Sinnett writes on "The Theosophical Revival"; the Rev. G. W. Allen copiously explains Christian Theosophy under "The Place of Evil in God's Order"; there are articles on Mysticism in Poetry, The Hermetic Doctrine of Paracelsus, The Rosicrucian Mystery, Lord Bacon and the Mystics, etc. Promise is made of much information never before published in regard to Occult Science, the history of secret societies connected with Mysticism, and the rituals of the Black Art. In all that is said of the purposes of the magazine a devout and reverent spirit appears. Divine things are always treated as of first importance, and serious resolve for Truth is everywhere indicated. Whether so large a program can be fully verified, and whether the editor, Mr. Arthur Edward Waite, is competent to that verification, of course cannot be settled by one number. If both are demonstrated in the career of the magazine, no heartier congratulations will come from any quarter than from the PATH. Its appearance, indeed, is fresh evidence of the increasing interest supersensuous matters have for the age, and its serious tone augurs hopefully. Single numbers are sixpence, and the annual subscription is six shillings.—[A. F.]

Mirror of the Movement.

AMERICA.

EXPULSION. Mr. Geo. W. Gerhardt, a member of the Syracuse Branch, was expelled from the Branch and from the Theosophical Society on Sep. 5th, after due notice and trial. By unanimous vote it was decided that the charges should not be made public, but the finding and sentence were submitted to the General Secretary and by him unqualifiedly approved. This is the man who claimed to have been in India and to have received various degrees in Adeptship, publishing nonsense to that effect in the press and bringing the T.S. into disrepute. But he now has one real degree—E.F.T.S. (Expelled Fellow Theosophical Society). [Lucifer and the Theosophist please copy.]

CLAUDE FALLS WRIGHT lectured to a large audience in the rooms of the Toronto Branch on Tuesday, August 21st, upon "First Principles. The following evening he spoke on "Man", Aug. 23d upon "Death", and Aug. 24th upon "Schools of Occultism". These meetings were all crowded. His visit to Toronto closed with a public lecture on "The Adepts" in Broadway Hall, Sunday, Aug. 26th. He then left for Bar Harbor, Maine, being invited there at the suggestion of Mrs. Dunbar Hunt. A day was spent in making calls and working up lectures, and on the evening of Aug. 31st he addressed a meeting in Mrs. Barney's drawing room on "Theosophy". The next afternoon he addressed a meeting at Mrs. Place's on "The Theosophical Society". A very large audience was present on Sunday evening, Sept. 2d, at St. Sauveur Hotel to hear a lecture on "Reincarnation", and a still larger one was present the following evening at his address on "Occultism", the rooms of the Belmont Hotel, where it was held, being crowded. Mr. Wright then had immediately to leave for Syracuse, N.Y. He stopped a few hours in Boston on the way, and arrived in Syracuse Sept. 5th. That evening he attended a business meeting of the Branch. Friday 7th he lectured to the Branch on "Dreams". Saturday 8th he addressed a meeting in Mrs. Mundy's drawing-room on "The Secret Doctrine". On the 10th he held a meeting of members. On the 12th he gave a public lecture on "Madame Blavatsky" in the Vanderbilt Hotel rooms. On the 13th, in Mrs. Olcott's parlor, a meeting of the Society was held to engage rooms, etc., for a headquarters in Syracuse. Friday and Saturday were spent in arranging about them and fixing on suitable quarters. On Sunday, Sept. 16th, an inaugural meeting was held in the new rooms, 131 Bastable Block, and Mr. Wright gave an address on "Concentration". On Sept. 17th and 17th meetings of members were held in the rooms, and on the 19th Mr. Wright gave a public lecture on "Symbolism". He now goes to Cleveland, Dayton, and Columbus, Ohio.

BURCHAM HARDING has returned to Boston and will continue the work of forming centers in the New England States. At the Boston headquarters he opened the winter season of Sunday evening lectures, taking for subjects "Perfectibility of Man" and "States after Death". The center at Worcester has been visited and lectures given in College Hall. That center is now firmly established with a weekly study class conducted by its own members.

THE COUNTESS WACHTMEISTER visited Hot Springs, Ark., and lectured on the 21st and 22d of August, having a special meeting for Theosophists on the afternoon of the 23d. The Countess's visit to Cincinnati was very brief, but she delivered two lectures in Dayton, which might have been well attended had the most ordinary steps towards advertising been taken and proper arrangements made. She then went to Columbus, giving lectures as usual and stirring up great interest and enthusiasm in the Branch. On the 3d, 4th, and 5th of September she staid in Toledo, and the Unitarian Church in which the lectures were given was crowded, many persons standing. Open meetings for inquirers and special meetings for Branch members were also held. An unwise minister by the name of Brandt who attacked the Countess was replied to by her, and perhaps wished that he had been more cautious. Thence she went to Sandusky, accepting the hospitality of Miss T.H.B. Davis. On the night of the 8th she lectured in the Hall of the West House by invitation. There were about 100 persons present. One result of the visit to Sandusky was the formation of a new Branch under her auspices. Prior to this, however, the Countess made a visit to the Island of Put-in-Bay, giving a lecture in the Town Hall to between 150 and 200 people, the audience being made up of the very best class of Islanders and summer visitors. The next day she spoke at the funeral of Miss Holly, and her remarks were so beautiful that all were deeply impressed. Very great help had been given to the Theosophical movement by a sermon against Theosophy preached by the Rector of the Island, the sermon stirring up the population to find out all about Theosophy. A reading class has been started and literature is in great demand. On Sunday, the 9th, the Countess arrived in Jamestown, N. Y., and addressed a large audience upon "Theosophy" that evening. On Monday evening she lectured upon "Magnetism and Hypnotism", a pay-lecture and not so well attended. On Tuesday evening she met the Branch and gave valuable suggestions in regard to Branch work. The universal conviction was that her visit had accomplished great good. On the 13th the Countess reached Philadelphia and lectured to women and girls in the hall of the College Settlement. After the lecture some girls belonging to the Daisy Chain Club expressed to the Countess a wish to attend her lectures on Friday and Saturday. Tickets of admission were given them, but they did not attend, probably because "orthodoxy" judged that unwise. On Friday afternoon the Countess held a public reception in the room of the Krishna T.S., and in the evening lectured on "Theosophy" to a good audience. On Saturday, the 15th, she held another public reception, and from 4 to 5 met the members only, whereat she dwelt on the importance of concentrating work in the Branch. In the evening she lectured on "Magnetism and Hypnotism". On the 16th the Countess left for New York, and on the 17th went to Boston. On Tuesday evening she lectured upon "Theosophy", on Wednesday afternoon spoke to the Swedes and Scandinavians, attended a reception on Wednesday evening and spoke for an hour on H. P. B., etc., and on Thursday lectured upon "The Difference between Magnetism and Hypnotism" before a large meeting, so crowded that many were turned away. During the Boston visit she met innumerable visitors and accomplished much good. On Friday the Countess returned to New York and lectured before the Aryan Branch in the evening on "Theosophy and H. P. B." On Sunday evening she lectured before the "H. P. B." Branch in Harlem upon "H. P. Blavatsky, the Theosophical Adepts, and India", and on Monday evening, the 24th, lectured before the Brooklyn T.S. On Tuesday evening the Countess held a special meeting of Theosophists only, then attended the regular weekly meeting of the Aryan Branch and said some gracious words of farewell to the members, and on Wednesday, the 26th, she departed for Europe in the "City of Paris".

THE CINCINNATI BRANCH has found it necessary to once more remove to other meeting rooms. In no sense is this a backward step, for it will take up its winter's work in a large hall in the Lincoln Inn Court, 227 Main street, adjoining the Custom House and Postoffice. Within a radius of one square is the central crossing of every street railroad in the city. The hall is lighted on three sides, and will seat some two hundred people. The hall is up one flight of stairs, and the building is a first-class office structure filled with lawyers. Arrangements are about complete to furnish one of the large daily papers a column article on Theosophy for each Sunday issue. The plan of work pursued will be much the same as in other quarters,—public lectures and free discussion for open meetings, and the study of the Secret Doctrine once a week.

THE SYRACUSE T.S. opened its new room, 131 Bastable Block, on Sunday evening, Sept. 16th, with a public lecture by Mr. Claude F. Wright on "Concentration". The rooms were well filled and much interest manifested. Mr. Wright has done much to help the Society over some rough places, and it is in good working order. There will be regular public meetings on Sunday and Wednesday evenings, also classes for the study of the Secret Doctrine, the Key to Theosophy, and "Christianity in the Light of Theosophy", on other evenings during the week. The members have given their books on Theosophy to the Library, thus increasing its reading matter, and those who take the PATH and other magazines will leave them for use on the table in the room. Mrs. Frances Myers has kindly volunteered to give all her time to the work, and the rooms thus have a permanent secretary. Under her supervision they are open during the day from 10 to 12 and from 2 until 5, other members having charge in the evenings, when they are again open from 8 to 10.

THE CORINTHIAN BRANCH of the Theosophical Society has met regularly during the winter and summer at the Maschmedt Farm, and the class in the Key to Theosophy has been held every Thursday evening. Since the latter part of June the Farm has been visited by a large number of Theosophists.

several of whom have lectured at the Sunday meetings. Among them were Mrs. L. H. Fisk of Toledo, Miss Margaret Guild of Cambridge, Mr. and Mrs. L. F. Wade of Boston, Mr. Burcham Harding of New York, and Mrs. H. Maschmedt. Connected with the outside work may be mentioned two lectures, the arrangements for which were made by Mrs. I. A. Requa of Brooklyn. These lectures were given by Mr. Burcham Harding in the parlors of the Grand Union Hotel at Saratoga; they were well attended and much appreciated.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

SEATTLE T.S. had Sunday evening lectures in September: Reincarnation, A. M. Sands; Platonism, C. J. Clark; Altruism and Egotism, Mrs. Addie J. Barlow; Psychic and Spiritual Powers, E. O. Schwagerl; Aim of Theosophy, John H. Wilson.

BLAVATSKY HALL, Los Angeles, Calif., from August 12th to September 27th had lectures: The Various Astral Bodies, Dr. G. F. Mohn; The Religious Aspect of Theosophy, Mrs. Lula H. Rogers; The Scientific Aspect of Theosophy, H. A. Gibson; The Source of Theosophy, Mrs. L. F. Weirsmuller. On August 20th Mrs. L. E. Geise lectured at the Soldiers' Home to about three hundred people on Karma and the Etheric Substance. At Santa Ana on September 2d Dr. G. F. Mohn lectured to a fair audience on Theosophy or the Wisdom Religion, and on the same day Mr. H. A. Gibson lectured at Compton on The Scientific Aspect of Theosophy. On the 3d at the Soldiers' Home Dr. G. F. Mohn lectured on Reincarnation to a crowded house, many standing. Theosophy is gaining much ground at the Home, and our literature in its library is largely used. The Training Club and Branch and Study Classes are holding weekly meetings with good results. Santa Barbara and Riverside have called for lectures. Los Angeles is really becoming a typical Pacific Coast Center.

COLORADO SPRINGS T.S., Colorado Springs, Colo., was chartered on Sep. 17th with six charter-members, ranking 93d on the roll. Mrs. Caroline E. Finch is President, and Mrs. Lorraine H. Parsons, 723 N. Nevada Ave., is Secretary.

SANTA BARBARA LODGE T.S., Santa Barbara, Calif., was chartered on Sep. 17th with seven charter-members. It is 94th on the roll. The President is Mrs. Angie Magee, and the Secretary Mrs. Mary H. Bowman.

THE PACIFIC COAST LECTURER visited Kshanti Branch, Victoria, B. C., from August 21st to 27th, and gave two public lectures and a quiz, also holding Branch and other meetings. A training class for drill in methods of public T.S. work is to be formed, and a hall for headquarters, library, reading room, and lectures has just been taken in the very centre of the city, where public Sunday meetings will be held and the hall be open every evening. Dr. Griffiths then went to Seattle, Wash., lecturing on the 31st upon "Is Brotherhood a Fact, Fad, or Fancy?", and on the 2d of September on "High Lights of Theosophy". A public quiz was held on the 3d, and he also visited the Branch and training class, whereto he made suggestions as to improvements in work. On the 5th he went to Port Townsend and lectured, and on the 6th addressed the Branch, which has now begun a Branch library. From the 8th to the 14th Dr. Griffiths staid in Tacoma, lecturing on the 9th and 11th, holding a quiz on the 12th and a Branch meeting on the 13th. At the latter Dr. Griffiths explained the order of proceedings and method of systematic study used by many Pacific Coast Branches, also outlining the objects and methods of training classes. Both will probably be adopted by Narada Branch. Private and informal meetings were also held. The first Lotus Circle of the Northwest was organized in Narada Branch, and meets every Sunday. On the 14th the Doctor lectured at Puyallup, and by request of Seattle Branch returned to Seattle and gave "Theosophy and Heredity" as a lecture on September 16th.

SEVENTY TIMES SEVEN T.S., Sacramento, Calif., was chartered on Sep. 7th with seven charter-members, and ranks 92d on the American Roll. Miss Caroline G. Hancock is President, and the Secretary is Mr. Alfred Spinks, P.O. Box 505.

FOREIGN.

HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mrs. MERCIE M. THIRDS, formerly Secretary of the Chicago Headquarters, went out to Honolulu with Mrs. T. R. Foster of that city to help in Theosophic work there. The Aloha T. S. is the name of the local Branch. From the daily papers of the Islands we find that Mrs. Thirds had a splendid public hearing, and the reports were long and painstakingly done. The Star gives a long interview on August 15th. A parlor talk was given at the house of Mrs. Foster on August 14th, and on the 15th the first public lecture was given in the Society's Hall, in the Foster Block, on "The Mission of Theosophy". There were then many conversations and arranging of plans. On the 17th she lectured in the same hall on "Theosophy and Christianity", the report of this in the paper being decorated with a picture. A parlor talk was held on the 21st to prepare for a study class. Another lecture was given on the 24th on "Evolution and Theosophy". The Star reports the audience as large and intelligent. Propaganda is progressing, inasmuch as the resident Bishop has warned his congregation against Theosophical literature as being "of the devil". It must be a queer sort of devil, and if there be one he must be delighted when he hears of people being warned off Theosophy and carressed into dogmatism.

INDIA.

Sri Aroodha Swamy is the name of a Yogi at Hubli who has much influence. He is now interested in the T. S., and has recently commended it as a God-sent movement. He is called a Raja-Yogi. The work of the Bellary Sanmarga Samaj caught his attention, and he presided recently at a large gathering which listened to our friend R. Jagannathiah.

The vernacular preaching and other work goes on well. This has received aid at Bellary from America, Brother Judge having sent contributions specially made by Americans. Three villages in India give aid thus: Sangalakula, 40 seers of yellow cholom and 47 of korralu; Kolagallu, 183 seers of korralu and 163 of white cholom; Mincheri, 98 seers of korralu. This was sold and realized over 17 rupees, or, say, $5.00. Contributions are sustained, and being from the heart must do good.

At Secunderabad M. M. Srivivasacharya delivered a lecture on the evils of intemperance. He is one of the Samaj preachers.

The Samaj has a free reading room also, which is much used.

Bro. R. Jagannathiah, who had a government appointment by which he sustained his family, has given it up so as to work constantly for the T. S. at Bellary and in the vernacular work. His support is looked out for by the others, and principally by T. A. Swaminatha. They are both working in concert with American friends who wish to do all they can to help the T. S. cause in India by just such work as this vernacular sort which will reach deep down into the population.

The return of Col. Olcott to India after his trip to England must show results, as he is much benefitted in health. He seems, fortunately, to be good for many more years. One of his efforts was to try and make the English government do more justice to the Ceylonese Buddhists in respect to the quarter-mile clause by which injustice has been done to them. B.

A LITTLE VISION.

I stood where my old and wise friend had been, and as I listened in the silence the strong deep tones of a great organ swept through the air. On the wings of sound came a noble being, youth and man in all the ages. He was clad in robes of white and in his hand bore high a golden wand, from the tip of which blazed forth a silver star. "Look at the light, look not at anything else", he said. Then the organ tones changed to the furious hissing of a storm, and black clouds rolling up obliterated everything except the pure white star which blazed high over all. "Look at the light; fear not", came his voice. "Nothing can hurt it, for it is not of earth." The storm swept all away, then rushed off to the distance, and the beautiful, wise, strong, and ancient being vanished also. Yet far off the faint but dominating sound of a great diapason could be heard. It was the singing of the faithful choristers of the Lodge, those who know not fear and have left sorrow behind.

THE KALI YUGA.

A CORRESPONDENT is confused on this subject from the statement in What is Theosophy by Mr. Old, that we are in the midst of the Iron or Black Age. Doubtless his sentence, which is on page 28 of the book, is misleading, because "kali" means "black", and hence it would seem that he meant we are now in the middle of Kali Yuga, but reading further it is seen that he refers only to the first part of the Age. Kali Yuga is in length 432,000 years according to the old Indian calculation, and we are now coming to the end of its first five thousand years, that preliminary period being reckoned from the death of Krishna. In passing, it may be justly thought that this five thousand year period is the origin of the idea of the Hebrews that the world is about that age, just as the Greeks in the time of Solon imagined that all things had to count from their former great cataclysm, but which the Egyptian priests showed to Solon was incorrect, for, as they said, "There had been many great cataclysms before that".

In the Secret Doctrine is to be found this: "The fourth sub-race was in Kali Yuga when destroyed". This is not amenable to objection on the ground that we who are not that race are in Kali, for each race goes through the various Ages for itself; hence the former races, both primary and sub-, go through all the four periods from the Golden to the Black.

It must follow from this, and such is the oldest teaching on the subject, that at one and the same time races may be on the earth running each for itself through one or other of the periods. Some might be in the Golden Age and others in the Black. At present it is admitted that the Âryans are in the Kali Age, but certain childlike races are not so. Within the present five thousand year period we know that races have absolutely finished their Kali Yuga and gone out of existence. This happened to that which ruled a part of the American continent, and hence for them in particular their Kali Yuga must have begun earlier than ours did. The Hottentots also disappeared during our memory. This method of considering the subject will clear it up, leaving only to be settled for each race the period which they are in, or the beginning and ending of it. And, as said, for the Âryans the great Kali Yuga began five thousand (odd) years ago.

To find out when the great Kali Yuga for the major race including all its sub-races began would be impossible, as there are no means, and H.P.B., the only one for the present who had access to those who held the records, said precise figures on those heads would not be given out. But she and also those behind her who gave her so much information laid it down, as in accord with the philosophy of nature given out, that a division into four was the order for evolution in respect to the life of races, and hence that each great race, whatever its number in the whole seven, would be compelled to go through the four periods from the Satya to Kali, while at the same time the minor races had the same division, only that each part would be shorter than those pertaining to the great race as a whole. For that reason it seems plain that the figures for the various Ages (or Yugas) are only such as relate to and govern the sub- or minor races.

The overlapping of races as to their particular Yuga (or Age) can be easily seen in history. When the whites came to America the Indians were in their stone age in some places, using stone hammers, spears, knives, and arrows. Even in cultured South America the priests used stone knives for use at the sacrifices. We, however, had gone far beyond that. The red Indian of North America would have remained wholly in the stone age had we not altered it to some extent while we proceeded as instruments for his annihilation. Therefore in our own period we have examples of two races being in different Ages while living at the same time on the globe.

The foregoing is the general scheme outlined in the Secret Doctrine, where there are numerous pages showing that when a new race, whether a sub or a major one, comes in it does so while many of the old race still exist, the one gradually rising in development while the other falls. They shade into one another as night does into day, until at last either night or day predominates. This period of shading is allowed for in regard to the Ages, and in the Brahmanical calculation we find that they add twilights and dawns, since preceding a new Age there must be the dawn, as following it will come the twilight. The twilight of the one will be the dawn of the other.

Using the Zodiac for the purpose of considering the question of the Ages, we find that, roughly speaking, the time taken by the sun to go round the whole circle is 25,800 years, as shown by the retrograde movement of the equinoctial points. This is the type for the yearly circle, which makes the four seasons and the four seasons in their turn symbolize the four Ages. Their length will be in proportion to the greater swing of the sun. Among the seasons the winter corresponds to the Kali Age, for then all is turned hard and cold, just as in the Black Age, the light of the Spiritual Sun being dimmed, the hardness and coldness of materiality appear in the moral life. Now if the sidereal period be divided by four, we have the figures 6450 years, or the five-thousand-year period with the requisite twilight or dawn added. And it was taught by the Egyptians that with every quarter of the circle of the Sun's great path there were changes caused physically by the alteration of the poles, and spiritually there must be changes due to the inner development of the human race as an entirety. While the materialistic philosopher thinks the changes would be due to the movement of the poles, the teaching from the Lodge is that the spiritual inner changes cause the physical ones through the appropriate means; in this case those means are in the movements of the great heavenly bodies. This is because the whole Cosmos is on the same grand plan, with all its parts working together, each in its own way.

For the present, students will have to be satisfied with the general statement that we are in Kali Yuga. The characteristics of the present time show it clearly enough, for while physical civilization is high the spiritual side of it is low and dark, and selfishness is the prevailing order. None of us can really pretend to know more than this, for while we have the Brahmanical calculation and the words of the Secret Doctrine, yet that is taking the word of another, plausible, of course, and also concordant with all other parts of the system, but still not of our own knowledge. The beginning of this Age and the time of its ending are dark to us; but the general theory, sufficient for our present needs, is perfectly clear, and as good an assumption as any of those indulged in by science,—certainly better than the incredible ideas of the theologian. Of one thing we are getting more and more proof each day, and that is of the immense period during which man has been on the earth, and with that admitted all the great cyclic lengths given by the ancient and modern Theosophists of weight are entitled to credence.

We can also get great comfort from the theory given out at various times, that in Kali Yuga a small effort goes farther for results than the same when made in a better Age. In the other Ages the rates of all things are slower than in this; hence, evil now seems quick; but in the same way good is also much quicker in effect and reach than in a slower time.

WILL MASTERS' HELP BE WITHDRAWN IN 1898 UNTIL 1975?

THE theory is widely known among the members of the Society that at the close of each century a spiritual movement is made in the world by the Mahâtâmâs, which begins with the last twenty-five years of the century and does not in that form begin again after the close of twenty-five years until the last quarter of the following period. But this has been exaggerated and much misunderstood. Some, indeed many, go so far as to conclude that then in the course of the next few years the Mahâtâmâs will entirely recede from all work in the world and leave us all to our fate. One person went so far as to argue that it meant the coming of the sixth race in '98, and hence asked how it could be, or what matter it would be, as the sixth race would have sufficient knowledge of itself. But the major part seem to think that no help will be given after that time. I think this is incorrect, and will try to explain it as it was explained to me by the promulgator of the theory, H.P.B.

The Masters are governed by the law of action and reaction, and are wise enough always not to do that which might result in undoing all their prior work. The law of reaction applies as much to the mind of man as to physical things and forces. By going too far at any one time with the throwing-out of great force in the mental plane, the consequence would be that a reaction of superstition and evil of all sort would undo everything. Superstition rules yet in the world, and the world is not confined for the Masters to the Western peoples. In the West, following the historical cycles, a great and definite effort is made among the people—for instance, as the Theosophical Society—so as to aid the psychical and spiritual development of man. Among other reasons for not keeping up the display of much force is that if it went too far many unprepared persons whose moral senses are not rightly governed would take up with all our theories and follow them out along the lines of pure selfishness for business and other purposes.

For that reason, among others, H.P.B. began to slacken her phenomena some time before her departure, although to my own certain knowledge she was able to do them to the last, and did do many of them, and some of the most wonderful sort, up to the last. But publicly it was not so. Some have taken on themselves to say that the reason for this alteration was because she came to the conclusion it was a mistake to do them, but I do not believe this at all. It was a part of a well-understood campaign and order.

At the end of the twenty-five years the Masters will not send out in such a wide and sweeping volume the force they send during the twenty-five years. But that does not mean they will withdraw. They will leave the ideas to germinate in the minds of the people at large, but never will they take away from those who deserve it the help that is due and given to all. However, many will have gone on further by that time than others, and to those who have thus gone on from altruism and unselfish devotion to the good of the race continual help and guiding will be given. Many, however, in and out of the T.S. will continue so selfish and personal that they will have to content themselves with what they will get from others and from the general development. H.P.B. was quite definite on this. It agrees with history. During all the centuries there have been many persons who have had direct and valuable help from Masters, and to suppose that at the end of our first twenty-five years all of that will be finished is an absurdity in itself.

H. P. B. frequently remarked in my hearing with regard to this question, that the work done during the last twenty-five years of each century by the Masters and occultists generally belonging to the Brotherhood was public work or work as nearly public as it could be made, according to the age and enlightenment of the people with which they had to deal. At all times they assisted and labored with individuals. In other words: During the last twenty-five years the conditions in the mental and psychic world are such as to allow work with large bodies of persons, whereas after that the work is more or less confined to the few. This is because it is then the Spring-time of the Cycle, when good and evil tendencies and changes come rapidly into existence. But always there have been attempts made to create an Order or association which should be able to live and carry on the work on the original lines from one century to the other. So far, then, from withdrawing Their help, Their desire is to continue to give it, not only after the close of the cycle, but always and at every time. It is the cyclic conditions only that prevent the influx of spiritual wisdom after the close of the cycle.

But she also said that the amount of power put out was enough to keep the world thinking on these matters far into the coming century, giving as example a train—running at full speed—having its steam shut off; it would continue to run for a long distance after that if left to itself. And the work will not by any means end directly the cycle is ended. On the contrary, she said the endeavor is to educate a number of persons who will be able to preserve the spirit of Theosophical endeavor and keep in touch with the Masters from the close of one public attempt to the beginning of another. This, she declared, is the meaning of the words spoken by one of the adepts—“So long as three persons remain true to the Brotherhood, the Theosophical Society will continue to live”. And if this is Their promise it only remains for each member to become one of these three in order that the Society should continue to receive the active help of the Masters all the time.

If it is remembered that it is not because Masters withdraw Their help at all that there is not so much work done at one time as another, but because it is less possible to make changes in the psychic atmosphere during certain seasons than in others, then the rest is perfectly clear. And in order that the Society shall live and continue active as it now is into the next century we have but to educate ourselves as Followers of the Light.

THE MAGIC MIRROR.

A FAITHFUL RECORD OF A STRANGE EXPERIENCE.

THERE is an element of superstition in my nature. I confess it at the outset. Were I to conceal the fact, you might be at a loss to account for the motives that prompted me, an otherwise staid young man of twenty-four, to consult a fortune-teller at a critical juncture in my affairs. I had never before, nor have I ever since, resorted to this method of drawing aside the veil of the future. I am more inclined, I think, to follow the dictates of common-sense in matters of grave importance than to rely implicitly, as so many do, upon the advice and prediction of astrologers and clairvoyants. That I nevertheless adopted the latter course in the instance to which I am about to direct your attention, is therefore to be taken as an indication that I had been confronted with an alternative more than usually perplexing to my judgment.

And no wonder that it should be so; for when, early in September, I was handed a cable message from a widowed aunt of wealth and influence in Buffalo, N. Y., informing me that a situation had been secured for me as head accountant in what afterwards proved to be one of the large grain elevators of that city. I was plunged at once into a sea of doubt as to my fitness for so responsible a post. You will understand this better when I say that at the time mentioned I was filling the subordinate position of foreign correspondent and invoice-clerk in the office of the Messrs. Sloan, manufacturers of linen staples, in the city of Manchester. I had been in their employ for nearly two years, and seeing no prospect of advancement I had written to my aunt, Mrs. Mindham, with the above result.

Previous to my father's death, which occurred some three years before, I had visited my aunt in his company, and had awakened in the old lady's breast a warm interest in my welfare. I attributed this exhibition of kindly feeling on her part more to a certain agreeable liveliness of disposition, habitual with me, than to the obligations of kinship or the ties of blood.

I had been well-educated besides, and possessed in addition a natural aptitude for business and a shrewdness of judgment far beyond my years and experience—qualities, by the way, that were not lost upon my discerning and appreciative aunt.

After our return to Manchester, at the suggestion of my father I opened correspondence with Mrs. Mindham, which she acknowledged with many expressions of regard. Thereafter I never failed to write to her once every month, and when at last I was compelled to convey to her the sad intelligence of my father's death, she assured me in reply that henceforth my interests should be hers, and hinted vaguely at the possibility of securing employment for me in Buffalo, more in keeping with what she was pleased to call my "superior abilities".

Therefore it was no surprise to me to learn that she had taken steps looking to the betterment of my prospects. I expected nothing more than an ordinary clerkship at the start, but that she should have succeeded in placing me at a single bound in the highest position of trust in an establishment of practically unlimited means, was almost beyond belief.

I could not, however, doubt the evidences of my senses. There it was in black and white before my eyes:

Take passage immediately. Engaged as chief bookkeeper for Buckley Bros. & Baker.

SARAH MINDHAM.

I was literally staggered by the news. For some moments I sat like one in a stupor, my eyes fixed upon the little yellow paper on my desk. When my thoughts had returned to their ordinary channel, my first move was to ascertain who my future employers were, and what was the nature of their business. Upon consulting a copy of Bradstreet's Reports, I was perplexed at the discovery that no such firm was quoted in the seven pages given up to the city of Buffalo. I showed the message to my fellow clerks, who went over the list with me a second time, but without any better success. Bradstreet, it was plain, had no knowledge of the existence of my employers to be.

Finally I laid the cablegram before the senior Sloan. He read it carefully, while a slight shade of annoyance passed over his features. It quickly gave place, however, to a genial smile, and, rising from his desk, he shook me warmly by the hand.

"I congratulate you, my boy", he said, "you're in luck. But your gain will be our loss, I'm sorry to say. What's that? What's that? Can't find the firm in Bradstreet's? You've certainly overlooked it", he continued, running his eye through the B's. "No, it must be a new concern, or perhaps the business has lately changed hands. Let's see if we can find the name Buckley anywhere." We looked carefully along, column after column. Suddenly I startled my employer with a half-suppressed exclamation of triumph. "I've found it! I've found it!", I cried, pointing to an entry under the following caption: "Enterprise Grain Elevator (Ross, Buckley, & Buckley, Prop'r's.) . . . Aa."

"Yes", said Mr. Sloan, "they must be the parties we're looking for. Buckley Bros. & Baker have no doubt succeeded the firm quoted here. Worth a million and over, too. It's a grand opportunity. We shall be sorry to lose you, though, but of course, Alfred, you must go. Come to me when you are ready and I will give you a letter of recommendation to your new employers, although I presume it will be of no service to you under the circumstances."

Thanking Mr. Sloan for his thoughtfulness I returned to my desk, and shortly thereafter left the office to make preparations for my departure.

Oddly enough, the news of my good fortune did not fill me with any great measure of satisfaction. I felt depressed instead of elated. I was harassed with doubts and anxieties. Perhaps I should prove myself utterly incompetent to discharge the duties of the high position my overly sanguine aunt had obtained for me. After all, what did I know of America, its people, its business methods, its institutions? "It would be madness", I whispered to myself, as I hurried in the direction of my lodgings, "to give up an assured certainty for what might turn out to be the veriest uncertainty imaginable. No, I won't go. I'll stay right here in Manchester."

I walked on a few steps. "Fool!" something seemed to hiss in my ear. "I won't go", I said firmly, increasing my pace. "You must go", said the voice, authoritatively. "If I do I may starve", I argued. "If you don't you will starve", retorted the voice with logical acumen.

In such a state of uncertainty I reached my lodgings. Ascending to my room I locked the door and threw myself on the bed. There I wrestled with the subject till nightfall without arriving at a decision.

In this dilemma I recollected that shortly before I had seen the advertisement of a certain clairvoyante with an unpronounceable Hindû name. This woman, who styled herself the "Seeress of Gondwana", professed to reveal the future through the instrumentality of a magic mirror. Strange tales had often reached me from friends in India concerning the marvellous properties of these mirrors, and I was therefore inclined to give credence, in some small degree at least, to the claims of the woman in question.

It was but the work of a moment or two to find her card in a pile of newspapers on my writing-table. There was the Hindû name in all its unpronounceableness, relieved only by the announcement in a footnote, "All languages spoken". I should at least escape the customary gibberish of the foreign charlatan, then. And so I noted the address of the fortune-teller in my diary, which I had not carried farther than the third week in the new year. Having done so I betook myself to bed with the firm determination to visit the madame on the morrow, and challenge fate to give up the secrets of the misty years beyond.

Shortly after breakfast the next morning I set out for the quarters of the clairvoyante. My route led me through one of the poorer sections of the city. After a brisk walk of half an hour I reached my destination.

The appearance of the place, which was a ramshackle cottage in a narrow and ill-conditioned street, was certainly not calculated to inspire me with much confidence in the powers of the self-styled seeress of Gondwana.

I was not to be dissuaded from my purpose, however, by the unfavorable aspect of the surroundings, and so I doggedly made my way through a crowd of jeering small boys up a short flight of wooden steps that led to the entrance. I glanced at the tin sign upon the panel of the door to assure myself that I had made no mistake in the location. No ; there was the long Hindû name more unpronounceable than ever, it seemed, and underneath it the cheering assurance that the vocabulary of the madame was not confined to her native tongue.

Nerving myself for the approaching ordeal, I pulled the bell resolutely, while my heart thumped like a battering-ram against my ribs. Scarcely had I released my hold upon the knob before the door opened, and I was ushered into a narrow hallway by a young woman in the attire of a housemaid.

I enquired for the madame. She led me into a front room, off from the hall, and bade me be seated while she notified her mistress of my presence.

Left to myself, I took a hasty survey of the room. Evidently fortune-telling, even when accompanied by the seductions of a magic mirror, was not a lucrative occupation in Manchester. There was nothing in the furnishings of the apartment at all suggestive of the business carried on there. A few odd sticks of furniture, half a dozen prim-looking chairs, a rickety table, a thread-bare carpet, a few cheap irrelevant pictures, and a pair of heavy, queerly-figured curtains hanging across the entrance to an inner room, made up the sum-total of the visible possessions of the prophetess.

Just as I had completed this mental inventory of my surroundings, the heavy draperies were pushed aside and the madame herself stood before me.

She was a stockily-built, dark-skinned woman of middle age, unquestionably of oriental origin, with plain but mobile features, and an abundance of glossy-black hair coiled upon the top of her head, where it was held in position by a dull gold pin in the shape of a serpent with its tail in its mouth.

She was of quite graceful carriage for one so bulky, and her long, loose gown of tawny red, fancifully striped with black, lent a becoming dignity to her ponderous figure.

But the distinguishing characteristic of the woman was her eyes, which were large, luminous, and intensely magnetic. A nameless thrill pervaded my entire system as I encountered for the first time the gaze of those star-like orbs, shining out, as they did, from the dark background of the curtains like balls of liquid fire.

As she advanced toward me I made no attempt to rise, but remained spell-bound in my chair, seemingly rooted to the spot.

"What is wanted?" she asked in a low voice that was positively musical in its cadences.

This pertinent inquiry had the effect of bringing me back to a proper realization of my position, and with a half-muttered apology for my apparent incivility, I rose to my feet and in a few brief, business-like words stated the object of visit.

"You wish to consult me regarding your future?" repeated the owner of the wonderful eyes after me, with the same rhythmical intonation, as she pocketed the fee I had proffered her meanwhile. "Very well, then. Step this way, if you please."

With a beating heart I followed my guide behind the all-concealing curtains, and found myself in a little dark chamber, as diverse in character from the one I had just left as could well be conceived.

It was a square room of small dimensions, certainly not over ten feet in breadth. With the exception of a dim circular object in the middle of the floor, and a mantel in one corner on which were crowded a number of curious Hindû idols and a few attractive specimens of the antique dinanderie, or metal work of eastern lands, it was entirely devoid of furniture.

What little light was allowed to enter flickered feebly through the meshes of a gauzy yellowish curtain that hung in thick folds before the window. The four walls, and even the ceiling, were draped with a peculiar purple-tinted stuff, embroidered in gold thread with mystical lotus blossoms, systematically dispersed over the surface of the cloth. Directly above the circular object I have mentioned, at the distance of some six feet from the floor, a bright seven-pointed silver star hung suspended from the ceiling by a slender wire.

CONVERSATIONS ON OCCULTISM.

STUDENT.—What is the effect of trying to develop the power of seeing in the astral light before a person is initiated?

Sage.—Seeing in the astral light is not done through Manas, but through the senses, and hence has to do entirely with sense-perception removed to a plane different from this, but more illusory. The final perceiver or judge of perception is in Manas, in the Self; and therefore the final tribunal is clouded by the astral perception if one is not so far trained or initiated as to know the difference and able to tell the true from the false. Another result is a tendency to dwell on this subtle sense-perception, which at last will cause an atrophy of Manas for the time being. This makes the confusion all the greater, and will delay any possible initiation all the more or forever. Further, such seeing is in the line of phenomena, and adds to the confusion of the Self which is only beginning to understand this life; by attempting the astral another element of disorder is added by more phenomena due to another plane, thus mixing both sorts up. The Ego must find its basis and not be swept off hither and thither. The constant reversion of images and ideas in the astral light, and the pranks of the elementals there, unknown to us as such and only seen in effects, still again add to the confusion. To sum it up, the real danger from which all others flow or follow is in the confusion of the Ego by introducing strange things to it before the time.

Student.—How is one to know when he gets real occult information from the Self within?

Sage.—Intuition must be developed and the matter judged from the true philosophical basis, for if it is contrary to true general rules it is wrong. It has to be known from a deep and profound analysis by which we find out what is from egotism alone and what is not; if it is due to egotism, then it is not from the Spirit and is untrue. The power to know does not come from book-study nor from mere philosophy, but mostly from the actual practice of altruism in deed, word, and thought; for that practice purifies the covers of the soul and permits that light to shine down into the brain-mind. As the brain-mind is the receiver in the waking state, it has to be purified from sense-perception, and the truest way to do this is by combining philosophy with the highest outward and inward virtue.

Student.—Tell me some ways by which intuition is to be developed.

Sage.—First of all by giving it exercise, and second by not using it for purely personal ends. Exercise means that it must be followed through mistakes and bruises until from sincere attempts at use it comes to its own strength. This does not mean that we can do wrong and leave the results, but that after establishing conscience on a right basis by following the golden rule, we give play to the intuition and add to its strength. Inevitably in this at first we will make errors, but soon if we are sincere it will grow brighter and make no mistake. We should add the study of the works of those who in the past have trodden this path and found out what is the real and what is not. They say the Self is the only reality. The brain must be given larger views of life, as by the study of the doctrine of reincarnation, since that gives a limitless field to the possibilities in store. We must not only be unselfish, but must do all the duties that Karma has given us, and thus intuition will point out the road of duty and the true path of life.

Student.—Are there any Adepts in America or Europe?

Sage.—Yes, there are and always have been. But they have for the present kept themselves hidden from the public gaze. The real ones have a wide work to do in many departments of life and in preparing certain persons who have a future work to do. Though their influence is wide they are not suspected, and that is the way they want to work for the present. There are some also who are at work with certain individuals in some of the aboriginal tribes in America, as among those are Egos who are to do still more work in another incarnation, and they must be prepared for it now. Nothing is omitted by these Adepts. In Europe it is the same way, each sphere of work being governed by the time and the place.

Student.—What is the meaning of the five-pointed star?

Sage.—It is the symbol of the human being who is not an Adept, but is now on the plane of the animal nature as to his life-thoughts and development inside. Hence it is the symbol of the race. Upside down it means death or symbolizes that. It also means, when upside down, the other or dark side. It is at the same time the cross endowed with the power of mind, that is, man.

Student.—Is there a four-pointed star symbol?

Sage.—Yes. That is the symbol of the next kingdom below man, and pertains to the animals. The right kind of clairvoyant can see both the five- and the four-pointed star. It is all produced by the intersections of the lines or currents of the astral light emanating from the person or being. The four-pointed one means that the being having but it has not as yet developed Manas.

Student.—Has the mere figure of a five-pointed star any power in itself?

Sage.—It has some, but very little. You see it is used by all sorts of people for trademarks and the like, and for the purposes of organizations, yet no result follows. It must be actually used by the mind to be of any force or value. If so used, it carries with it the whole power of the person to whom it may belong.

Student.—Why is the sword so much spoken of in practical Occultism by certain writers?

Sage.—Many indeed of these writers merely repeat what they have read. But there is a reason, just as in warfare the sword has more use for damage than a club. The astral light corresponds to water. If you try to strike in or under water with a club, it will be found that there is but little result, but a sharp knife will cut almost as well under water as out of it. The friction is less. So in the astral light a sword used on that plane has more power to cut than a club has, and an elemental for that reason will be more easily damaged by a sword than by a club or a stone. But all of this relates to things that are of no right value to the true student, and are indulged in only by those who work in dark magic or foolishly by those who do not quite know what they do. It is certain that he who uses the sword or the club will be at last hurt by it. And the lesson to be drawn is that we must seek for the true Self that knows all Occultism and all truth, and has in itself the protecting shield from all dangers. That is what the ancient Sages sought and found, and that is what should be striven after by us.

WRONG POPULAR NOTIONS.

WHAT are your proofs?" is often asked of the Theosophical student who believes in reïncarnation and Karma, who holds to the existence of the astral body, and who thinks that evolution demands a place in the cosmos for Mahâtmâs (or great souls) as facts and ideals. "If you cannot prove reïncarnation just as you would a fact in a court of law, I will not believe", says one, while another says, "Make such objective demonstrations as science does, and then you may expect me to agree with you". But in truth all these objectors accept as proven in the way they demand for Theosophy many things which on a slight examination are seen to rest as much on theory and metaphysical argument as do any of the doctrines found in Theosophical literature. The axioms of mathematics are unprovable; the very word assumes that they have to be accepted. Being accepted, we go forward and on the basis of their unproved truth demonstrate other and succedent matters. The theories of modern astronomy are taken as true because by their means eclipses are foretold and other great achievements of that science made possible. But many centuries ago quite different theories of the relations and motions and structure of the heavens allowed the old astronomers to make the same deductions. Let us examine a few words and things.

THE ATOM.

The atom and the molecule are very influential words. They are constantly used by people claiming to follow science, but who indulge in criticisms on the uncertainties of Theosophical speculation. Yet no one ever saw an atom or a molecule. They are accepted as facts by science—just as the spiritually-inclined accept the existence of the invisible soul—yet it is impossible to objectively prove either the one or the other. They are deemed to be proven because they are necessary. But let a Theosophist say that the astral body exists, and Mahâtâmâs also, because both are necessary in evolution, and at once a demand arises for “demonstration” by objective proofs.

THE SUN.

The sun is the apparent source of energy, and is confidently supposed by many to be a mass of burning material. No one, however, knows this to be so. No one was ever there, and the whole set of theories regarding the luminary rests on assumptions. Many natural facts are against some of the theories. The great fact that the higher the mountain the more cold it is on top would be one, not wholly accounted for by theories as to radiation. And when we remember the great, the immense, difference between the various scientific estimates of the sun's heat, doubt increases. Seeing that electricity is now so much better known, and that it is apparently all-pervading, the ancient idea that the sun is a center of electrical or magnetic energy which turns into heat as well as other things on reaching here, becomes plausible and throws some spice of illusion into the doctrine that our sun is a mass of burning matter.

Again, the sun is seen as if over the horizon in full view every clear evening, when in fact he has been some minutes down below the line of sight. Refraction partly accounts for this, but none the less is his apparent visibility or position above the horizon an illusion.

THE STARS.

Many of those that are known as fixed stars are immeasurably far away. Sirius is at an immense distance, and has been receding always many thousands of miles each minute. Others are so far off that it takes one hundred thousand years for their light to reach here.

Yet since records began they have all remained apparently in one place and in the same relation to each other. They constitute a vast illusion. They are moving and yet they remain still. We point the telescope at one of our sister planets, and knowing that its light takes fifteen minutes or more to get to us, we must be continually directing the glass to a point in space where the planet is not, and by no possibility can we point to where it actually is. Still, for all this uncertainty, many complicated and definite calculations are based on these observations of mere illusions.

LATITUDE AND LONGITUDE.

These are practically used every hour of the day for the safeguarding of human life and property. But they exist only in the brains of men, for they are not in the sky or on land. They are theoretical divisions made by man, and they are possible only because the sole reality in nature is that which is jeered at by many as the ideal. But if the ancients are said to be the constructors of a great human chart in the Zodiac, the divisions of which have a bearing on the navigation of the great ocean of human evolution, the proud practical man says that you have but shown the ancients to be fanciful, superstitious, grotesque. But they were not so. Doubtless the saying recorded of Jesus about the time when we should see "the sign of the Son of Man in the heavens" will not so far from now be found to have a practical meaning in human life.

The ancient Sage was like the modern captain. The captain takes an observation of the illusionary stars and the blazing sun, thus discovering whether his ship is near or far from land. The Sage observed the Zodiac, and from the manner it and its boats were related to each other he was able to calculate whether the human freight in the boat of human evolution was near a rock or on the free, open sea in its eternal and momentous journey.

SENSATION OF TOUCH.

Every one is accustomed to say that he has touched this or that object on which his fingers may have rested. But this is not so. We do not touch anything; we only perceive and report a sensation which we call touch. If that sensation is due to actual contact between the skin and the object, then the harder we pressed, and thus the nearer we came to the object's surface, the more accurate should be the sensation. In fact, however, if we press hard we dull the sensation and turn it into one of pain for the skin. There is always a space between the skin and the surface dealt with, just as there is always a space between the molecules of each mass. If two smooth planes be pushed on to each other they will adhere, and the smother they are the more difficult it will be to get them apart. If we could actually touch the hand to any surface so as to cover all of it with a touching surface, we could not withdraw the hand at all. All that we get, then, by what we call touch is the idea produced by the vibration and by that much of contact as is possible in the case.

CONTINUOUS SOLIDITY.

Quite Theosophical is the scientist when he says that "we cannot know anything of the actual nature of matter in itself, but can only know the sensation or the phenomena". The mineral or metal called even the hardest is not solid or continuous in itself. This is now admitted by all scientific men. Even the diamond, "hardest of all", is a mass of moving molecules made up of like moving atoms. Its hardness is only relative. It is simply harder than glass because its atoms are moving at a more rapid rate. In a recent lecture in London Mr. Bell, a scientific light, told how the edge or point of the diamond cuts the glass because the molecules in the diamond move rapidly and get in between the slower ones of the glass and thus cut it. And so it is with all other masses of matter. They are only masses of molecules in different rates of vibration; none of them solid or hard save in a relative sense. Is it not true, then, as so often held by philosophers and so insisted on by those Adepts who gave us information through H. P. Blavatsky that the world we are in is to be properly considered in a metaphysical sense and not as a mere mechanism that can be explained on mechanical principles? And in the face of all the illusions and all the speculations of life and science, why should the Theosophist be asked to make or give any different sort of proofs than those availed of by science in all its investigations? There is no reason.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE.

THE SPIRIT OF THINGS.

IDEAS rule the world", quoted one of Those whose influence in the Theosophical Society is not the less felt because its source is unperceived by most members. Yet there are many, even among our own Theosophists, who hold tightly to the notion that the world is held and even advanced by forms and words. From the ritualism and ceremonies of the Priesthood to the carefully rounded phrases of a Chesterfield there is scarcely a step. Both are equally useless to the development of the real man. The effort of each leads men away from the contemplation of the Spirit to the adoration of matter. Humanity has ever been led away from its freedom and recognition of the eternal principle of Life, to make obeisance to the god of form—and matter! Those in the past who said that all objectivity was Maya or illusion spoke a truth which must vibrate throughout all time, reverberating through the hearts of all who develop to the life of independence and power. For assuredly none can limit the changes in the Great Breath, whose perpetual motions in the unseen world make the varieties in this.

It is worth while to recognize this as a philosophy, and so prevent many mistakes. The world pulls this way and that, seeking her freedom in legislature and habit, oblivious to the fact that it is precisely these things which forge her chains. Belief in the necessity for Custom and Convention, sovereigns and saviours, style and good usage, is really born of the soulless: for these all limit freedom of the Spirit and propose to chain it to one idea. Hence arise disputations, and from them warfares.

Yet even recognizing this, the philosopher will not rebel against them nor seek their immediate destruction. Himself emancipated, in the world though not of it, he will see that the world being held by forms, through them it must be aided and advanced to freedom.

Some will think it is going too far to say that the spirit of evil and stagnation is in form. But it is easy to demonstrate this truth. Every great leader, every genius, has thrown off the yoke of form-slavery, and drawn his principles of action from the free source of things. Though often disregarding and destroying things men have long believed dear and sacred, yet while he lives men follow him and love him; recognizing something of the heavenly power about him, they find strength in his freedom and delight to be in his presence and to know his thoughts. Who has not seen the spirit of life in a child? And there are none among us who upset customs more than children. Buddha, Jesus, and the true religious founders destroyed all forms. Even though we see in them the great originators of present religious forms, it is not because they desired that that should be so, but because their ideas and wisdom were clothed in matter by their followers, who, possessing little recognition of the Spirit, were incapable of drawing life from anything but externals. Poets and painters, musicians, geniuses of all kinds, are noted for their eccentricities, yet no one can doubt that they see deeper into the divinity of things than do the Philistines. Strange as it may seem, it is, after all, the power of originality which is indicative of possible progress in any human being. Without this the nature is in darkness, there is no light in it and no creative power.

The Theosophical Society was established on such a basis that should prevent, if possible, its ever being tied by forms. Yet how many there are who want to make it a respectable institution—will not help a brother unless he be of the same rank as themselves! How many, indeed, wish that H.P.B. had not had eccentricities, or had not done so much outwardly to vibrate and shock conventional shells; or that fewer uneducated persons were in the ranks and more of those who are book-learned and well placed in Society!

Others are so caught in the web of form that they think it impossible for anyone to possess wisdom or light outside the Society's ranks. Let such know that there are many persons all over the world, outside the T.S., who have caught something of the Spirit of Wisdom just now lighting up the whole earth, and these as well as T.S. members are surely being helped by the Great Brotherhood behind. The T.S. has its own work to do. It was the originator of these thoughts in the West, and through its members they must be given to the world. And if taken up and used by others outside, a part here and a part there, sometimes imperfectly, generally unacknowledged, it is no harm, but always unconsciously an aiding the world. There are no forms here, no priesthood; each one has his own wisdom and should hasten to let the world know of it.

It is not only the Theosophical Society we work for, as a Society merely. This is a great danger to be avoided. It is for the Society only as a useful vehicle of ideas that we labor. It will fade and fall to pieces some time—and let us trust it may be destroyed long before it approaches the possibility of becoming a priesthood—but the ideas the world and our race have received through it will live and will have moulded the thought of the people almost without their knowing it. We shall be forgotten, but the thoughts we have passed on will live. Members should recollect they are not building an institution, but only erecting a temporary structure in which a little wisdom has been stored.

Many in the Society are just now used by Those "behind the scenes", to become vehicles of truth. They are intended to hand it on. Once the brain has opened to the Light only one thing can again close it, that is, the keeping back of wisdom from others. Yet many receive knowledge in a flash of intuition, and instead of giving it out at some Branch meeting or to someone who may need it, they keep it hid away to burst it forth later in a carefully-written paper or lecture, so that they may receive credit for their ideas and not have them stolen by others beforehand. Their ideas will then find no ground in which to take root: they should have been given out when received. And in time such persons will, if this habit be kept up, lose the spiritual power they now possess. Moreover, the setting free of ideas in the world at the right moment has a great deal to do with the development of occult powers, however little connection between these two matters there may seem to be. It is pure personality and selfishness that make one hold back and wait until the thoughts can be given out with greater credit to himself.

Madame Blavatsky launched her wisdom into the world without any consideration of herself. Probably her thought was something of this nature: "I know my English is faulty, I know my science is not of the best, but my wisdom is true, and it must be sent forth. Others will steal my ideas and knowledge for their own glorification, but it does not matter, that is their own loss; they are also helping me in my labor."

So it is that work which must be done, and speedily lest we lose the knowledge ere we have pinned it. Let loose the ideas among the people; do not hold them till you can get glory by them. Do not wait until you can understand Sanskrit, can write classical English, have made a name for yourself in the world, before you become a worker. This is all fear of form. To be sure, the better the instrument the better the work, but the means must not be mistaken for the end. The time is short; only a few more years exist for active work. Let the ideas loose in the world at all costs; and no matter at what loss of fame to yourself. After all, on your death-bed you will know that it is the IDEA—spiritual or otherwise—of life that you have had, and your virtue, that are the important things, not how much you have known of other men's thoughts, or how correctly you have dressed.

The Ideas live and rule, not the words that clothed them nor the imagery used for their expression. And it is well known that he who thus impersonally acts comes more and more directly in relationship with the Brotherhood of Light.

CLAUDE FALLS WRIGHT.

ON THE SCREEN OF TIME.

The whole phantasmagoria is only a picture thrown up against the Screen of Time by the mighty magic of Prakriti (Nature).<sup>1</sup>

THE various portions of the world-screen portray the Theosophical movement as proceeding with unchecked, even increased, activity. As in the course of every river, yes, even to the smallest rivulet, impediments arise, deterrents temporarily fill the bed or swerve the course, so in this movement many a change occurs.

Yet there is always reädjusment, and, with that, the increased momentum observable when a pent-up force frees itself and breaks away, carrying with it the dëbris which it scatters and dissolves. There is a change, and yet no change. The goal is ever the same, for in the great course of evolution

Even the weariest river
Winds somewhere safe to sea.

But what the laws of motion do for the streams, the laws of mind must do for thoughtful man, for man earnestly applying himself to the study of Law with Nature and her eloquent analogies for guide. Such men reädjus their course with care. Not the triumph over obstacles, not the elate sense of power evolved, of a strong, free, onward progress, is suffered to deflect their course or to swerve the calm mind from its outlook over men and things. The impediments, whether they arose from circumstance or from fellow-men, are viewed as teachers, not as foes, once they are removed, once their restraint or their opposition is removed. Karmic agencies all of them, none can impede the course unless by our own concurrence or submission. All, if we ourselves pursue unaltered the path of inaction in action to the Unknown Sea, all have the rather assisted by aiding in the development of latent powers of persistence, of resistance to the invasion of foreign motive, of warring elements whose accumulation would turn our course. An opponent is foe or evolver, as you take him. By the might of that newly-developed power the river takes again to its strong arms the now disintegrated opposition, no more an obstacle but an element of affluence, parts necessary to the trinity of earth and air and water: it takes them into its resistless sweep and all are at one again, all flow on toward the ideal Unity. In that ideal our present union consists; it is this unity of motive which makes the strength of a movement such as ours. Thus may man learn again from Nature. She teaches that great rivers rarely raise their own impediments. Such are more difficult of removal. Let us suffer without complaint—but with instant resistance—the choking of our stream by débris thrown from opposing shores, but—let us not raise our own obstacles!

How often the Friend now invisible to most eyes lamented the tendency of “the Theosophists to soil—like the cuckoo—their own nest”. In the first letter addressed to me by our beloved Madame Blavatsky she wrote as above, and then expressed a fear which to her was hydra-headed, the only fear that ever had power to daunt that lion heart, the fear that, like Frankenstein, she had created a monster which might rend her and mankind. So the obstacles threaten at times to turn the river into a devastating monster. Let it keep to its own bed; let it cease to war with the obstacles in the very first moment of their removal; let the common aim be resumed; and the hope of H. P. Blavatsky, her faith and not her fear, shall be justified.

LONDON HEADQUARTERS has had a visitor of interest in an English gentleman from Tibet. Originally a botanist, he had journeyed to the “Unknown Land” and studied Buddhism with the idea, at first, that it would help him in his travels. He was soon seriously interested, and finally became a Buddhist and later on a lama, passing through the usual severe ordeals. During his present visit to London he lectured at the T.S. Headquarters, as well as before other Societies, before returning to Tibet, where he has now gone. The most satisfactory point of all that he said was, to Theosophists, his statement that the Mahâtmas are known to exist and are fully believed in throughout Tibet and the Buddhist orders there, although They are not generally seen, but work through other persons (a few). He also told of some curious practices of exoteric Lamaïsm. When persons commit adultery they are killed and their skulls tied together; this is supposed to detain them in Kâma Lōka, united in the presence of their sin. A species of drum is made of the skulls, every tap upon which is supposed to give the delinquents a thump to be felt even in the place of shades. At a yearly festival called the “Butter Festival” these skulls are sometimes (in a moment of priestly mercy) burnt, which is supposed to release the astral bodies of the sinners from kâma-lôkic torment. One such human drum has been presented to Brother George Mead. I understand that he means to burn it without waiting for the Butter Festival. In fact, I suspect that Brother Mead has moments of mercy weekly, even daily: he does not wait for a stated yearly softening of the heart. Another human curio is a rosary made of round bits from the tops of human skulls, taken from the part where the soul is said to pass out at death. This will also enkindle the flames of our brother's pity. It is not clear what constitutes the "adultery" thus punished, in the view of these Tibetan lamas, as it was also said that a woman might have as many as five husbands. Another custom. Tithes are paid to the lamas as a religious observance, and these they scrupulously exact. If anyone fails to pay tithes, the delinquent is hypnotized by the lamas, when he goes about quite cheerfully but starves himself to death by their suggestion! One would like to know whether this priesthood of exoteric Buddhism is a "red" or a "yellow cap" tribe. They would appear to belong to the class of lamas mentioned by Prince Henry of Orleans in his book on Tibet, whose frontiers he successfully passed. Curios of brass and silver were also brought by the visitor and generously donated to be sold for the benefit of the T.S. Crèche. A silver prayer-wheel and rosary covered with hammered ornamentation, Tibetan texts and designs, and also set with turquoises, and a fragile chatelaine of silver hung with small toilet accessories, were the prettiest objectivities from the far and fascinating land.

THE reported discovery of a new gas said to be allied to nitrogen, as announced at the Oxford meeting of the British Association, recalls the facts given in the Secret Doctrine on gases as yet unknown, which are the missing links of chemistry and alchemy. One of these, spoken of as paranitrogenic or nitrozonic, would appear to correspond to the "new" gas of modern pioneers, or rediscoverers, as we prefer to call them.

Another fulfilment of statements by the author of the Secret Doctrine is found in a paper on original research, the "Physical Researches on Nervous Matter", said to be by Richardson and published in the Asclepiad, II, No. 41. The author says that "great mistake" has been made and concealed by "one false observation". Anatomists supposed that "the brain and its elongations in the shape of nerves were absolutely solid substances, and although at one time it was thought that in the nervous fiber there was a fluid called specifically the nervous fluid . . .

and although the tubular character of the nerve has been exhibited by microscopists, with mistakes of observation owing to the circumstance that post-mortem changes have sometimes been taken as natural conditions, the grandest of errors has remained, that of looking upon the nervous matter as solid. The brain after death looks solid——". The author then proceeds to state, as his "first subject", the theory that the nervous matter is not solid during life, but is mobile. "It is not like a wire, as a conductor of vibration, but is rather like a column of mercury, movable by expansion and vibration of particle on particle, particles collected in centers, and in a certain sense distinct, yet all in communication by means of the connecting lines which rise from the expanses in the organs of sense and from the other surfaces." The paper concludes with various tests by oxidization, combustion in oxygen, and so forth, but I would call attention to the lines italicized by me above as finely descriptive of a condition of interior substance whose ensemble may stand as the astral or nervous body, moulded, in part, into the shape of the body which contains it, yet having, in most men and women, no specific form of its own; a carrier of "Life". H. P. B. always said that solidification of the brain after death rendered observation of the astral (or nervous) passages and "airs" impossible. Some of the most pregnant facts of practical occultism are based upon this truth. Have the microscopists tried the effect of the Tesla electric current upon the brain as soon after death as possible? Here is a hint to our scientific friends, for could the mobility of "coagulated" nervous matter be even partially restored under electric action, yet another portal to the unknown might be unlocked in part. To the pure clairvoyant power only is complete observation of the normal and fohatic action of nervous matter possible, yet even partial observation is a crutch to halting minds which, like Thomas, must touch objective fact. Nor is this an unnatural need. It is one wholly natural, for it has its root in the stubborn illusion of the physical senses. Its yoke is felt by all in one or another form, and that is one reason why, in these days when it seems to be the paltry fashion to touch upon the faults of the illustrious dead, and when even some trusted friends have been lured to post-mortem dissection of H. P. B. and to claims that those of her utterances or testimonies which disagree from their personal views were false or were the subjects of her unrecorded and unobserved repentance, I would revert to that larger method common to seekers after unity in all ages, I would by synthetic deduction from her wonderful insight, her prophetic vigor, her unflinching humanitarian service, prove the upward tendency of her being, and would suggest that post-mortem observers of her character, as objectively crystalised in their own minds, may have been blinded by the new and rigorous conditions. The spiritual eye sees all things by its own light shed upon them. So with the eye of the mind; so, indeed, said H. P. B., with the physical eye, which in fact emits an energy by which it sees, though modern science knows naught of this. Emerson said: "Greatness is always in a tendency, not in an action. It is for us to believe in the rule, not in the exception. The noble are thus known from the ignoble." H. P. B. tended ever towards a brighter light. She, whose spiritual beneficiaries and dependents with coldly self-righteous sighs deplore here and there a fault, a spot, (a solar spot, it may be, to eyes of faith), saw the blackest sins, crimes even, as she now sees paltry infidelities or the ingratitude of microscopic analysts—with a heart of largest pardon. Pardon, do I say? Ye gods; what homeric laughter must now be hers, who was wont to laugh as with that other Sphinx, great Nature! Ah, friends; it were easy to touch apparent lapses of character and action, yet let us rather endeavor to rival her in charity, in the largeness of her silence. Somewhat she has, perhaps, to pardon in us all. We are too prone to forget that "Self-knowledge is of loving deeds the child". And that other watchword left by her: "Inaction in a deed of mercy becomes an action in a deadly sin". In the name of her infinite pardon give the lie to those who bid us look unmoved on another's pain; "tell them their tongue is false". The Law brings pain; be it ours to heal that pain, and, like little children, to love one another. Now that Love is not emotion. It is unmoved Compassion, itself the mover of worlds. Its herald here below is to leave the awards of action or inaction to the Law, as does the living Lodge, while we work for, with, in, and through one another.

LITERARY NOTES.

MERCURY, the Children's Theosophical Monthly, is very good in its October issue, especially in "The Fairy and the Giant" and the Rev. W. E. Copeland's "Catechism for Children". Yet to eat no meat and to "love nothing" are not Theosophical injunctions.

A THEOSOPHICAL VIEW OF SPIRITUALISM is an eight-page pamphlet issued from the Pacific Coast Headquarters. It has ability, but is heavy, much too general in treatment, has not enough of specific illustration, adds little or nothing to thought already published, and can hardly be serviceable for general circulation.—[A.F.]

THE OPEN COURT has an excellent short story entitled "Karma", which excellently illustrates the doctrine, the scene being laid in India. It has been copied by daily newspapers. This all shows the hold the noble philosophy is gaining here, while in India missionaries are striving to convert the ignorant to Christianity of various sects.

THE NORTHERN THEOSOPHIST for October has another of those marvelously sensible and vigorous outpourings which make the "Editor's Remarks" so unique in Theosophical literature. Their manly tone, utter freedom from fantasy or nonsense, intense perception of reality and practicalness, are delightful. There is something very fine in an English character of this particular type, and its exhibition in the T.S. arouses the exhilaration felt by Churchmen when Arnold of Rugby, Kingsley, and their school appeared on the scene.—[A. F.]

THE LAMP, the little monthly published by the Toronto T. S. and 5000 copies of which are each month distributed, is an astonishing case of Branch enterprise, and the October number is filled with instructive matter. The International Sunday School Lessons, the apt quotations of pithy sentences from many quarters, the stress put upon right living as the test of character, the Branch discussions of Bible texts under Theosophical light, the beautiful spirit of charity and earnestness pervading it, all are noble features of this singularly excellent periodical. Subscription is but 25 cents a year, and may be sent to the Editor at 365 Spadina avenue.—[A. F.]

THE JAGAT GURU'S LECTURE at Madura, India, in March is sent on from Adyar. This guru is called "His Holiness" by the Madras Mail. In the lecture he said the chela should be more devoted to his guru than to God even, because the guru can protect him from the anger of God whereas God cannot protect him from the anger of the guru. Some of the lecture is good, particularly the illustrations, but certainly students in the West will not accept the above theory that the guru is more powerful than God. It is becoming more plain every day that the older teaching of the Upanishads showing the Self of each to be the true Guru guide and protector is best for the West, and that the India of to-day is not the spiritual guide of the West.

"SOME MODERN FAILINGS" is a reprint by the T.P.S. of two striking articles in Lucifer signed by a Chinese name, Che-Yew-Tsäng, and with a Chinese quality faithfully kept up. These articles were so admirable and so sought after that they are now issued as a pamphlet. The writer has drunk deeply of the spirit, the ideas, and even the phraseology of Jasper Niemand, unconsciously displaying the very tones of that distinguished Theosophist. There is the same intense devotion to duty, the same exuberant loyalty to leaders, the same heartiness of service. The doctrine (p. 19) that distaste for the fault of another excites the same fault in oneself may seem to clear minds a little fantastic, but it is a small demerit compared with the great worth of the articles. (Orderable through PATH, 10 cents.)—[A. F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VII, No. 9, has two papers. "Plethora", by Dr. R. C. Fisher, excellently well expounds the matter of food as to quantity, quality, and effects, advocating a vegetable diet and a rational system of medication for disease. It is published at the special request of the Countess Wachtmeister. "Freewill and Karma", by Wm. Kingsland, is a reprint from Lucifer, and is a noble and beautiful paper, of singular spiritual apprehension, inspiring and strengthening. This is especially true of the last two pages. There is one drawback,—the representing our individual consciousness as the aggregate of the consciousness of the physical cells of our body, and the Supreme Spirit as the aggregate of our individual Egos (page 18). Fortunately the following passages swamp such materialistic teaching.—[A. F.]

SEPTEMBER THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves XXX" completes the First Series, carrying the history up to the point of the actual embarkation for India of the Founders, December 18, 1878. Col. Olcott's imitation of a medium and H. P. B.'s delight at its success upon a Spiritualist are brilliantly described; the passing project of merging the T.S. in the Masonic body is touched on, though nothing is said of what would then have become of the female Founder; a singular phenomenon by H. P. B. is recorded,—the production of a large number of visiting cards of friends, of every variety and style, all in a pack of playing cards and vanishing as these were shuffled; accounts are given of her remarkable talent for drawing, of her naturalization as an American citizen, of her foretelling the arrival of letters and reading the contents before they were opened, of the final preparations for sailing, and of the actual embarkment. Col. Olcott secured in a phonograph speeches from twenty persons and has preserved the tin-foil sheets in Adyar. What would not one give to thus hear H. P. B.'s voice again! Dr. du Prel's "Clairvoyance" continues to be one of the most delightful articles ever given in the Theosophist; "An Ancient Egyptian Heretical Pharaoh" is a most interesting and singular bit of history; "Black Domino", a spook story, is ingenious but not good in style or execution; Mr. Walter R. Old's "Zoroastrianism" shows careful and excellent work; "Told by a Typewriter" would be very curious if a fact, which a footnote says it is not. The reviews are of most extraordinary brevity and of most ordinary merit.—[A. F.]

SEPTEMBER LUCIFER drops the effigy of Lucifer and appears with title-page severely plain and in pale blue. Who would have suspected that H. P. B. could so soon become a memory! First the effigy she selected was discarded for another; now even that disappears, and the very name "Lucifer" is editorially lamented as "rash and ill-advised", one apologized for up to the present issue which rids itself of both apology and effigy. The parting from the latter is said to be "with regret", but perhaps if the regret had been keener the parting might have been avoided. Assurance is given that the name is to be retained, and the cover still bears the words "Founded by H. P. Blavatsky", and yet in times so strangely changeful faith cannot wholly dislodge apprehension. Very significant intimation is made that the author of Light on the Path is veering towards reconciliation and towards a return to that Path. The fatted calf and the ring, even the best robe, seem to be ready, and, as if still further to soothe the prodigal, the "thaumaturgy of tea-cups" is referred to with great disdain, a phrase so captivating that it is three times used. Perhaps the T. P. S. may contribute to these blandishments by issuing a new edition of Light on the Path. "Tibetan Teachings" is the first of a series of articles by H. P. B., prepared for the Theosophist in '82 but never published. "The Real and the Unreal" is a fine paper, as is also "The Ethics of Study", and "The Book of the Azure Veil", after some interesting remarks, begins a translation of the famous Popol Vuh.

AMERICA.

SALT LAKE T. S. is holding public and private Sunday meetings alternately, average attendance at former being fifty.

MACON T. S., Macon, Ga., has hired a hall for the exclusive use of the Branch, and its good effect on the meetings is already apparent.

THE LIBRARIAN OF THE SIOUX CITY (Iowa) Public Library says that no other books in the Library are so much called for as Theosophical ones.

THE REV. J. J. LANIER, Rector of St. Paul's Church,, Savannah, preached a sermon on October 14th in which Reincarnation was strongly maintained as solving the problems of life.

THE PRINTING OF BRANCH SYLLABI is a growing practice and most salutary. Annie Besant T. S. has just printed a singularly handsome one, and Kansas City T. S. one neat and effective.

ON THE 5th of October H. A. Freeman lectured on "Theosophy in Small Things" at the White Lotus Center, 328 East Houston street. Meetings are held regularly on Friday evenings.

ARYAN T. S. had Sunday evening lectures in October: "Theosophy and Spiritualism", Willam O. Judge; "The Story of Osiris", Harry S. Budd; "Theosophical Musings", H. Alfred Freeman; "Theosophy and Art", Wm. Main.

SHILA T.S., Chicago, Ill, was chartered on September 26th with six charter-members, and is the 96th Branch on the American roll. The President is Mrs. Henrietta Hadley, and the Secretary Mrs. Harriet L. North, 1520 W. Monroe street.

"H.P.B." T.S. had Sunday evening lectures in October: "Gardens and Graveyards", H. T. Patterson; "In the Beginning", Miss K. Hillard; "The Theosophy of the 'Children of the Sun'", John M. Pryse; "Infidelity", Alexander Fullerton.

BROOKLYN T.S. had Sunday evening lectures in October: "The Theosophy of the 'Children of the Sun'", John M. Pryse; "Materialism", Alex. Fullerton; "Theosophy and Spiritualism", William Q. Judge; "The History of a World", Jos. H. Fussell.

PUT-IN-BAY, OHIO, received on Sep. 29th a visit and lecture from Mrs. Edith Lockwood of Cincinnati. This was by request, and the request was quite justified by the very interesting exposition of Theosophy it produced, and of which the press spoke enthusiastically.

REV. A. ORUDORFF, a Presbyterian minister in New Paris, Ohio, has preached an expository sermon on Theosophy, showing, if correctly reported by the press, the reasonableness and beauty of many of its doctrines. Now if every minister of each denomination would do likewise, more would be accomplished for unity than by centuries of the Evangelical Alliance.

DANA T.S., Sioux City, Iowa, gave seven days' work at the late Inter-State Fair, distributed tracts to over 1300 people, programs of the present year's plans to nearly as many, sold many books and answered many inquiries. An opportunity to know something of Theosophy was thus placed before thousands. The Branch has now a free Theosophical Reading-room, open daily.

NEW LOTUS CIRCLES. Some of these have been started at Tacoma, Wash., Portland, Ore., and Columbus, Ohio. The Tacoma Circle hired an organ so as to have music. Meetings are held every Sunday morning. These Lotus Circles are the result of the trip of the New York delegates to Convention, as Mrs. Cape of New York endeavored to excite interest in the subject at all stopping-places on the way home.

COLUMBUS T.S. has been the recipient of a unique and valuable offering from one of its members, Dr. Harriet L. Henderson, 801 Oak street. She has built an extension to her house and appropriately fitted it up as Branch Meeting-room and Library, thus ensuring convenience and comfort. If every Theosophist was as determined to secure a home for his Branch as for himself, results would soon be felt. The foto of the Columbus quarters is most attractive.

THE CINCINNATI T.S. held its first regular meeting of the season in its new and central rooms on Tuesday evening, October 16th. Dr. J. D. Buck delivered an exceedingly interesting address on "Ancient Beliefs and Modern Thought". An audience of one hundred and eighty-four was considered as an index of the interest in this vicinity. A number of questions were asked of a nature which indicated the earnestness of the inquirers. Twenty-five names were handed in to the Secretary as a nucleus for the Secret Doctrine Class. Everyone seemed pleased with the new headquarters, their attractive appearance and increased library room coming in for a share of praise.

THE WORLD INTERVIEW upon the Fifth and Sixth Races has aroused a good deal of interest, although some members have thought it improbable that the editor of the PATH should have said the new race might be gigantic, have two spinal columns and a third eye. Well, he said just that in response to questions put by the reporter, who dressed it up to suit himself. The article was absurdly illustrated, but was reprinted in papers all over the country. Truthful replies being made, one is not responsible for the absurdities of others; and interest is shown to have been aroused or prominent papers would not have reprinted. 'Tis better to be mentioned as a Society than to remain in respectable obscurity, while at the same time sensation should never be our motive.

BURCHAM HARDING continues working in the New England States. At Lowell lectures were given, and the Center commenced its winter sessions. On September 27th he addressed the Newton Highlands Club on "Reincarnation". Two lectures were given at Providence, R.I., and increased activity added to the Branch work. Lectures at Fall River, Mass., resulted in a center for study being inaugurated. On October 4th and 5th he lectured at New Bedford, Mass., which was started as a Center in June last. Working at New Britain, Conn., several new members have joined that always-active Branch. Meriden, Conn., was visited and Theosophy brought prominently before the public through the local newspapers. The class formed last spring is doing excellent work. At Hartford, Conn., lectures in Unity Hall were well attended, and a new class organized. The "pralaya" of that prettily-situated city seems in a fair way to be removed.

IN CHICAGO the fall work has commenced with great promise. A new Branch has been formed, called the West Chicago Branch. It occupies a pleasant room in a central business location on the west-side, where classes, meetings, and lectures are held every week. It is an active center in a wide field. The Englewood Branch has taken an important step forward in securing a room in a public building for its meetings and lectures. Four new classes have been started at Headquarters. The Secret Doctrine class meets once in two weeks. The H.P.B. Training-class for Theosophical speakers was organized under the direction and tuition of Mrs. Charlotte E. Robertson. Two classes for beginners, one in the afternoon for ladies, and one in the evening, study the Ocean of Theosophy. During the past two months the following lectures on Theosophy have been given: "What is the Soul?", Mr. Harry Steele Budd (by invitation); "The First Object of the T.S.", Miss Pauline G. Kelly; "When Doctors Disagree" and "Lessons of the Soul", Miss Eva T. Gates; "The Mystery of Initiation" and "Spiritual Growth", Miss Leoline Leonard; "The Object of Life", Mr. G. M. Willis; "Evolution", Mr. Wm. E. Puffer; and "A Forgotten Truth", Mr. R. D. A. Wade.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE went to Boston on September 30th, lecturing and visiting Branches. October 1st he visited and spoke to the Center at Lynn, and lectured to the Somerville T.S. on the 3d at the house of Mrs. Slocum. October 4th there was a full meeting at the Boston Headquarters, when the lecture was on "The Theosophical Society and the Opportunity". Mr. Judge then returned to New York. On October 14th he lectured again in Boston at the Hollis Street Theater on "Ghosts, Apparitions, and Spirits" to a fair audience. A good deal of attention was paid to this by the newspapers before and after. The Transcript had an editorial. On the 15th Portland, Me., was visited and work done with the Branch there. October 17th Mr. Judge lectured again at Union Hall in Somerville on "Karma and Reincarnation", and on the 18th at Cambridge on "H.P.B. and her Teachings" in the afternoon, going from there to the Malden Branch in the evening. Providence was reached on the 19th, and a lecture on Theosophy given in the Museum Hall to a full audience, followed by a meeting with the Branch afterwards until 11 p.m., when Mr. Judge returned to New York. The New England work is in good order, and the great number of earnest members centered in and about Boston gives assurance of good for the future.

PACIFIC COAST ITEMS.

THE TATHAGATA T.S., San Ardo, Monterey Co., Calif., was chartered on September 26th with five charter-members, and ranks 95th on the American roll. The President is Mr. John Charles Hadley, and the Secretary is Mr. Louis R. Nougaret.

SEATTLE T.S. had Sunday lectures in October: "Kama Loka, Devachan, and Nirvana", A. C. Thees; "Thought-transference, Hypnotism, and Magnetism", Frank I. Blodgett; "Darwinism and Theosophy", George Sheffield; "Moving, Rocking, and Talking Stones", Mrs. Anna L. Blodgett.

AURORA T.S., Oakland, Calif., has established a Headquarters and a free library at Hamilton Hall, 775 13th street, which will be open daily except Sunday from 2 to 5 p.m. On Sunday at 2:30 p.m. is the Children's Hour; at 12:15 is a meeting religious and ethical for the study of Eastern religious literature; at 7:45 is a free public lecture on some Theosophical topic. On Friday at 3 is a class for the study of the Secret Doctrine; and at 8 on the first and third Fridays of each month informal Branch meetings are held, open to the public.

SOLAR BRANCH, located at Shelton, Wash., received a visit and lecture from Dr. Griffiths Sept. 18th and 19th. An informal reception was given on his arrival, after which the Branch meeting was held, when Branch proceedings and study were discussed and adopted. Upon the next evening a general lecture on Theosophy and the T.S. was given before an attentive audience, followed by questions and answers. Other meetings were held. A class had been formed by several Branch members who could not conscientiously send their children to orthodox Sunday-schools. The Lotus Circle was explained by the lecturer, and the Shelton Lotus Circle will no doubt be the second formed in the Northwest. At Olympia lectures were given Sept. 21st and 23d, also a public quiz Sept. 22d. At a special Branch meeting a systematic line of work and study was adopted, and prospects seem brighter that the old Karma of Olympia Branch is disappearing. Sept. 24th at Centralia, Wash., the lecture given was upon "The Principal Features of Theosophy". The week from Sept. 25th to 30th was spent in Portland, Oregon. A lecture on Brotherhood was given Sept 26th, and in Arion Hall, Sept 30th, before a large audience, "Theosophy and Heredity" was the subject presented. Branch and other work filled out the week. During his trip to the Northwest Dr. Griffiths visited ten cities, gave seventeen public lectures, and attended nineteen Branch and other meetings. At Oakland, Calif., Sunday, Oct. 7th, a lecture on Brotherhood was given to a full house.

FOREIGN.

MR. PETER D'ABREW returned to Ceylon after his visit to Europe, in which he created much interest in the English public concerning the cause of education of girls in Ceylon. This was especially the case with his address to the ladies of the Pioneer Club, and favorable notices of his work were made by many English papers. During his stay in England he was elected a fellow of the Imperial Institute. The work of Mrs. Higgins, Dr. English and family, and Mr. D'Abrew still goes on independently in the Cinnamon Gardens, and a new center has been formed in Colombo which will accomplish much. A league is to be formed to extend the work of the School and to collect funds to build and endow the proposed college.

THE WORK IN HONOLULU goes steadily on and with most gratifying results. Two lectures have been given each week, one public, the other in private parlors. In addition a class for the study of the Key to Theosophy has met every Wednesday evening at Headquarters. The following lectures have been given: Sept. 4th, "Sevenfold Nature of Man"; Sept. 7th, "Universal Brotherhood"; Sept. 11th, "Rounds and Races"; Sept. 14th, "Objections to Reincarnation Considered"; Sept. 18th, the parlor talk being transferred to the hall in response to numerous requests for further instruction, it was decided to give a series of addresses on consecutive themes, to be followed by questions from the audience; and on this occasion the subject chosen was "Fundamental Teachings of Theosophy". Thirty persons attended this open class. Much interest was shown in the matter presented, and the questioning was animated and markedly intelligent. Sept. 21st a large audience assembled to hear a lecture on "Mme. Blavatsky and the Adepts"; Sept. 25th, not less than forty persons attended the open class, which was addressed on "The Transformations of Life". The subject for Sept. 28th was "Karma".

FINANCIAL STRESS AT HEADQUARTERS.

The Treasurer's Report to the April Convention showed a surplus in the General Fund of $2,432.79, and in the Lectureship Fund of $513.69. So large, however, were the outlays ordered by Convention for expenses of delegates to Judicial Committee at London, etc., that this surplus, together with income since April ($1,784.30), is nearly exhausted. On October 1st the surplus on hand was but $619.99, and when the excess of expenses over receipts in October is deducted, and then the $444.50 for semi-annual rent payable in November, this sum will evidently not sustain the office through the month of November.

As has been often explained, our very small charges for dues and fees are entirely inadequate to cover expenses. But for spontaneous gifts and the funds raised by Mr. Harter's scheme and the White Lotus Day offerings, we could not go on. The exhaustion of the surplus and the non-receipt of yearly dues before January 1st leave us without resources. I therefore make a very earnest appeal to each member of the Section for such help as he can give, asking that his donation be sent direct to the General Secretary.

The Lectureship Fund has received since April $259.95 and expended $569.76. We had on hand but $203.88 upon October 1st. The support of our Lecturer, Mr. Claude Falls Wright, rests upon this Fund, as also such of his railway fares as are not borne by Branches. At times the Fund is obliged to contribute to the fares of another helper in the Lecture field, and I must apply to it myself for assistance towards the visitation among Branches and lecturing tour which I purpose this autumn. The peculiarly important conditions of the present epoch make special efforts in work most obligatory. For this fund too I ask the liberal help of zealous Theosophists. Without it our program must be abandoned. With it that program may be indefinitely enlarged.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE, General Secretary.

CONCERNING THE ORIENTAL DEPARTMENT PAPERS.

Hitherto the Oriental Department Papers have been sent free to each member of the American Section in good standing, but the great expense incurred in securing, printing, and mailing these papers, coupled with the fact that some of the recipients do not really value them and make no adequate use of them, suggests that it would not only be more just but more wise to restrict the circulation to such as actually contribute towards the expense. They now cost $500 a year. As has been several times explained, about one-half the annual dues of $1.00 are returned to members in documents. A small subscription rate, say fifty cents a year, could easily be paid by all those who really desire to receive the Oriental Department Papers, and we would thus be saved the printing of a needlessly large edition and also receive an important contribution towards covering expenses. In that case the Papers would only be sent to those who subscribe, a copy going free to each Branch in good standing. I therefore submitted to the Executive Committee the following resolution, and received on August 23d their unanimous approval thereof:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Executive Committee the Annual Convention of next April should be invited to direct that the Oriental Department Papers, hitherto sent free to each member of the Section, should be hereafter supplied only to such members as subscribe fifty cents per year thereto, one copy being sent free to each Branch.

I make announcement of the above in order that members of the Section may have opportunity between now and the Convention to form their opinion, and also that the representatives of Branches may come to the Convention prepared to act thereon.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE,
General Secretary.

SUPPORT OF THE T. S.

"Business" is languishing: collections have fallen to almost next to nothing, yet there are a few new names to report, and a small remittance to make since last report two months ago.

New subscribers in the 25 cent per month Class:—J.C.S., G.L.H., H.W.S.
Total, per year, $9.00.

New subscribers in the 10 cents per month Class:—R.P.

Occasional:—R.P.

Collections since last report, $26.45. Remitted herewith.

51 Huffman ave., Dayton, O.

G. E. H.

October 15, 1894.

Received, October 17, 1894, Twenty-six dollars and forty-five cents from Geo. E. Harter, being collections since remittance of August 17th.

Æ U M

There is an infinite being which existed before heaven or earth.
How calm it is! how free!
It lives alone; it changes not.
It moves everywhere, but it never suffers.
We may look upon it as a Mother of the Universe.

I.

THESE letters will be continued each month in the PATH. They constitute a correspondence carried on by H.P.B. with her Russian relatives, and are being translated into English by H.P.B.'s niece, Mrs. C. Johnston, whose maiden name was Vera Jelihovsky, and whose mother is Mme. Jelihovsky, the sister of H.P.B. who contributed under her own name to Mr. Sinnett's Incidents in the Life of Madame Blavatsky. As most of the letters were not dated, it will not always be possible to say whether H.P.B. was writing from America, Tibet, Egypt, or the North Pole. A great many letters are in this correspondence, and the series will be continued until all are published. They are all of wonderful interest. It must be borne in mind for a clearer understanding of her words that she was writing to relatives who did not understand her strange inner life, and many of whom held religious opinions very different from hers. Permission has been given me to add some notes, but for those I alone will be responsible.

ABOUT the year 1875 Madame Jelihovsky, who is well known both on account of her own contributions to literature and also as the sister of Madame Blavatsky, heard that H.P.B. had commenced to write in a way that would have been impossible to her a few years before. How she had acquired the knowledge that won the unanimous praise of both the English and American press was beyond all explanation. There were rumors afloat as to "sorcery" being at the root of it, and filled with forebodings and terrors Madame Jelihovsky wrote to her sister, imploring an explanation.<sup>1</sup> She received the following reply:

"Do not be afraid that I am off my head. All that I can say is that someone positively inspires me— . . . more than this: someone enters me. It is not I who talk and write: it is something within me, my higher and luminous Self, that thinks and writes for me. Do not ask me, my friend, what I experience, because I could not explain it to you clearly. I do not know myself! The one thing I know is that now, when I am about to reach old age, I have become a sort of storehouse of somebody else's knowledge. . . . Someone comes and envelops me as a misty cloud and all at once pushes me out of myself, and then I am not "I" any more—Helena Petrovna Blavatsky—but someone else. Someone strong and powerful, born in a totally different region of the world; and as to myself it is almost as if I were asleep, or lying by not quite conscious,—not in my own body but close by, held only by a thread which ties me to it. However, at times I see and hear everything quite clearly: I am perfectly conscious of what my body is saying and doing—or at least its new possessor. I even understand and remember it all so well that afterwards I can repeat it and even write down his words. . . . At such a time I see awe and fear on the faces of Olcott and others, and follow with interest the way in which he half-pityingly regards them out of my own eyes and teaches them with my physical tongue. Yet not with my mind but his own, which enwraps my brain like a cloud. . . . Ah, but really I cannot explain everything."

H.P.B.'s astonishment at this marvellous development of her own powers would appear to have been great, if one may judge by a letter she wrote (about 1875 to 1876) to her aunt, Madame Fadeef, with whom she had been brought up and educated:

"Tell me, dear one, do you take any interest in physiologico-psychological mysteries? Here is one for you which is well qualified to astonish any physiologist: in our Society there are a few exceedingly learned members—for instance, Professor Wilder, one of the first archæologists and Orientalists in the United States, and all these people come to me to be taught, and swear that I know all kinds of Eastern languages and sciences, positive as well as abstract, much better than themselves. That's a fact! And it's as bad to run up against a fact as against a pitchfork. So then tell me: how could it have happened that I, whose learning was so awfully lame up to the age of forty, have suddenly become a phenomenon of learning in the eyes of people who are really learned? This fact is an impenetrable mystery of Nature. I—a psychological problem, an enigma for future generations, a Sphinx!<sup>1</sup> Just fancy that I, who have never in my life studied anything, and possess nothing but the most superficial smattering of general information; I, who never had the slightest idea about physics or chemistry or zoology, or anything else—have now suddenly become able to write whole dissertations about them. I enter into discussions with men of science, into disputes out of which I often emerge triumphant. . . . It's not a joke; I am perfectly serious; I am really frightened because I do not understand how it all happens. It is true that for nearly three years past I have been studying night and day, reading and thinking. But whatever I happen to read, it all seems familiar to me. . . . I find mistakes in the most learned articles, and in lectures by Tyndall, Herbert Spencer, Huxley, and others. If some archæologist happens to call on me, on taking leave he is certain to assure me that I have made clear to him the meaning of various monuments, and pointed out things to him of which he had never dreamed. All the symbols of antiquity, and their secret meaning, come into my head and stand there before my eyes as soon as the conversation touches on them.

“A pupil of Faraday's, a certain Professor H., who has been christened by the voice of a thousand mouths ‘the Father of experimental Physics’, having spent yesterday evening with me, now assures me that I am well qualified to ‘put Faraday in my pocket’. Can it be that they all are simply fools? But it is impossible to suppose that friends and enemies alike have leagued together to make of me a savant if all that I do is to prove superficially certain wild theories of my own. And if it was only my own devoted Olcott and other Theosophists who had such a high opinion of me, it could be said: ‘Dans le pays des aveugles les borgnes sont rois’ (‘In a country of blind men the one-eyed are kings’). But I continually have a whole crowd from morning to night of all kinds of Professors, Doctors of Science, and Doctors of Divinity;¹ . . . for instance, there are two Hebrew Rabbis here, Adler and Goldstein, who are both of them thought to be the greatest Talmudists. They know by heart both the Quabalah of Simeon Ben Jochai and the Codex Nazaræus of Bardesanes. They were brought to me by A., a protestant clergyman and commentator on the Bible, who hoped they would prove that I am mistaken on the subject of a certain statement in the Chalden Bible of Onkelos. And with what result? I have beaten them. I quoted to them whole sentences in ancient Hebrew and proved to them that Onkelos is an authority of the Babylonian school."

In the earlier letters of H. P. B. to Madame Jelihovsky the intelligence which has been referred to as "enveloping her body" and using her brain is spoken of as "the Voice" or "Sahib". Only later did she name this, or another "Voice", as "Master". For instance, she writes to Madame Jelihovsky:

"I never tell anyone here about my experience with the Voice. When I try to assure them that I have never been in Mongolia, that I do not know either Sanskrit or Hebrew or ancient European languages, they do not believe me. 'How is this,' they say, 'you have never been there, and yet you describe it all so accurately? You do not know the languages and yet you translate straight from the originals!' and so they refuse to believe me.² They think that I have some mysterious reasons for secrecy; and besides, it is an awkward thing for me to deny when everyone has heard me discussing various Indian dialects with a lecturer who has spent twenty years in India. Well, all that I can say is, either they are mad or I am a changeling!"

About this time H. P. B. appears to have been greatly troubled, for though some members of the nascent Theosophical Society were able to get "visions of pure Planetary Spirits", she could only see "earthly exhalations, elementary spirits" of the same category, which she said played the chief part in materializing sèances. She writes:

"In our Society everyone must be a vegetarian, eating no flesh and drinking no wine. This is one of our first rules.³ It is well known what an evil influence the evaporations of blood and alcohol have on the spiritual side of human nature, blowing the animal passions into a raging fire; and so one of these days I have resolved to fast more severely than hitherto. I ate only salad and did not even smoke for whole nine days, and slept on the floor, and this is what happened: I have suddenly caught a glimpse of one of the most disgusting scenes of my own life, and I felt as if I was out of my body, looking at it with repulsion whilst it was walking, talking, getting puffed up with fat and sinning. Pheugh, how I hated myself! Next night when I again lay down on the hard floor, I was so tired out that I soon fell asleep and then got surrounded with a heavy, impenetrable darkness. Then I saw a star appearing; it lit up high, high above me, and then fell, dropping straight upon me. It fell straight on my forehead and got transformed into a hand. Whilst this hand was resting on my forehead I was all ablaze to know whose hand it was. . . . I was concentrated into a single prayer, into an impulse of the will, to learn who it was, to whom did this luminous hand belong. . . . And I have learned it: there stood over it I myself. Suddenly this second me spoke to my body, 'Look at me!' My body looked at it and saw that the half of this second me was as black as jet, the other half whitish-grey, and only the top of the head perfectly white, brilliant, and luminous. And again I myself spoke to my body: 'When you become as bright as this small part of your head, you will be able to see what is seen by others, by the purified who have washed themselves clean. . . . And meanwhile, make yourself clean, make yourself clean, make yourself clean.' And here I awoke."

² In London, in 1888, a Hindû who had met her at Meerut said to her in my presence through an interpreter that he was surprised she did not use his language then, as she had used it at Meerut. She replied: "Ah, yes, but that was at Meerut."—W.Q.J.

³ This was a proposed rule. H.P.B. accepted a thing proposed as a thing done, and so spoke of it here. But she did not carry out that rule then proposed, and never then suggested its enforcement to me.—W.Q.J.

At one time H.P.B. was exceedingly ill with advanced rheumatism in her leg. Doctors told her that it was gangrened, and considered her case hopeless. But she was successfully treated by a negro who was sent to her by the "Sahib". She writes to Madame Jelihovsky:

"He has cured me entirely. And just about this time I have begun to feel a very strange duality. Several times a day I feel that besides me there is someone else, quite separable from me, present in my body. I never lose the consciousness of my own personality; what I feel is as if I were keeping silent and the other one—the lodger who is in me—were speaking with my tongue. For instance, I know that I have never been in the places which are described by my 'other me', but this other one—the second me—does not lie when he tells about places and things unknown to me, because he has actually seen them and knows them well. I have given it up: let my fate conduct me at its own sweet will; and besides, what am I to do? It would be perfectly ridiculous if I were to deny the possession of knowledge avowed by my No. 2, giving occasion to the people around me to imagine that I keep them in the dark for modesty's sake. In the night, when I am alone in my bed, the whole life of my No. 2 passes before my eyes, and I do not see myself at all, but quite a different person—different in race and different in feelings. But what's the use of talking about it? It's enough to drive one mad. I try to throw myself into the part and to forget the strangeness of my situation. This is no mediumship, and by no means an impure power; for that, it has too strong an ascendancy over us all, leading us into better ways. No devil would act like that. 'Spirits', maybe? But if it comes to that, my ancient 'spooks' dare not approach me any more. It's enough for me to enter the room where a sèance is being held to stop all kinds of phenomena at once, especially materializations. Ah no, this is altogether of a higher order! But phenomena of another sort take place more and more frequently under the direction of my No. 2.<sup>1</sup> One of these days I will send you an article about them. It is interesting."

THE MAGIC MIRROR.

A FAITHFUL RECORD OF A STRANGE EXPERIENCE.

(Concluded.)

SUCH were the salient features of the mysterious sanctum into which I had been conducted by the awe-inspiring divinity of the place.

At the bidding of the clairvoyante I approached the circular object before which she had taken up her position. It proved to be a black marble bowl resting on a tripod of polished brass. It was filled almost to the brim with a dark, sticky substance resembling pitch or tar, which emitted a faint and rather unpleasant odor.

Without a word my strange companion, after stationing me at the opposite side of the basin and immediately under the pendant star, began a series of mesmeric-like passes above the bowl. She extended her arms repeatedly in a graceful curve, as if endeavoring to draw within the compass of the basin an invisible something from the oppressive atmosphere of the room.

In the course of a few minutes the result of these manipulations became apparent. As if impelled by some occult force the sticky, inert mass began to move: then it lost its former aspect of viscosity, and finally it fairly boiled and bubbled like a cauldron of steaming lava.

Apparently satisfied with the results obtained, the seeress withdrew her hands from the bowl, whereupon the tumult within subsided, and in a short time the contents presented the appearance of a miniature lake of ink, as smooth and motionless as a solid block of marble.

“Now then,” said my vis-a-vis, while the lines in her face began to harden, “do not look at me, but keep your eyes fastened upon the moulveh—”

“The moulveh?” I interrupted, wonderingly.

“Yes, the bhatta, the substance in the basin. Moulveh we call it in my country. It possesses magical properties. All that you will to know you shall behold reflected from its surface. See? the spell has begun to work already.”

So saying she directed my gaze to the inky pool, and riveting her own upon the burnished star above my head, which, improbable as it may seem, began to coruscate with intense brilliancy, she lapsed into complete silence.

And now a strange thing occurred. As I bent over the basin a wave of pale white light flitted across the face of the mysterious disc. Then a misty vapor ascended in curling wreaths from its somber depths. In a few seconds it passed off, leaving the surface of the moulveh clearer and more mirror-like than before.

Suddenly I detected what I took to be the shadowy outlines of a picture at the very bottom of the sleeping mass. Gradually it rose, gathering strength as it progressed, until at length it stood out in sharp relief against its background of jet, clear-cut, vivid, tangible almost in its intense realness and fidelity.

Astonished beyond measure I bestowed a furtive glance upon the extraordinary being whose powers so far outran those of common mortals like myself. She seemed to be in a state of profound somnolism. Her body was as rigid as stone, her face over-spread with the ghastly pallor of death. Her eyes, blazing like twin bulbs of electrical fire, were still fixed upon the overhanging star, more coruscant, if anything, than before. With a shudder I returned to the contemplation of the picture, which I had not heretofore examined in its minutiae.

The scene before me represented one of the large trans-Atlantic steamers tossed hither and thither in the trough of a mighty sea. Apparently a great storm was in progress. On deck everything was bustle and confusion. And yet not a sound broke the solemn quiet of the room. Figures in the garb of seamen hurried to and fro at the bidding of an officer who directed their movements from the bridge. Scattered about, a score of adventurous passengers might be seen clinging for safety to the various supports of the vessel. There was a familiar look about one of these forms; at a second glance I recognized in it a faithful portraiture of myself, as far as the features were concerned, although the clothing, which was of an odd pattern, in no wise resembled anything in my modest wardrobe.

With curious interest I watched my miniature image as it moved calm and unruffled through the excited and panic-stricken throng. I could not doubt the reality of the phantom picture: to do so would be to discredit the evidence of my senses. I knew beyond peradventure that I was face to face with myself!

But what struck me as the most remarkable feature of the pantomimic display was the fact that, despite the turbulent riot of the waves and the incessant activity of the beleaguered crew, not a ripple disturbed for an instant the placid surface of the imprisoned moult. From start to finish it remained as still and quiescent as a sheet of glass.

And now scene after scene succeeds, each merging into its neighbor with panoramic rapidity. I see the same ship anchored safely in a foreign port; I melt into the stream that pours down the gangplank to the shore; I pass the inspection of the customs officers, and before I am aware of the change I see myself whirled in a railway carriage with the speed of the wind over miles of undulating country dotted with thrifty villages and productive farms, rich in the variegated herbage of an autumn day.

On, on I speed with the shifting panorama until my journey's end is reached. I dismount from my car in the station of a bustling American city, where I am warmly embraced and welcomed by my waiting aunt. We enter a carriage at the door and are driven rapidly over uneven streets alive with traffic, which shortly give place to smooth boulevards lined with picturesque residences. We stop before an elegant mansion, where I am ushered into a tidy room, evidently set apart for my occupancy.

In the twinkling of an eye the picture vanishes and another flits across the bosom of the magic pond. Now I am seated at a desk in the office of a busy concern. I seem to occupy a position of trust, for I am bending my ear to catch the whispered confidences of a trio of dignified men whose bearing indicates the nature of the relation that exists between us. They rise and pass out, and then a younger man, a fellow clerk apparently, appears and, seating himself at a desk in the rear, scowls at me behind my back. There is a look of ill-concealed malice on his face, a dark, forbidding frown upon his brow. His presence troubles me. I am nervous and ill at ease. I close my eyes involuntary as if to shut out the unwelcome sight, and when I open them again I am alone at my desk, running up and down long columns of figures in the books spread out before me. I appear vexed and baffled. I rise and pace the room; then I return to my books, only to rise again more disconcerted than ever.

While I am attempting to solve the problem of my evident embarrassment, the quiet picture is replaced by one of wild commotion. I am standing at a railroad crossing surrounded by a crowd of struggling, white-faced men. At my feet lies the body of a young man, covered with blood, the limbs severed from the trunk. I kneel beside the hapless wretch and tenderly lift the drooping head upon my lap. He turns his glazing eyes toward me; he whispers a few disjointed words in my ear and sinks back upon the roadway—dead. Great God! in the livid, upturned face I recognize the features of the young man who had scowled at me from his stool! I could stand no more. With a cry of horror I dashed from the fever-laden atmosphere of the darkened room, out into the sunlight of the fresh September day, and for one—two—three hours I wandered on and on—I cared not where—it mattered little—so long as I increased the distance between me and that accursed abode of diabolism and witchcraft—I would fain say, of jugglery and deceit. Never again, I resolved for the thousandth time during my mad walk, would I attempt to lift the curtain which the Almighty has mercifully interposed to save his children from a too forward knowledge of their lot.

When I had regained my usual composure I retraced my steps to the business quarter of the town. By this time I had fully made up my mind to leave Manchester for good, and so without more ado I sought the office of the White Star Line and secured a berth on the steamer booked to sail from Liverpool on the following day.

I then took leave of my employers and my fellow-clerks, from whom I parted with much reluctance and regret. When I closed the door behind me for the last time I carried with me not only the promised letter of recommendation but a new ten-pound note as well, which the Messrs. Sloan, with the utmost delicacy, had tendered to me above and beyond the amount due for services rendered. As I hastened to my lodgings to pack my few worldly belongings, my eye was attracted to a suit of fashionable cut in the shop-windows of a leading clothier and outfitter. In an instant I saw that the pattern of the cloth was identical with that which had struck me so forcibly in the spectral picture of the storm at sea.

Here then was the first confirmation of the weird revelations of the magic mirror. Under the circumstances I could not, even if I would, forego the purchase of the clothes, which fitted me to perfection. Half of my new ten-pound note I left in the tailor's hands, and with my bundle under my arm I repaired to my lodgings. By noon of the next day I was on board ship, bound for the far-off land of the stars and stripes.

What need to dwell at length upon the events only too faithfully foreshadowed on the glassy face of the enchanted bowl? Suffice it to say that the prophecies of the mirror were fulfilled to the letter. Everything was verified: the fierce gale at sea, my arrival in New York, the journey to Buffalo, my reception by my aunt, Mrs. Mindham, and my subsequent installation into the office of accountant for Buckley Bros. & Baker, with the unhappy issues attendant thereon.

Whatever element of mystery might have attached to any of the fleeting scenes I had witnessed was cleared up in due course. While I was doing ample justice to the first dinner set before me in Buffalo, my aunt explained, in answer to my request for information, that Buckley Bros. & Baker had but recently succeeded to the business of the older concern—which accounted for the non-quotations of the firm by the Bradstreet Agency.

The new member of the company (Mr. Baker) had married the daughter of my aunt some months before, and it was through his influence that the position, made vacant by the resignation of my predecessor, was given to me.

Before my first day's work was over I realized the fact that the young man, Edward Veitch by name, who had figured so unfavorably in the prospective incidents of my career, was destined to be a no less disagreeable companion than he had been represented. He had aspired to the vacancy himself, but on account of his growing fondness for intoxicants the management did not deem it advisable to entrust the conduct of their business to his hands. Nor did they feel exactly at liberty to discharge him, seeing that in spite of his failings he was a valuable man in his way; consequently they refused to advance him to the position which it was my good fortune afterwards to secure. It was galling to Veitch's vanity to be forced to "play second fiddle to a John Bull", as he contemptuously expressed it, and in every manner possible he sought to render my new occupation odious to me. Seeing that I paid little or no attention to the petty annoyances and insults which he heaped upon me continually, he resorted to more questionable means to bring me into discredit with my employers, and by a series of adroit falsifications succeeded in throwing the books out of balance to the extent of several thousand dollars.

Although I suspected him of duplicity I could not prove my point, nor was I able to locate the source of error, even after a systematic course of re-checking. For hours at a time, just as the prophetic moult had foreshown, I hung over my books until I was almost upon the verge of delirium.

At last the crisis came. After an unusually sleepless night I hurried off to my work, to continue the search. Just as I was about to settle down to my wearisome task a messenger, panting and breathless, dashed into the office. My fellow-clerk, Veitch, in attempting to board an incoming train had been dragged under the iron wheels of the car. Almost with his parting breath he had summoned me to his side. Jumping into a cab I was quickly upon the scene of the disaster. Is it necessary to say that the last and final picture of the series was reproduced in its entirety then and there, even to the confirmation of the very stones in the road upon which I knelt? As the crushed and mangled body of poor Veitch began to stiffen in my arms, he confessed to the falsification of the books, while even then a blush of shame stole over his wan cheek.

"But I shan't ask you to forgive me," he gasped laboriously, "I—don't—deserve—it,—Alf."

Instinctively I grasped the pulseless hand. The ashen lips parted in a grateful smile, an icy shiver ran through the dying frame, there was a struggle in the throat—and all was over.

I am older now, and time has softened many of the painful recollections of the past, but those arcane pictures, photographed so long ago upon the very substance of my brain, still offer no suggestion of impermanency, discover no symptoms of obliteration.

Truthfully, indeed, may I say, with the arch-puppet of the mimic world, "There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy."

Thanks to you, dear reader, and good-bye!

ST. GEORGE BEST.

THEOSOPHICAL DON'TS.

THE following suggestions arise from experience and are due to facts in the Theosophical world.

Don't speak or write as if morality and ethics were unknown before H.P.B. wrote the Voice of the Silence. Some of our devoted band have been heard to speak in such a way that hearers thought the speaker meant to convey the idea that only in the Voice or other similar books of ours could be found the high and correct ethics by which one ought to guide his life. Buddhism, Christianity, and all the other religions teach the same morals, and literature is full of it.

Don't say that all the Theosophical doctrines were first given out by the Mahâtmas through their Theosophical chelas. Attributing everything solely to the Mahâtmas is foolish, as it is easily controverted. And do not be forever saying, "We are taught this and are told that". The number of doctrines found mentioned for the first time by the Mahâtmas through H.P.B. are few, extraordinary in conception and scope, and easily recognized.

Don't explain everything by one theory. To wit; do not be so inadequate as to brush off the whole of Spiritualism with one word, "all spooks and shells". You will be wrong if you do so, and the result will be antagonism.

Don't say that science is all wrong and that men of science are materialists. Huxley has done us good service; he has but lately admitted consciousness to be a third factor in the universe, not a part of force and matter; and Spencer has many a good thing in his works. Besides, if you want H.P.B. on the matter, you can read her words that the truth is to be found in a union of science with occultism.

Don't think or say that phenomena are good stepping-stones to Theosophy. They are not, for those who stand upon them will fall from them to their hurt.

Don't run down the spirit of true Christianity, nor imagine that we can get ministers and congregations en masse to change into Theosophists. The true spirit of Christianity, as meant to be taught in the beginning, is doubtless Theosophy, but truth is not aided by running amuck among the faith of a whole people.

Don't say that H.P.B. has been reincarnated unless you know it and are able to prove it. To say you think so is not proof. She may or may not be, and either way the work must go on.

Don't talk as if messages from the Masters are all precipitated on rice paper, the writing incorporated in the paper, and such child's talk, indulged in only by those who do not know. And forget not that precipitation proves only that something was precipitated. It can be done by mediums and by various sorts of occultists.

Don't think or say that the only true occultism is found in the East, or that we must go to the East for it, or that the West has none of it. Remember that the greatest known Adept was a Western woman, a Russian, and that the energy of the lodge of Masters was first expended here in the West in this age. If so, is it not reasonable to suppose that the West has its occultists even though hidden? Recollect also that H. P. B. received in her house in New York before witnesses Western men of occult science who worked wonders there at times. Perhaps it is as has been hinted many a time, that the true thing is to be found in a union of the East and the West. The terms Guru and Chela have been misused so that all too many are looking to India for help, from which they will get but little until the West is itself full of wise students of occultism who know the meaning of being placed by karma in the West. The fact is, again, that in the East the men are looking to the great Russian woman for the very spiritual help that first shed its rays upon the West unmistakably. Again, there is extant a letter from the Mahâtma K. H. to a Western man wherein it said that he should work in his own land and forget not that Karma so demanded.

Don't teach that vegetarianism is the road to heaven and spiritual growth. Was not the great Nazarene right when he intimated that, the kingdom of heaven being within, it did not come from eating or drinking? And has not our old friend H. P. B. written suggestively that cows and elephants are pure vegetarians? Reflect on the fact that some of the very best people on earth were meat-eaters, and that wicked or gross thoughts are more hurtful than the eating of a ton of flesh. In fact, . . .

Don't fail to exercise your common sense on all and every occasion.

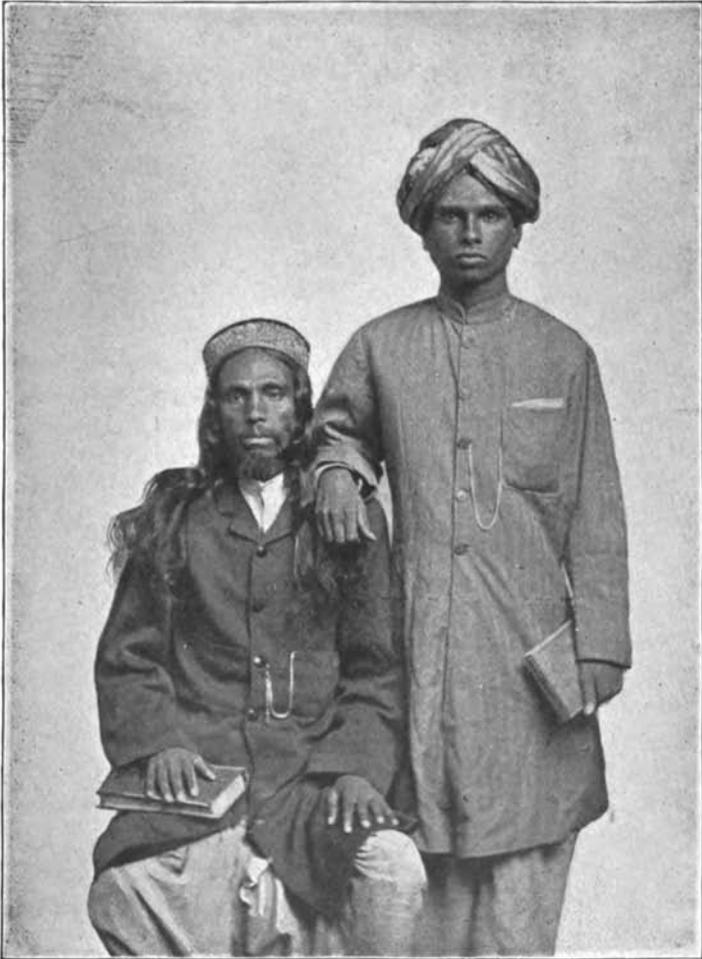

W. Q. J.

FACES OF FRIENDS.

TWO Indian workers are pictured this month who live at Bellary, South India. Rangampalli Jagannathiah is the sitting figure. He was born in May, 1852, at Cuttack near Jaggernath, and hence is called Jagannathiah. His father was a native officer in the 30th Madras Infantry. Young Jagannathiah was enlisted in the regiment as a pension boy on his father's death, when the boy was one year old, serving six years. Education was furnished by his cousin, and since his tenth year he has lived in Cuddapah and Bellary. In 1872 he was matriculated from the Government Provincial College, and afterwards served as teacher in the Provincial and Wardlaw Colleges, and as second head-master in the High School, Secunderabad, Deccan, for eight years. In religion he was a staunch Vishnava of the Visishtadwaita School, but read much in science and philosophy until 1874, when reading Buckle's History of Civilization, Lubbock's Prehistoric Times, and others his faith was shaken, and in 1875 contact with followers of materialism led at last to his joining the National Secular Society of England under Charles Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant. The Free-thought Union of Madras was then joined.

In 1882 he first heard of Theosophy and the T.S. from a friend who was a Vedantin and good Sanskrit scholar. This led, after reading the early numbers of the Theosophist, to a correspondence with Damodar K. Mavalankar, who was at the Adyar Headquarters, and later to a visit there for a discussion of questions. There he met H.P.B., who had in her possession some of his contributions to newspapers. He also worked for awhile on the staff at Adyar. Damodar introduced him to H.P.B., and she discussed Theosophy with him for three days for about three hours a day. He says: "She satisfied me completely. I admired her genius very much, and her fund of knowledge on science, philosophy, and religion. I observed above all that her replies to my questions were complete answers to the main as well as to all possible side questions. On the 30th of December, 1882, she asked me if I had anything more to ask. I said, None, and she directed me to search the old Aryan religion and Upanishads, ending by suggesting that I join the T.S., with which I complied." He then began to write for Theosophy.

A question was raised, "Can a Secularist be a Theosophist?", in the National Reformer of Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant, and Mrs. Besant then wrote strongly against his joining the T.S. He then wrote to Mr. Bradlaugh asking if freethinkers were bound by the dictates of Mrs. Besant, to which Mr. Bradlaugh said No. Mr. Jagannathiah then retired from the Union.

In 1885 he was an Inspector for the T.S. In 1887, with the other subject of this picture, he founded the Sanmarga Samaj on the lines of the T.S., and afterwards declared it a part of the T.S. Old members left, but by persistent work the Society was kept up and an immense amount of work done by both in preaching to the villages in the vernacular. He continued in the government service until July, 1894, when being transferred to another post he resigned, trusting to Nature, so that he might continue the work at Bellary with his friend, because he could not fulfill his promise to H.P.B. to work for the T.S. if he left his center of work. There at Bellary he is now, and while the work done is not one that the general T.S. public knows of, as it is in the vernacular, he and his friend keep up a constant preaching to the people, trying to infuse into them the truths of Theosophy for the betterment of their ideas of their own religions. Among other things done is the keeping up of a school well noticed by the Government.

T. A. Swaminatha Aiyar stands beside Jagannathiah, his friend and co-worker. He was born July, 1868, at Tiruvadi, Tanjore on the banks of the Cauvery. This is one of the strongest of the orthodox Brahman centers in Southern India, noted for its Vedic learning and Sanskrit knowledge. People come there to learn the Vedas, and there are about 800 pupils. All these are fed, clothed, and educated gratuitously. The teacher is a renowned man. There is there also a Free Sanskrit College, where the same sort of work is done under the gifts of the Tanjore Mahârâjâh. The greatest of astrologers and most renowned of poets hail from that small district. Brahmanical ceremonies are rigidly observed in all the houses.

Swaminatha belongs to a Vaidiki, a religious as distinguished from a lay family, renowned for its religious sacrifices and hence called Dikshita. His father is a native doctor and a proficient mantrika, or one who recites mantrams, and an elder brother is known as a singer of the Yajur Veda.

In his eighth year he was sent to an English school, and later to the Government High School until 1881. At 14 he matriculated from the Native High School of Coimbatore, went to St. Peter's College at Tanjore for four months, and through the first in Arts at the State Government Provincial College of Trichinopoly. In 1884, while there, he joined the Sanmarga Sabha of that place. Taught school at Trichinopoly and became a clerk in the Revenue Department at Bellary. A natural leaning to religion and mysticism caused a want of companionship in such thought, and that led to acquaintance with Jagannathiah, with whom the Sanmarga Samaj was begun in 1887. This led to the T.S. naturally. After service in the Survey Office, the Government transferred him to Madras, and then he decided, like his friend, that he must be at Bellary, so he resigned and tried the work of a baker there, but this was not successful. Then work was obtained in a mercantile house until 1893, when the pressure of the T.S. work of the Samaj caused him to give that place up, and he too is now devoted to the work of his heart.

By both all they do is done under stress and strain, which reminds us of the way the work has to be done in America, with little money and few to help. But the unseen, powerful help of the great Initiates of the T.S. is behind this as well as other sincere work for the T.S., and it is to be hoped they will ere long be able to do more without being compelled to pinch and save for the sake of mere existence. Some help has been sent from month to month from American friends who believe in vernacular work in India, since the T.S. as an English movement cannot find the masses there. This has widened out, and may be heard of later as a combined work for India and America helped by the latter, benefitting both in all ways that may flow from the turning up of rare manuscripts of value and by more widely energizing India to help itself.

CONVERSATIONS ON OCCULTISM.

STUDENT.—Is there not some attitude of mind which one should in truth assume in order to understand the occult in Nature?

Sage.—Such attitude of mind must be attained as will enable one to look into the realities of things. The mind must escape from the mere formalities and conventions of life, even though outwardly one seems to obey all of them, and should be firmly established on the truth that Man is a copy of the Universe and has in himself a portion of the Supreme Being. To the extent this is realized will be the clearness of perception of truth. A realization of this leads inevitably to the conclusion that all other men and beings are united with us, and this removes the egotism which is the result of the notion of separateness. When the truth of Unity is understood, then distinctions due to comparisons made like the Pharisee's, that one is better than his neighbor, disappear from the mind, leaving it more pure and free to act.

Student.—What would you point out as a principal foe to the mind's grasping of truth?

Sage.—The principal foe of a secondary nature is what was once called phantasy; that is, the reëpearance of thoughts and images due to recollection or memory. Memory is an important power, but mind in itself is not memory. Mind is restless and wandering in its nature, and must be controlled. Its wandering disposition is necessary or stagnation would result. But it can be controlled and fixed upon an object or idea. Now as we are constantly looking at and hearing of new things, the natural restlessness of the mind becomes prominent when we set about pinning it down. Then memory of many objects, things, subjects, duties, persons, circumstances, and affairs brings up before it the various pictures and thoughts belonging to them. After these the mind at once tries to go, and we find ourselves wandering from the point. It must hence follow that the storing of a multiplicity of useless and surely-recurring thoughts is an obstacle to the acquirement of truth. And this obstacle is the very one peculiar to our present style of life.

Student.—Can you mention some of the relations in which the sun stands to us and nature in respect to Occultism?

Sage.—It has many such, and all important. But I would draw your attention first to the greater and more comprehensive. The sun is the center of our solar system. The life-energies of that system come to it through the sun, which is a focus or reflector for the spot in space where the real center is. And not only comes mere life through that focus, but also much more that is spiritual in its essence. The sun should therefore not only be looked at with the eye but thought of by the mind. It represents to the world what the Higher Self is to the man. It is the soul-center of the world with its six companions, as the Higher Self is the center for the six principles of man. So it supplies to those six principles of the man many spiritual essences and powers. He should for that reason think of it and not confine himself to gazing at it. So far as it acts materially in light, heat, and gravity, it will go on of itself, but man as a free agent must think upon it in order to gain what benefit can come only from his voluntary action in thought.

Student.—Will you refer to some minor one?

Sage.—Well, we sit in the sun for heat and possible chemical effects. But if at the same time that we do this we also think on it as the sun in the sky and of its possible essential nature, we thereby draw from it some of its energy not otherwise touched. This can also be done on a dark day when clouds obscure the sky, and some of the benefit thus be obtained. Natural mystics, learned and ignorant, have discovered this for themselves here and there, and have often adopted the practice. But it depends, as you see, upon the mind.

Student.—Does the mind actually do anything when it takes up a thought and seeks for more light?

Sage.—It actually does. A thread, or a finger, or a long darting current flies out from the brain to seek for knowledge. It goes in all directions and touches all other minds it can reach so as to receive the information if possible. This is telepathically, so to say, accomplished. There are no patents on true knowledge of philosophy nor copyrights in that realm. Personal rights of personal life are fully respected, save by potential black magicians who would take anyone's property. But general truth belongs to all, and when the unseen messenger from one mind arrives and touches the real mind of another, that other gives up to it what it may have of truth about general subjects. So the mind's finger or wire flies until it gets the thought or seed-thought from the other and makes it its own. But our modern competitive system and selfish desire for gain and fame is constantly building a wall around people's minds to everyone's detriment.

Student.—Do you mean that the action you describe is natural, usual, and universal, or only done by those who know how and are conscious of it?

Sage.—It is universal and whether the person is aware or not of what is going on. Very few are able to perceive it in themselves, but that makes no difference. It is done always. When you sit down to earnestly think on a philosophical or ethical matter, for instance, your mind flies off, touching other minds, and from them you get varieties of thought. If you are not well-balanced and psychically purified, you will often get thoughts that are not correct. Such is your Karma and the Karma of the race. But if you are sincere and try to base yourself on right philosophy, your mind will naturally reject wrong notions. You can see in this how it is that systems of thought are made and kept going, even though foolish, incorrect, or pernicious.

Student.—What mental attitude and aspiration are the best safeguards in this, as likely to aid the mind in these searches to reject error and not let it fly into the brain?

Sage.—Unselfishness, Altruism in theory and practice, desire to do the will of the Higher Self which is the “Father in Heaven”, devotion to the human race. Subsidiary to these are discipline, correct thinking, and good education.

Student.—Is the uneducated man, then, in a worse condition?

Sage.—Not necessarily so. The very learned are so immersed in one system that they reject nearly all thoughts not in accord with preconceived notions. The sincere ignorant one is often able to get the truth but not able to express it. The ignorant masses generally hold in their minds the general truths of Nature, but are limited as to expression. And most of the best discoveries of scientific men have been obtained in this sub-conscious telepathic mode. Indeed, they often arrive in the learned brain from some obscure and so-called ignorant person, and then the scientific discoverer makes himself famous because of his power of expression and means for giving it out.

Student.—Does this bear at all upon the work of the Adepts of all good Lodges?

Sage.—It does. They have all the truths that could be desired, but at the same time are able to guard them from the seeking minds of those who are not yet ready to use them properly. But they often find the hour ripe and a scientific man ready, and then touch his cogitating mind with a picture of what he seeks. He then has a “flash” of thought in the line of his deliberations, as many of them have admitted. He gives it out to the world, becomes famous, and the world wiser. This is constantly done by the Adepts, but now and then they give out larger expositions of Nature's truths, as in the case of H.P.B. This is not at first generally accepted, as personal gain and fame are not advanced by any admission of benefit from the writings of another, but as it is done with a purpose, for the use of a succeeding century, it will do its work at the proper time.

Student.—How about the Adepts knowing what is going on in the world of thought, in the West, for instance?

Sage.—They have only to voluntarily and consciously connect their minds with those of the dominant thinkers of the day to at once discover what has been or is being worked out in thought and to review it all. This they constantly do, and as constantly incite to further elaborations or changes by throwing out the suggestion in the mental plane so that seeking and receptive minds may use it.

RIGHT ACTION.

IN defining Philosophy, Professor Ferrier said that "Philosophy is not Truth, but reasoned Truth". And although it may be objected that Truth in its widest aspect must include "reasoned Truth" or Philosophy, yet to a great extent because the West has such imperfect knowledge of the real nature of Mind and of its inner workings, Truth has come to be regarded too much simply as knowledge of facts, of such facts as can be demonstrated scientifically, and of their relations and sequence on this plane only. All else is regarded more or less as speculative and uncertain. It is said that we can really know only what Science can demonstrate; other things may be true, we shall be glad if they are true, but they must first be proved true before we can regard them seriously. And so Philosophy, the "reasoned Truth" which endeavors to get at the how and the why of things, and which in so doing passes into the realm of metaphysics, is regarded, at least in its deeper aspect, as speculative; for although it accepts the facts of Science, it transcends Science and cannot be demonstrated according to modern scientific methods. If we take Religion in its true sense, as that which binds back men to the source of all, and so binds man to man on the inner planes of being, and which must include "right action" and "right living", we may see that Philosophy is the link between Science and Religion, that it completes the one and makes possible the other.

It is not enough to know, we must do more, we must endeavor to know how, and to know why. And although the ultimate how and why may be beyond us, may even transcend our powers of conception, yet it should be our aim to ever approximate to that ultimate. The history of man in all ages shows that he is ever impelled to seek the solution of this problem. Now in one way, now in another, man has sought to learn the wherefore and meaning of existence. The great religions of the world; the philosophies of all times; ancient and modern Science; these with their cosmogonies and theories of creation and emanation, of evolution and development, all are pages in the history of man's inner life, spiritual, moral, and mental; and could we read aright we could trace how at times he has risen till he has stood in the clear light of Truth, how too often he has sunk into the depths of shadow and illusion.

Where do we stand to-day in our seeking after Wisdom? What guide-posts have we to direct our course? Shall we follow the teachings of any one of the World-religions, or shall we take modern philosophy or modern science as a guide? But how can we know which of all these to follow? Surely we are in great perplexity, for before we can intelligently know which is the best guide we ought to study and compare all these teachings; otherwise we may make a great mistake and follow a false guide, when a little patience, a little investigation and study, would have shown us a true one. If we are to live rightly, to act rightly, we must have a right basis and we must think rightly. But it is claimed that even a slight comparative study of the great religions will reveal that their ethics are almost identical, and that if we can go deeper into this study we shall be forced to the conclusion that all had a common origin. So that while it is profitable to pursue such a course of study and if possible to add to it the study of philosophy and modern Science, yet even if this is beyond our power we need not despair nor become indifferent.

For what is it that is really necessary in order that we may act rightly? It may indeed be that to act rightly in an ultimate sense, ultimate knowledge is needed; but for each one to act rightly where he is depends upon his efforts to use the knowledge he now has, and upon his striving to reach his ideal. For each one has an ideal of some sort, perhaps a very high and holy ideal which he cherishes in his heart of hearts, and yet because it is so high he may too often fail to even remember it. A little thought will show that we have different ideals at different times, and that these are constantly changing. This must be so even if our ultimate ideal remains the same. That action is right action for each one which is done as far as possible with reference to one's ideal. By endeavoring to act up to our ideals we test them and make it possible for us to form new and higher ideals. A man's ideal is the unconscious result of his philosophy, and, strange as it may seem, the only way to obtain a true philosophy is not so much by studying as primarily and especially by living and acting, by living and acting up to one's ideal. So let the student ponder over the words of Jesus: "If any man willeth to do his will, he shall know of the teaching;" and let him also meditate on the words of a far earlier teacher, Krishna; "He who is perfected in devotion findeth spiritual knowledge springing up spontaneously in himself in the progress of time."

ON THE SCREEN OF TIME.

AS the student of Nature watches even his small corner of the world-wide Screen of Time, he sees with delight the things of history appear, disperse, and reappear. It was in this mood that I received, on the 12th of August last, a gift which was at once a reminiscence and a prediction.

We have eternal friends, souls of one Ray, our kindred from dawn to dawn. One such sent me two curious family relics, bought from an impoverished woman in one of the oldest towns in France: these relics were the Masonic cross and apron of her grandfather, who had received the cross prior to the French Revolution, the apron just at the close of that stormy time. They bear evidence of his having been a member of that branch of the Rosicrucian Society which was founded by Cagliostro, who suffered imprisonment in consequence of his having founded a secret society.

The detail of these objects evidences the oriental inspiration of the real, the secret—now, as then, secret—Rosicrucian fraternity. The cross, surmounted with a crown, is of green garnets and crystals, set in silver. In its center is a picture, done in black and gold enamel upon a mother-of-pearl ground, of a small cross with a rose heart; in front of the cross a pelican upon a funeral pyre plucks at her breast. Below this, eleven degrees are marked off. The woman said she had been told when a child that these marks signified the Masonic degrees taken by her grandfather, but there is a mystic significance attaching to the number eleven. On the back of the jewel is another picture, done in the same way, of a larger “rosie crosse”, surmounted with the letters INRI. The apron is an oblong of white lamb’s skin, sewn with small round gilt spangles, either in groups of five or singly (like sun symbols), and is trimmed with gold lace now tarnished. At the top, over skulls and crossed-bones, are the letters S. H. O. (Société Hermetique Orientale). In the center a rough double triangle is formed by square and compass; in the middle of this a flamboyant six-pointed star has the letter C or G as its seventh point. The one letter would stand for Cagliostro, the other for St. Germain. Upon a bridge in the lower foreground are the letters L.D.P., historically attributed to Cagliostro; each letter is stopped by a triangle made in dots. The bridge crosses from the west to the east, and Cagliostro, agent of the Universal Lodge, was the bridge or path—sometimes called “the Door” in mysticism—between the eastern and western branches of that Lodge which is ever one. The bridge has four buttresses and three arches (“four bases and three aspects”); it spans a ravine in which are strewn the mutilated remains of human beings among X crosses of black magic made by cross-bones. Above the bridge, a tree of life has seven branches, one double (an eighth sphere attached?). The path leads from a locked and barred castle, black in color and surmounted or overshadowed by nine hierarchies of flames, on the left or west, to the right, where a flamboyant sun of orange and red proclaims the East. This sun rises at the side of a grotto bearing a rude resemblance to the human back brain. At a central and upper point projects a curious green growth, like a stem or a gland; below it on one side stands the mystic soma cup, on the other side is a moon-shaped crucible. A small sword has been thrown down in front of the grotto, and the same symbol reappears, much larger, over the grotto, grasped in a hand whose huge arm is red; the handle of this sword is red and orange, the blade is green. One symbol shows that the wearer or traveller, having gone from the negative (black) to the positive world, is now an active participant grasping and using both the subjective and objective will. My learned friend, Mr. James M. Pryse, tells me that the apron has Masonic, magnetic, and Rosicrucian keys.

In the November number of the Pall Mall Magazine is an article upon the Rosicrucians. It is headed by a picture which will have a peculiar interest for some students. By what action of that force which we call “chance” has this apparently irrelevant article been injected into these up-to-date pages? At a period in last century corresponding to our present date (almost) the writer of this article states the Rosicrucians to have disappeared. Is not this one of those floating straws which show the motion of the stream beneath—apparently so glassy and inert? The real Rosicrucian Society began before the date given and continues to this day, but the stream subsides into its underground channels when the century’s effort is over, and the members of the hidden force—who have not been known as such, or at all, save to a very few workers on the objective plane—work after another fashion until the last half of another century brings the moment when their chiefly-unseen but always-vigilant aid must again be given to the leaders and members of the new open movement. Some know that H. P. B. had there her most powerful helpers and supporters. Her Rosicrucian jewel (shaped like the pelican in the small center of mine, but of silver) will occur to the mind.

A friend of H. P. B. tells me that she said that at the close of the present cycle the Lodge would temporarily cease to work among men in the present direct fashion, except through the channel of the T. S., should that body then be in forceful existence. As a glacier pushes its way and leaves each year a landmark planted further in the fields of its choice, so the Lodge forces will not withdraw from any real, fixed station won for its manifestation by our effort. Hours of struggle are upon us, and it may cheer us to go over certain known things. It is always helpful to pass the countersign. And H. P. B. said further that we should be in bad case next century if we failed now.

As in universal action force flows from hierarchy to hierarchy, from world to world, from cell-unit to cell-unit by established channels only, so the guardians of the Secret Wisdom, followers of Nature's laws, have everywhere their posts. Not alone in the East. It is not only Eastern Occultism, but Eastern and Western, two objective poles of one spiritual hierarchy, with a great teacher, twin-brothers in work and duty, in each division, with spiritual chiefs "above", and follows and helpers of all degrees in succession. "The Lodge is everywhere." Such Teachers take bodies of Eastern or Western heredity for their temporary habitations; the force generated through these bodies or physical bases for projection upon the physical plane must be magnetically and psychically homogeneous to the ray or sphere of the work. After the dawn of the Christian era, the Western mind, slowly involving the World-Manas, was more readily to be reached by the symbols adopted from antiquity by the early Christians, for these symbols were crystallized in their etheric environment and were those which had most life there at that time. Hence the rosic cross which had a sweet and secret heart, and was the same abode of the same spirit as the lotus-petalled heart of the East.

The visible agents of the last century worked under both directors, as I gather, but each one had someone superior to whom he immediately looked, and one brother inferior in knowledge who was his immediate assistant. Any member of the Lodge in any degree may have a number of "twin-souls" in all degrees, but one link of a chain must be objectively and relatively nearer to two others than to all. St. Germain, Cagliostro, Mesmer: one Adept and two Chelas. H. P. B. and her original trimurti completed by H. S. Olcott and William Q. Judge. Then, as now, there were other ardent workers, but as we look down the lines of the centuries here and there the mystic triad of pioneers reappears.

The human mind has a tendency to exalt what is distant. Prophets are naught in their own country, and cities are least known to their inhabitants. The young in occultism are sometimes drawn eastward by this trait, which has its root in the attraction of contraries. The tendency is toward forgetfulness of this linked succession, and that our soul chose for its next step the environment where we now are. Prophets may have a mission to other lands, but the dweller in cities may find rich rewards close to his hand. The Eastern race had earlier fruitage, and the coronal flowers of her achievement are those perfect souls who are as the pole-star to heaven-aspiring minds. Such men are not confined to bodies of that nation in which they first attained, but take such houses in such lands as the great work of human service may demand. To-day the West is the hope of the future race as of the present. To-day the elder brothers of men look to that West for objective aid as for racial evolutionary development. Individual men may still pass on to perfection everywhere, but the evolutionary forces tend westward now and must thence react back upon the East.

H. P. B., true to her mission of breaking up old moulds of mind, fixed modes of thought, attacked all forms from which the spirit had fled. The nascent Manas of the new race must not be smothered in the musty cradle of old forms. The husks of all creeds were in turn by her assailed. Readers of the early numbers of the Theosophist will find her dealing with the materialized dogmatic forms of the East just as she dealt with those of the West. She encountered the hostility of eminent Brahmins and prominent Christians then as now. This must inevitably occur when the spiritual pride of a race or the "modern spirit" of a nation is touched by a mordant such as hers. Intellectuality oftentimes outruns spiritual (universal) intuition. The saddest shadows which hurry across our Screen are those of some Western occultists who went eastward, of some Eastern Chelas who came westward— to fail.

It ought to be more generally understood that H. P. B. not only disclaimed infallibility, but also deliberately put herself on record as having both made mistakes and "done wrong" as we would say. Her large nature was reckless of self. And yet some clues were left which we may follow. She wrote to Mr. Judge: "When I am dead and gone you will know that I never, never deceived any one, but that I was often forced to let others deceive themselves". It is told that she said to another and a less experienced friend: "Would you believe that I had done wrong if you were to see it in my own writing?" We can imagine the friend's loving answer. Ah! may it go well with both the living and the "dead" friend's memory in the hour of test.

But those two cries of hers show her heart craving for a faith and trust that should outlast her bodily life, outlive her generous self judgment; something of heart-knowledge; had she not won it fairly? Soul-recognition, had she not revived our memory of soul? She longed for that intuitive understanding which scorns material proof or disproof of subjective realities. The touchstone of soul is soul.

It is not yet too late, if, as I believe, she lives, consciously lives and works on. Whelps of the old Lion of the Punjab, which of you will cry to her: Had'st thou writ thy fault up large upon the halls of the universe, thou had'st not so deceived me — never.

"It is possible to have a splendid loyalty and yet be wise."

LITERARY NOTES.

THE IRISH THEOSOPHIST announces a series of letters on current topics by Jasper Niemand, to begin with the November number.

LETTERS OF H. P. B. which begin in this number are of absorbing interest. They have all been secured for the PATH, and the publication of them will continue until every one is out; then it is hoped to reprint in book form. All rights are reserved.

THE PACIFIC THEOSOPHIST for November contains two important articles, — one by Dr. Jerome A. Anderson explaining the disastrous effect of alcohol upon the human system in the light of Theosophy, and one by Dr. Allen Griffiths detailing very fully the processes in the admirable "Training Classes" which are doing such excellent work on the Pacific Coast.—[A. F.]

LIGHT OF THE EAST for September has an article on "Idolatry", explaining and defending Hindû practice. It is able and plausible, and has a certain amount of truth, notably on the first two pages, but the test of any system is not in abstract arguments but in patent results, and certainly these do not verify idol-worship and multiplied forms as means of grace. A tenderness for Spiritualism appears through this issue, and all the old malignity towards the T. S., — facts possibly connected.—[A. F.]

THE BOOK OF THE DEAD, reviewed elsewhere in this number of the PATH, may be had from Mr. Harry Steele Budd, agent of the publishers for the entire Theosophical Society. Until December 31st the price of the work will be $5.00 plus postage or express charges, since the book is very large and heavy. After that time the price will be raised to $7.50. Subscriptions from abroad will be received at 25 shillings. All orders from members of the T. S. should be sent to Harry Steele Budd, 144 Madison avenue, New York City.

ROSY MITE, OR THE WITCH'S SPELL, by Madame Vera Petrovna Jelihovskiy, Madame Blavatsky's sister, is a charming little fairy-story. A little girl whose heart is filled with love and kindness to all animals is changed by a witch to a size of an inch or so, and during her enforced life among insects and rodents reaps the reward of her previous beneficence. Three great acts of generous self-sacrifice restore her to her size and kinsfolk. The moral is clear, but is never obtruded, and the book is good for children because so healthy and so pleasingly suggestive. (For sale by the PATH.)—[A.F.]

AESCH MEZAREPH, or Purifying Fire, a Chymico-Kabalistic Treatise, is Vol. IV of the Collectanea Hermetica edited by Dr. W. Wynn Westcott, and has a preface by Sapere Aude. We are told that they who will to become wise should live in the South, that the crackling of tin shadows forth severity and judicial rigor, the name of the Bloody Animal Dob who is both "volatile" and biting, and other singular facts which no one would be likely to know without reading this book. It may be ordered through the PATH for $1.00, and its 60 pages furnish as many mysteries as that sum could probably purchase in any land on earth.—[A.F.]

CHEIRO'S Language of the Hand is a finely gotten up book on palmistry or cheiromancy. There are thirty-three full-page illustrations and two hundred engravings of lines, mounts, and marks of the hand, also drawings of Doré's seven types. Some of the pictures are full-sized camphor-smoke prints of hands of living persons, such as Madame Bernhardt, Colonel Ingersoll, Mark Twain, and others. Cheiro, the author, is practising hand-reading in New York, and was kind enough to read my palm. The text is divided into three parts: I, Description of hands and other matters; II, Rules for Reading; III, Illustrative types. Cheiro says he spent some time in India and there studied the art. In the introductory chapter he describes a very curious book on hands made on human skin and now in India. Cheiro's skill has been often tested in Europe and America, and this book is a valuable contribution to a more or less lost art. But of course no author can ever give to his readers the psychic faculty that is needed for a right reading by those who cannot master and remember intricate rules and numerous exceptions. With the aid of this book a good insight can be gained into what is now known of palmistry. The binding is black boards with large white lettering; 162 pages exclusive of large plates. (Price, $2.00. Orderable from PATH.)

OCTOBER THEOSOPHIST begins the sixteenth volume, and also the second, the "Oriental", Series of "Old Diary Leaves". Chapter 1 opens with very just remarks as to H.P.B.'s being a greater puzzle to one who knew her in so many phases as did Col. Olcott than to those who saw her only as an Adept or as a medium for the Teachers, and describes the dreary, storm-tossed voyages to London and thence to Bombay. In London three of the party met a Master in the street, and afterwards learned that he had called upon H.P.B. and there been met by their informant. The next evening H.P.B. explained something of her dual personality, her hair and eyebrows became black, and one hand changed to the shape and color of a male Hindû's. The next day her hair was still dark, but she restored its color by passing her hand several times over it. In words from the heart the Colonel describes his emotions on first touching Indian soil, and his continued love for the people. "Black Magic in Russia" tells of strange possession and sorcery there. The President Founder gives the reasons for selecting and preserving Adyar as the Headquarters, and announces the resignation of Mr. Walter R. Old as Treasurer and Recording Secretary because unable to accept the official statement of the inquiry before the Judicial Committee in London. He will, however, still continue to work privately in England, conscience only exacting a surrender of office in an unhealthy climate like Madras. The Theosophist's reviews preserve their modest proportions, Mrs. Besant's "Outline of the Soul" receiving three lines and August PATH four. Siftings has four and one-half.—[A.F.]

OCTOBER LUCIFER, the second issue since H.P.B.'s title-piece and motto were discarded, has a cordial notice of Prof. Huxley's "Essays", ending with a witty biography. "Tibetan Teachings" gives a very clear exposition of the doctrine of "spirits" by an advanced disciple. "The Forgiveness of Sins", H. Ernest Nichol, is no mere Theological treatise, but a warm exposition of how Theosophy interprets pardon and of the place Love holds in it. The solution of the three questions in "A Forgotten Story" is beautiful and ingenious, sadly as the story ends. Mr. Mead's review of Max Müller's Lectures on the Vedanta Philosophy points out most discriminatingly their strong and their weak points, and especially brings into view their concession to Karma and Reincarnation. Mr. Mead, in his turn, might perhaps concede some "rubbish" in the Indian Scriptures, and perhaps he will after he has studied as long as Max Müller. Moderation, that keynote to the system of the blessed Confucius, sometimes comes with years and with observation of the dangers from over-devotion to things Eastern. "Divine Love the Life of the World" is a master-piece of nonsense, an unsurpassed jumble of phrases without meaning, marvellously like "She went into the garden to cut a cabbage to make an apple-pie, etc., etc." The fifth sentence on page 141 might well be added to the examination scene in Verdant Green. To every reader's great regret "The Veil of Mâyâ" ends, ends sadly though beautifully, and every one must plead for another story from "I.P.H." Lucifer now leaves the rest, of the page blank wherever an article happens to terminate, and Éliphas Lévi concludes his profound studies on the number six.—[A. F.]

THE EGYPTIAN BOOK OF THE DEAD, by Dr. Chas. H. S. Davis, is a large folio volume of 186 pages and 99 full-page plates. It is from the Knickerbocker Press of G. P. Putnam's Sons, this city; is well printed, and substantially bound in dark-green cloth, with a side stamp in hieroglyphic characters giving the Egyptian title of the work. The first chapter describes the gods of the Egyptian pantheon, showing their attributes as symbolized in the Egyptian religion. There are 27 illustrations of the chief gods and goddesses. Their names are given in the original tongue and analysed, showing in their meanings the concepts back of the names. The second chapter, on the "Mythology and Religion of the Ancient Egyptians", is the result of much careful study on the part of Dr. Davis. He begins with these pregnant words from the prophecy of Hermes Trismegistus: "Oh, Egypt! Egypt! Of thy religion fables only will remain, which thy disciples will understand as little as they do thy religion. Words cut into stone will alone remain telling of thy pious deeds. The Scythians, or the dwellers by the Indus, or some other barbarian will inhabit thy fair land." And this prophecy has been amply fulfilled, for the modern Egyptologist knows, as a rule, nothing of the esoteric and true meaning of the texts and figures he studies. (Why cannot some of the students in the T.S. apply to the interpretation of the Book of the Dead the keys given by H.P.B. in the Secret Doctrine?) Explaining, and in part lifting, the veil of symbolism which was the exoteric teaching, the translator shows clearly the belief of the Egyptians in the One Life, or the Nameless One, quoting hymn after hymn in proof and culminating with a passage from the Ritual which Lepsius translates, "Ich bin Tum, ein Wesen das ich eines bin", and calling attention to the similarly constructed sentence, "I and my Father are One". The beauty and majesty of some of these hymns are hardly to be equalled in the literature of the world. In this chapter, also, we find the ancient doctrine of the Septenary Constitution of Man very explicitly set forth, and further on (p. 47) the power of Adepts to project a Mâyavi-rûpa is hinted at. The next chapter is a critical introduction to the Book of the Dead. The author describes the different MSS. of the work; the mode of translating; the different modern editions; compares it with the sacred books of the other great world-religions; and then gives a scholarly resumé of the 165 chapters composing it. The writer makes the claim (p. 53, note) that "the oldest existing Sanskrit manuscripts were written only a few centuries ago, while some of our Egyptian papyri are not less than 4000 years old". The next section is a translation of the Ritual itself. It is based on Pierret's Livre des Morts. This French work was a careful rendering of the Turin papyrus, and was as exact and trustworthy as the state of the science of Egyptology admitted. No translation, unless by an advanced student of occult symbolism, can ever be quite satisfactory. The most that exoteric scholars can do is to give as literal as possible a rendering of the original; this may then be studied by Theosophists, who can interpret the symbols according to their knowledge. An example may be taken from line 4, chapter I. The translator reads, "I am the eternal! the son of the eternal," etc. The word translated "eternal" in the original is TAT. To the average reader the rendering "eternal" would be more satisfactory, but the Theosophist would best know what is really meant by Tat. Following the translation are the 20 plates in fac-simile of the hieratic papyrus of the Louvre, and the 79 plates of the hieroglyphic papyrus of Turin, all of them admirably reproduced. We would call the attention of students to the vignette in the upper left-hand corner of Plate LVI and the accompanying description on p. 146. Messrs. Putnam's Sons and also the translator merit unlimited thanks for having placed this valuable work in the hands of students at a price not prohibitory.—[H.S. B.]

MIRROR OF THE MOVEMENT.

AMERICA.

VEDANTA T.S., Omaha, Neb., has secured a room in the New York Life Building to be used hereafter as a headquarters.

MR. JOHN M. PRYSE lectured on November 2d at White Lotus Center, 328 East Houston street, New York, upon The Theosophy of the Children of the Sun.

MERIDEN T.S., Meriden, Conn., was chartered on November 17th with nine charter-members, and ranks ninety-ninth on the American roll. It is part of the fruits of the work of Mr. Burcham Harding.

ARYAN T.S. had Sunday lectures in November: Materialism, Alexander Fullerton; The History of a World, Jos. H. Fussell; "In the Beginning", Miss K. Hillard; Scientific Religion, Dr. E. B. Guild.

"H. P. B." T. S. had Sunday evening lectures in November: Occult Brotherhoods of the Past, C. F. Wright; Infidelity, Alex. Fullerton; The Birth of a World, Jos. H. Fussell; Theosophic Light on Mundane Paths, Jas. H. Connelly.

BRISTOL T.S., Bristol, Conn., was chartered on November 17th with seven charter-members. It, like the Meriden Branch, is due to the earnest labor of Mr. Harding, and it has the distinction of being the one hundredth Branch on our roll.

BURCHAM HARDING has been busily engaged in forming centers in the state of Connecticut. Lectures were given at Bristol, and a new impetus given to the work. Lectures at Waterbury, Middletown, and Southington resulted in centers being formed at each place. On November 4th a visit was made to Hartford, and assistance given in the class. On the 11th an address on Reincarnation was given before the Ethical Culture Society at Dorchester, and the same subject was dealt with at the Boston Headquarters in the evening. The classes working at Lynn, Lowell, and Cambridge were visited and found to be doing good work. On the 18th lectures were delivered before the Cambridge and Boston Branches upon the Evolution of the Mind.

THE GENERAL SECRETARY went to Washington, D C., on November 7th and lectured on Theosophy and Human Life at the Metzertott Hall. On the 8th he went to Baltimore and spoke to a full meeting of members and friends at the rooms of the Hermes Council T.S., thence returning to New York. On the 12th he went to Buffalo, and lectured at night in the large parlors of the Genesee Hotel to about 150 persons on Theosophy. On the 13th he held a reception at the same place from three to five o'clock, and in the evening addressed a meeting of the Branch on general Theosophical topics. On the 14th he went to Syracuse and lectured at the Branch-rooms on Theosophy, what it is and what it is not, having previously in the afternoon held a meeting of members from three to four. On the 15th he lectured to the public on Reincarnation and Karma, returning to New York that night.

KARMA LODGE, Edgewood Park, Allegheny Co., Pa., is a new department of work begun by the Pittsburg Branch. Five members of the Branch have taken a house in the suburbs and are now living there. They call it "Karma Lodge", and the object is to endeavor to make it a center for Theosophical work and propoganda, though in no sense apart from the Branch. It is really an aid to that by infusing new strength into it. The house is managed on a coöperative basis, each member being required to do his or her share of household duty and to contribute to expenses. When the parlor and dining-room are thrown into one, a good-sized meeting can be held. Each Friday evening a meeting of Branch members has place there, Theosophical questions are asked and discussed, special attention being given to the subject for the following Branch meeting. Plans for the improvement of Branch work are also presented. Karma Lodge will gladly entertain lecturers on Theosophy, and also visitors from other Branches when practicable.

CLAUDE FALLS WRIGHT returned to New York from Boston on Oct. 27th. Oct. 30th he spoke at the regular Bryan meeting, and on Sunday, Nov. 4th, he lectured at Harlem on Occult Brotherhoods of the Past. He then started out on his winter tour. He left for Pittsburg, Pa., on the 6th. On Tuesday he addressed a meeting of the Society at its rooms on The Mission of the T.S. On Thursday another meeting was held there. On Friday he addressed a meeting of the Society at Karma Lodge. Sunday, the 11th, he spoke at Lafayette Hall on Reincarnation, and on Tuesday in the same hall on Occultism. On Wednesday, 14th, he lectured at Carnegie Hall in Allegheny to a full audience on H.P.B. Thursday, the 15th, he addressed a business meeting of the Pittsburg Society at its rooms, and on Friday evening another meeting at Karma Lodge. On Saturday evening he left for Sandusky, Ohio. On Sunday evening he addressed a meeting at Mrs. Davis's on Theosophy, and on Monday, the 19th, he lectured on Reincarnation in Mahala Hall. Mr. Wright now tours west through Ohio, Michigan, and Missouri to Denver, Col.

PACIFIC COAST.

KESHAVA T.S., Riverside, Calif., has rented for Sunday use a room in the Odd Fellows' Building, seating about one hundred. Since the formation of the Branch there appears to have been a decided growth of liberal sentiment in the town.

PACIFIC T.S., Watsonville, Calif., one of the Branches formed by Dr. Allen Griffiths, Pacific Coast Lecturer, was chartered on November 5th with seven charter-members, it ranking ninety-eighth on the American roll. Mr. Humphrey Hetherington is President, and Mr. Wm. H. P. Hill is Secretary.

KSHANTI T.S., Victoria, B.C., has acquired a good hall, capable of accommodating over one hundred persons, with a public lecture every Sunday evening. One lecture, Theosophy and Christianity, was a reply to an attack by a local minister, and was published in full by one of the daily papers. The new headquarters are in a central part of Victoria, and will undoubtedly greatly help Branch work. It is largely through the visit of the Rev. Mr. Copeland in August that this new step has been taken.

FOREIGN.

CEYLON.

AT THE CINNAMON GARDENS in Columbo a school is being conducted by Mrs. M. M. Higgins for the benefit of Singhalese girls, who are mostly Buddhists. There are twenty-one boarders and almost the same number of day scholars. The temporary building was erected last January on land devoted by Mr. Peter d'Abrew. The building is made of mud and poles, roofed with palm leaves, and yet is very comfortable, but cannot last many years. Besides, it will soon be filled. A society called the Ceylon Educational League has been formed to aid the work of this school, and the school has been called by them the Musæus Girls' Orphanage School, Musæus being the maiden name of Mrs. Higgins. The League desires to secure funds for a permanent building on the land, and to interest people so as to found yearly scholarships for orphan girls and similar schools in other localities in the island. A large number of the pupils are now orphans or destitute. The pupils are taught common and higher English Branches, ancient and modern languages, music, drawing, some of the useful arts of needlework, cookery, and gardening. So far the deficiencies in the accounts of the school have been met by Mr. d'Abrew, but his means are limited and the League desires to appeal to fellow Theosophists and friends of humanity for aid. Neither Mrs. Higgins nor the other American workers who have been with her two years receive any salary. It is thought that £10 would furnish food, clothing, instruction, books for a girl for one year, and it is earnestly hoped that friends of women's education in America will respond to the appeal. The working committee of the League has ten ladies and gentlemen. Subscriptions can be sent either direct to the President, Mrs. M. M. Higgins, 6 Brownrigg street, Cinnamon Gardens, Colombo, Ceylon, or to the General Secretary of the American Section. In the latter case the letter accompanying the remittance should specifically state the object of the remittance, and all such will be promptly forwarded to Ceylon.

HAWAII.

HONOLULU maintains a steady interest in Theosophy. Members are growing more enthusiastic, and two public meetings each week continue to be well attended. One of these is devoted to half-hour addresses followed by questions from the audience, the other to lectures only. During October the following subjects were presented: The Seven Principles; What follows after Death; Karma and Reincarnation; The Hindû Bible; The Astral Light; Theosophy and Morals; Nature of the Soul; Occultism; The Higher Self. The study class continues to meet Wednesday evenings. Mrs. T. R. Foster has begun work among the children, opening a Lotus Circle on Sunday morning, October 7th, with nine pupils. She is assisted in this work by her brother, Mr. M. P. Robinson. Meetings are held at the T.S. Headquarters, to whose furnishing Mrs. Foster has added a parlor organ for the benefit of the children. Another recent addition to these rooms is a crayon portrait of H.P.B. presented by Mrs. von Haaslocker, formerly of Honolulu.

ENGLAND.

Propaganda with teachers. It is proposed to send leaflets and circulars to members of the Teachers' Guild of Great Britain and Ireland, which includes numbers of thoughtful men and women. It has 5000 members.

Mr. Mead, the General Secretary, made a tour in November of the Northern Lodges which have come into a Federation for work.

Federation of South England Lodges is being mooted on lines similar to those of the North Country. However, for the present it will be done probably by mail, as Lodges in the South are far apart.

H.P.B. Home will have to be closed for want of active support in work and funds. H.P.B. often said she would like to see such a home sustained, and it is a pity that it will have to be given up.

Countess Wachtmeister has been in London for a time en route to Switzerland. Some of the Dublin members met her at Queenstown. She lectured at Dublin, Southport, Liverpool, and Brighton just before leaving England. In each case she had a packed audience.

Blavatsky Lodge, London, meetings have been well attended. A special feature of the syllabus has been lectures by members of country Lodges. For instance, W. A. Bulmer, editor of the Northern Theosophist, gave a lecture on Pilate's question, What is Truth?, and on November 22d Oliver Firth of Bradford was the lecturer.

ALICE CLEATHER.

AUSTRALASIA.

AUCKLAND, New Zealand (October 3d). During the past month the following papers have been read and lectures given in connection with the local Theosophical Lodge: on September 7th Mrs. Draffin read a paper upon Our Relations to the Masters; on September 14th Mr. W. C. Sanders read a paper upon The Two Paths; on Sunday evening, September 16th, Mrs. Draffin lectured upon Immortality of the Spirit; on September 21st Mrs. Draffin, in the absence of Mr. S. Stewart (sick), read a paper upon The Meaning and Use of Pain; on September 28th Mrs. S. E. Hughes read a paper upon Karma, the Rule of Life; on September 30th, Sunday evening, Mr. Draffin replied to various criticisms upon the Theosophical Society and Theosophy.

MRS. ANNIE BESANT and her daughter were welcomed to Sydney by Branch members, and then amply interviewed by reporters at the Society's rooms. For nearly a fortnight there was then a whirl of activity, there being lectures every night in the Opera House to crowded audiences, and streams of people coming and going daily to the rooms where Mrs. Besant held public interviews from 11 to 2 for the first week, the second being taken up with private talks to members and others. There were crowded Branch meetings on each Sunday when she lectured on Yoga and The States after Death. People unable to enter sat on the stairs and listened through the open window and door. She sailed for New Zealand on her birthday, October 1st. An increased sale of literature is one result of her visit, and another is the increased attendance at lectures, the last being by Mr. Willans on Karma.

NOTICES.

THE AMERICAN ASIATIC AND SANSKRIT REVIVAL SOCIETY

Has for its objects: Historical and scientific research into the ancient literature of India and other Asiatic countries; the collection, preservation, and translation of ancient and modern palm-leaf and other manuscripts to be found in India and other Asiatic countries; maintaining a library for the preservation of the same when collected and for the uses of the Society; taking such measures as may be necessary to promote the revival of Sanskrit learning in India, by employing pandits as translators or teachers; and otherwise, in all ways directly in the line of Asiatic research and Sanskrit revival, to take such steps toward those ends as are proper. Board of Trustees: Clement A. Griscom Jr., E. Aug. Neresheimer, Donald Nicholson, A. H. Spencer, Alexander Fullerton, Elliott B. Page, William Q. Judge. President, William Q. Judge; Secretary, Elliott B. Page.

It was organized November 17, 1894, at 144 Madison Avenue, and is incorporated under the laws of New York. It already has thirty-three Indian manuscripts. The work begun by the Nigamagama Dharma Sabha, heretofore noticed in these pages, will be carried on by the A. A. & S. R. S. It is meant for the general public rather than for F. T. S., who should not curtail contributions to the T. S. in order to aid this

SUBSCRIPTION TO ORIENTAL DEPARTMENT PAPERS.

Upon motion of Dr. J. D. Buck, member of the Executive Committee, American Section T. S., the Committee have unanimously adopted a Resolution instructing the General Secretary to furnish hereafter one copy of each O. D. Paper free to each Branch in good standing, and one copy to every person subscribing thereto at the rate of fifty cents per year. The future arrangement will diminish the heavy expense of these Papers, and will avoid the great waste involved in issue to those persons who do not desire them. It will go into effect January 1st, 1895. All persons desiring to receive these Papers are requested to remit fifty cents to the General Secretary as subscription for the six numbers to appear in 1895, being particular to give full name and address. Single copies will be on sale for ten cents.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE, General Secretary,

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

The General Secretary very gratefully acknowledges the following donations between Oct. 1st and Nov. 20th, 1894: to General Fund $821.65, to Lectureship Fund $548.00. As the expenditures are not footed up till the end of each month, it is not practicable to now state the precise surplus in each fund, but it is undoubtedly enough to relieve from present anxiety. Yet of course current outlays can only be met through the continued benefactions of members, and for this the scheme of Mr. Harter is specially recommended.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE, General Secretary.

CANCELLED STAMPS can be used in Sweden in T. S. work. Any one wishing to donate such stamps or old stamped envelopes, postal cards, or the like, may send them directly to Herr Tonnes Algren, F. T. S., Linnegatan No. 25, Stockholm, Sweden, or to Gabriel Magnusson, 162 West 72d street, New York. A good many have been sent from the previous notice given, and their sale enabled some work to be done.

When I went away it was toward the sunset I sped, and from there I shall come again.

II.<sup>2</sup>

THE newspapers gave accounts of certain of these phenomena and described the appearance of astral visitors, amongst others a Hindû. In sending the extracts H. P. B. comments:

“I see this Hindû every day, just as I might see any other living person, with the only difference that he looks to me more ethereal and more transparent. Formerly I kept silent about these appearances, thinking that they were hallucinations. But now they have become visible to other people as well. He (the Hindû) appears and advises us as to our conduct and our writing. He evidently knows everything that is going on, even to the thoughts of other people, and makes me express his knowledge. Sometimes it seems to me that he overshadows the whole of me, simply entering me like a kind of volatile essence penetrating all my pores and dissolving in me. Then we two are able to speak to other people, and then I begin to understand and remember sciences and languages—everything he instructs me in, even when he is not with me any more.”

<sup>2</sup> Begun in December PATH.

Directly Isis Unveiled was published, H. P. B. wrote to Madame Jelihovsky :

“It seems strange to you that some Hindû Sahib is so free and easy in his dealings with me. I can quite understand you: a person not used to that kind of phenomenon—which, though not quite unprecedented, is yet perfectly ignored—is sure to be incredulous. For the very simple reason that such a person is not in the habit of going deeply into such matters. For instance, you ask whether he is likely to indulge in wanderings inside other people as well as me. I am sure I don't know; but here is something about which I am perfectly certain: Admit that man's soul—his real living soul—is a thing perfectly separate from the rest of the organism; that this perisprit is not stuck with paste to the physical ‘innerds’; and that this soul which exists in everything living, beginning with an infusoria and ending with an elephant, is different from its physical double only inasmuch as being more or less overshadowed by the immortal spirit it is capable of acting freely and independently. In the case of the uninitiated profane, it acts during their sleep: in the case of an initiated adept, it acts at any moment he chooses according to his will. Just try and assimilate this, and then many things will become clear to you. This fact was believed in and known in far distant epochs. St. Paul, who alone among all the apostles was an initiated Adept in the Greek Mysteries, clearly alludes to it when narrating how he was ‘caught up to the third heaven, whether in the body or out of the body I cannot tell: God knoweth’. Also Rhoda says about Peter, ‘It is not Peter but his angel’—that is to say, his double or his soul. And in the Acts of the Apostles, ch. viii, v. 39, when the spirit of God lifted up Philip and transported him, it was not his body that was transported, not his coarse flesh, but his Ego, his spirit and his soul. Read Apuleius, Plutarch, Jamblichus, and other learned men—they all allude to this kind of phenomenon, though the oaths they had to take at the time of their initiation did not allow them to speak openly. What mediums accomplish unconsciously, under the influence of outside powers which take possession of them, can be accomplished by Adepts consciously at their own volition. That's all. . . . As to the Sahib, I have known him a long time. Twenty-five years ago he came to London with the Prince of Nepaul; three years ago he sent me a letter by an Indian who came here to lecture about Buddhism. In this letter he reminded me of many things, foretold by him at the time, and asked me whether I believed him now and whether I would consent to obey him, to avoid complete destruction. After this he appeared repeatedly, not only to me but also to other people, and to Olcott whom he ordered to be President of the Society, teaching him how to start it. I always recognize and know the Master, and often talk to him without seeing him. How is it that he hears me from everywhere, and that I also hear his voice across seas and oceans twenty times a day? I do not know, but it is so. Whether it is he personally that enters me I really cannot say with confidence: if it is not he, it is his power, his influence. Through him alone I am strong; without him I am a mere nothing."

There was naturally considerable fear in the minds of H. P. B.'s nearest relatives as to the character of this mysterious Hindû teacher. They could not help regarding him as more of a "heathen sorcerer" than anything else. And this view H. P. B. took pains to combat. She told them that her Master had a deep respect for the spirit of Christ's teachings. She had once spent seven weeks in a forest not far from the Karakoram mountains, where she had been isolated from the world, and where her teacher alone had visited her daily, whether astrally or otherwise she did not state. But whilst there she had been shown in a cave-temple a series of statues representing the great teachers of the world, amongst others:

"A huge statue of Jesus Christ, represented at the moment of pardoning Mary Magdalene; Gautama Buddha offers water in the palm of his hand to a beggar, and Ananda is shown drinking out of the hands of a Pariah prostitute."

H. P. B. wrote to Madame Jelihovsky (date unknown) that she was learning to get out of her body, and offering to pay her a visit in Tiflis "in the flash of an eye". This both frightened and amused Madame Jelihovsky, who replied that she would not trouble her so unnecessarily. H. P. B. answered:

"What is there to be afraid of? As if you had never heard about apparitions of doubles. I, that is to say, my body, will be quietly asleep in my bed, and it would not even matter if it were to await my return in a waking condition—it would be in the state of a harmless idiot. And no wonder: God's light would be absent from it, flying to you; and then it would fly back and once more the temple would get illuminated by the presence of the Deity. But this, needless to say, only in case the thread between the two were not broken. If you shriek like mad it may get torn; then Amen to my existence: I should die instantly. . . .

I have written to you that one day we had a visit from the double of Professor Moses. Seven people saw him. As to the Master, he is quite commonly seen by perfect strangers. Sometimes he looks just as if he were a living man, as merry as possible. He is continually chaffing me, and I am perfectly used to him now. He will soon take us all to India, and there we shall see him in his body just like an ordinary person."

From New York:

"Well, Vera, whether you believe me or not, something miraculous is happening to me. You cannot imagine in what a charmed world of pictures and visions I live. I am writing Isis; not writing, rather copying out and drawing that which She personally shows to me. Upon my word, sometimes it seems to me that the ancient Goddess of Beauty in person leads me through all the countries of past centuries which I have to describe. I sit with my eyes open and to all appearances see and hear everything real and actual around me, and yet at the same time I see and hear that which I write. I feel short of breath; I am afraid to make the slightest movement for fear the spell might be broken. Slowly century after century, image after image, float out of the distance and pass before me as if in a magic panorama; and meanwhile I put them together in my mind, fitting in epochs and dates, and know for sure that there can be no mistake. Races and nations, countries and cities, which have for long disappeared in the darkness of the prehistoric past, emerge and then vanish, giving place to others; and then I am told the consecutive dates. Hoary antiquity makes way for historical periods; myths are explained to me with events and people who have really existed, and every event which is at all remarkable, every newly-turned page of this many-colored book of life, impresses itself on my brain with photographic exactitude. My own reckonings and calculations appear to me later on as separate colored pieces of different shapes in the game which is called casse-tête (puzzles). I gather them together and try to match them one after the other, and at the end there always comes out a geometrical whole. . . . Most assuredly it is not I who do it all, but my Ego, the highest principle which lives in me. And even this with the help of my Guru and teacher who helps me in everything. If I happen to forget something I have just to address him, or another of the same kind, in my thought, and what I have forgotten rises once more before my eyes—sometimes whole tables of numbers passing before me, long inventories of events. They remember everything. They know everything. Without them, from whence could I gather my knowledge?"

Soon after the appearance of Isis Unveiled H. P. B. received invitations to write in all sorts of newspapers. This greatly amused her, and she wrote to Madame Jelihovsky:

"It's lucky for me that I am not vain, and besides as a matter of fact I have hardly any time to write much in other people's publications for money. . . . Our work is growing. I must work, must write and write, provided that I can find publishers for my writings. Would you believe that so long as I write I am all the time under the impression that I write rubbish and nonsense which no one will ever be able to understand? Then it is printed and then the acclamations begin. People reprint it, are in ecstasies. I often wonder: can it be that they are all asses to be in such ecstasies? Well, if I could write in Russian and be praised by my own people, then perhaps I should believe that I am a credit to my ancestors, Counts Hahn Hahn von der Rothenhahn of blissful memory."

H. P. B. often told her relatives that she took no author's pride in the writing of Isis Unveiled; that she did not know in the least what she was writing about; that she was ordered to sit down and write, and that her only merit lay in obeying the order. Her only fear was that she would be unable to describe properly what was shown to her in beautiful pictures. She wrote to her sister:

"You do not believe that I tell you God's truth about my Masters. You consider them to be mythical; but is it possible that it is not clear to you that I, without their help, could not have written about 'Byron and grave matters', as Uncle Roster says? What do we know, you and I, about metaphysics, ancient philosophies and religions, about psychology and various other puzzles? Did we not learn together, with the only difference that you did your lessons better? And now look at what I am writing about, and people—such people too, professors, scientists—read and praise! Open Isis wherever you like and decide for yourself. As to myself I speak the truth: Master narrates and shows all this to me. Before me pass pictures, ancient manuscripts, dates—all I have to do is to copy, and I write so easily that it is no labor at all, but the greatest pleasure."

(But the ancient manuscripts to which H. P. B. refers were not only seen by psychic means. Hodgson, the great self-exposer of the S.P.R., discovered a page of a mysterious and ancient manuscript at Adyar. This was proof to him, as it was written in cypher, that she was a Russian spy. It was from a page of a Senzar manuscript, lost by H. P. B. and deeply lamented as lost!) In another letter of about the same date, H. P. B. wrote her sister:

“Do not believe that Theosophy contradicts or, much less, destroys Christianity. It only destroys the tares, but not the seed of truth: prejudice, blasphemous superstitions, Jesuitical bigotry. . . . We respect men’s freedom of conscience and their spiritual yearnings far too much to touch religious principles with our propaganda. Every human being who respects himself and thinks has a holy of holies of his own, for which we Theosophists ask respect. Our business concerns philosophy, morals, and science alone. We ask for truth in everything; our object is the realization of the spiritual perfectability possible to man: the broadening of his knowledge, the exercising of the powers of his soul, of all the psychical sides of his being. Our theosophical brotherhood must strive after the ideal of general brotherhood throughout all humanity; after the establishment of universal peace and the strengthening of charity and disinterestedness; after the destruction of materialism, of that coarse unbelief and egotism which saps the vitality of our country.”

BOGUS MAHATMA MESSAGES.

ON November 30th, 1894, I received, from a source I always respect, this warning: “Look out for anonymous and bogus ‘occult’ messages to members of the Society. Both will be sent, as attempts at delusion, as burlesques, and for other purposes”. On the second of December, at 144 Madison avenue, New York, a New York F.T.S. in the presence of Mr. A. Fullerton handed me a packet. A plate giving the written contents is given below.

The member’s name is Joseph W. Ganson, a very earnest student. He said it had fallen into his lap at his Club, the Harvard, or seemed to fall out of a newspaper he held. The only other person present was a friend who declared he had nothing to do with it. The packet is of yellowish linen paper, looking quite eastern. It was addressed “Ganson”, and near the address is “a pledge”. Inside was also a half of a palm-leaf south Indian manuscript with a flower in it.

Mr. Ganson said he did not know whether it was genuine or not, but could not decide and asked me to tell him. I then said that if a joke he could take the words to heart, if he chose, for what was good in them, but that in three days I would decide. On December 5th I gave him a signed certificate that the message is not genuine and had been concocted by three persons, and that all genuine objective messages from the Masters carried with them a peculiar and definite odor which could not be imitated and which once identified would not be forgotten. The message was shown to a large number of members at a meeting, and but few were willing to decide for or against it, admitting non-ability save by argument, inference, and appearance. Appearance is no guide, because this message might have been genuine and still have the same appearance and contents.

Mr. W. E. Coleman of San Francisco is also occupying himself in sending post-cards to many members in all parts signed "Mahâtmâ E." with three stars, referring to exposures and scurrilous attacks. Members may as well know these facts. I invite all to send to me any and all messages, real or pretended, and I will guarantee to render a decision according to the fact in each case. Beware not only of bogus messages but also of anonymous communications.

OUR OVERWHELMING VIRTUES.

The superior Virtue is not seen as virtue, and therefore it is the spirit thereof.

The inferior virtue wears the garment of virtue, and therefore it contains not the spirit.

The superior Virtue flows of its own accord.

Tao-Tek-King.

THE dangers of vice have been the subject of many wise discourses. Its horrors have been painted with vivid realism, whilst glorious virtue has been held up before the eyes of men as something to be striven for and, when attained, to be most carefully preserved.

Yet no truth, however deeply true, is final in itself. Seeming ultimates are but stages in unlimited progression, and the highest virtue man can reach to now will vanish like some mist before the sunlight of his spirit in an age to come. But the future is with us to-day as a shadow which ever recedes as we ever approach; and virtue which is perforce imperfect may entomb us as surely as vice.

Vice contains in itself its own destroyer. Separative, it quickly disintegrates. Few men think it a final goal: they will presently be virtuous, when they are old, or in better circumstance, or have not to meet this present and unique temptation. Virtue is more tenacious. It is self-satisfied, and clings to one who has striven for it, fostered it, and who trembles at the thought of its loss. Here I speak of that peculiar virtue which is our very own. We may have vices, we may do wrong, but this virtue we have got and never will surrender. Has it not consoled us in many an hour of self-reproach, of blame which was almost deserved? More consoling has it been to many than the errors of their neighbors.

Yet for one moment consider: much has been said of polarity, of the dualism in nature. The pairs of opposites have been catalogued at length: light and darkness, heat and cold, male and female, have been found to coëxist. It has also been shown that these, though opposite in name, are far from separate in fact. How could light follow on darkness if the darkness had not contained it? How could sweetness spring from that which seemed so bitter if the bitterness held only itself? Even so the loftiest virtue embosoms a sleeping sin. "Sin", if only inasmuch as it may hinder that growth which is Nature's aim, by our attachment to a limitation; by our failure to rise to the universal through love for this so pleasing grace.

It may be Justice. We will be ideally just; we will be impartial as few, if any, have ever dreamt of being. How noble a virtue it is, and how safe a guide? An idol fit for the worship of all men, you will think, and one that we should bow to with the rest. By its aid we can judge all these events—and men, with evenness and with no fear or favor. We will calmly sit on the judgment-seat and weigh the evidence, so that no man shall say “He has a bias”, but all shall admire the perfect Justice we exemplify.

I say that the soul does not know it. The soul is not concerned in this chopping and balancing of statement. It does not cry to its companions “Let us consider this alleged misdoing by the aid of our united wisdom”. Thought for the preservation of its own integrity is not allowed to close the door on this greater thought—Another’s need. For the soul has a mighty generosity that flows and swells and sweeps before it any thought but this: “How can I help my brother who is now unfortunate?” That generosity is not born of the emotions; it has forgotten the meaning of tears. It springs from an understanding of Time; from long waiting upon that law which is beyond all Justice, since it knows not doubt nor anything but unity.

Or it is Work. Someone, after many years of effort, has overcome the grosser form of the natural sloth of matter. His mind, his brain, his body, have been trained to answer to his will; every gift is utilized, every moment is turned to account. He acts, indifferent to obstacles, regardless of consequences—striving to serve. The man confides to himself he would die if he could not work. But there is a pride of action. Then if fate which is greater than he overtakes him, and he loses the labor he loves, he calls upon death to relieve him of the burden of life since now he is useless and his course is run.

But the soul, having seen this thing before, knows better. It knows that the form of service is not counted in the least; that every act can be a mode of one spirit of devotion. Whether maimed, or blind, or tied by chains of duty to a life of seeming pettishness, is not man still the resting-place of the Eternal? Is that so little he dare speak of uselessness? Wise indeed must he have suddenly become if he would improve upon the working of the Law! For wisdom in every age has been well content to say “Thy will be done, O Lord of Destiny!” We have so little faith: we must see—and show—some result of all our efforts. Yet is there neither first nor last in this great reckoning of life, and to hold a pleasure rightly or meet a pain is as hard a feat as to turn the stream of a nation’s history.

Work can be overwhelming in more ways than one. I have read in a Hindû book of a half-fledged sage who, by his power of goodness, attempted to destroy the character of the growth of the world. His goodness was a passion, a passion that craved self-immolation, not for the sake of others but for its own sake. He had not reached that point of equilibrium where there is only selflessness, where both selfishness and unselfishness have been laid down. In that state wrong self-immolation is not known.

Want of equilibrium is at the root of all disease, and even as there must still be those who, like this Hindû of old, seek to obtain what they believe to be good at the expense of right, and would purify the world at the price of acting as its executioners, so there are those who crave for work regardless whether it be their own or that of others. Another's work is usually more pleasing than that which lies so very near to us. It has a foreign flavor and promises excitement. Such do not wait to ask, "Is this my duty?" They are above such slow consideration. Yet how much confusion on all planes of being they would save themselves and others by that moment's pause! But this has been said since the beginning of things, to be said to the end, and still we have not found the Middle Path, the place of equilibrium. He who has reached it, as one of Nature's greatest scholars said, "acts but does not strive, and without striving overcomes everything".

Thus every virtue, as has been said, embosoms a sleeping sin, and the wise man bewares of it, treating his virtue as a stage in his gradually-lessening ignorance, not as an aim and end in itself to be worshipped and glorified. If he could lay aside his calculated code of conduct for the more generous impulse of the soul, he would greatly be the gainer. But the soul he calls "his own", and will not therefore trust it. He has not learnt to separate the voice of his desires from that other voice which speaks to him of cold, clean truth; and therefore he calculates. His morals must be neatly docketed, ready for production as required; and although a few minutes' notice is needed at times for prompt delivery—he is only mortal.

The Immortals are not calculators. They act. They also breathe after their fashion, and without failure. And the light of the Immortals is the light that lighteth every man who cometh into the world. Verily they who know it shall go back to their Home in peace.

THE REAL REASON.

WHEN any doctrine or fact first presents itself before a public unacquainted with it, it has to make its way through no little indifferentism, and over-strong obstacles of prejudice, ignorance, vested interests, and bigotry. Conservatism will resist the intruder, and some of the most powerful forces in human nature will denounce him as a reckless disturber of settled faith, an audacious trifler with sacred institutions. Envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness surge up to oppose and overwhelm him. If he conquers a foothold and establishes himself as a permanency, it is because he is too strong for successful opposition and because he has found friends among the multitude.

The progressing triumph in the Western hemisphere of belief in the existence of Masters is a very instructive case. When the doctrine was first put in popular form by Mr. Sinnétt, it received welcome from not a few readers, but the public at large was little impressed. As Theosophists multiplied and as H. P. B.'s voice sounded over the world, the doctrine became better known and began to arouse antagonism. Her books and the literature they begot were full of references to the doctrine; it was perceived an integral part of the Religious Philosophy; no little teaching was avowedly from Masters; sometimes messages were distinctly proclaimed. As Theosophists grew bolder they became less reticent; a conviction spread that it was Masters' will that Their existence should be emphasized; the consequent efforts, together with the strangeness of the doctrine, forced the topic to the fore-front in Theosophic writings. And this has been helped by occasional communications vouchsafed to individual Theosophists and used fittingly by them for general or particular edification.

Of course this growing publicity has alarmed the orthodox in Church and Science, and the familiar battle is in full rage. Ridicule is naturally the most frequent weapon, reason being less available, and the Himalayas and Tibet and astral bodies have received from comic editors an attention which they never had when geographies and physiologies had no impetus from Theosophy. Not much can be attempted by argument, especially since Huxley proclaimed it flimsy, but it is easy to smile with complacent self-satisfaction or to joke at astral telegraphs and Mahâtmic infallibility. But behind all this one can see the real alarm in conservative circles, for if belief in Masters together with its consequents establishes itself securely, a very different ideal and a very different method will displace those so dear to Theology.

Certainly there is ample reason for this alarm. Most members in the swelling ranks of the Theosophical Society, free as they are in respect to this as all other doctrines, do in fact hold it, and Theosophy itself is so coloring the thought of the age that minds everywhere are becoming tinged. Moreover, there are indications that Masters Themselves feel the time propitious for larger action, and that They are behind not only the T.S. but some of its operations. And it may even be said that occasional pupils, utterly unsuspected heretofore, are now quietly revealing themselves on fitting occasions and for authorized purposes, starting certain influences which have results on private members and the agencies they are working. As these increase—and the public is now sensing that they will—there will be reason to foresee a still greater sweep of Adept influence over the world.

Theosophic observers are deeply interested in all this, and one part of their observation is into the motives which excite such hostility to the doctrine of Masters. All the ordinary ones are very obvious,—dislike to novelty, fear of consequences, incompatibility with existing convictions, prejudice against Eastern beliefs, jealousy of higher beings, a materialistic bias, dread of ridicule, and many another force which springs instantly to its feet when unfamiliar sounds are heard. But these do not seem entirely to meet the case, for there is often a resentment, even a malignity, which does not exhibit itself over Karma, or Reincarnation, or the Seven Principles, or Devachan. Why should men become vexed about Masters while tolerant of Angels, and grow bitter against an unseen Man though benignant to an unseen Spirit? And why, above all, should any such feeling display itself in a Theosophist, one who may be supposed to concede the doctrine, even if not to welcome it?

In the case of such a Theosophist, and cases have undoubtedly occurred, for both in private letters and in public prints have appeared sentences rather angrily opposing the assertions of others that Masters exist and have actually communicated with workers, there must be some deeper reason than a latent unbelief or an opposition to public use of the doctrine. As we probe down, bringing each possible motive to the surface and finding it inadequate, can we stop short of this concealed, most probably unconscious, one,—that he himself has never received a message? Certainly this explanation would be indignantly repudiated; and yet as we examine the conditions of the case is not it the only satisfactory solution? For observe : such a Theosophist does not deny the possibility of Masters ; he does not contest the continuity of the record of the historic belief, or its present potency in many sections of the world, or its value in the Theosophic scheme ; he does not insist that Their present action is impossible, or that there can be no satisfactory evidence of its output, or that testimony from a quarter like H.P.B. can be discredited. He would not even say that no private individual could be the recipient of a demonstration, and that any assertion of such must inevitably be false. And yet when a concrete case occurs, when reputable persons affirm themselves to have seen a Master, or to have heard His words, or to have received from Him in any way a message, there is an instant uprising of protest, of denial, of angry contempt. Is there any possible way of accounting for this save as jealousy, the working of resentment at the uncomfortable thought that another has been preferred?

This view is corroborated by two facts. One is that the objects in private or in public are invariably those who have not been thus favored, and who are also of the indolent, the lukewarm, the critical in Theosophical affairs. As one runs over the list of Theosophists who have thus resented the asserted experiences of others, they are at once recognized as among the lightweights in the Society, exactly those who would have no claim to help, and exactly those, therefore, whom one would expect not to receive it. The other fact is that denial is never heard from those who themselves know. If a man has ever been the recipient of proof that Masters exist, he is forever secure in his own belief, and he is also glad to avow that a privilege which has been granted to him is far more probable in the case of those more worthy. No readier concession to the likelihood of widespread help from Masters can be found than from him who has himself received that help.

And so, as we scan the problem of bitter denial, we find its only satisfactory solution in that pettiness of self-love, that lamentable littleness of vanity, which Theosophy itself so deplors and discountenances. A man does not like to admit as possible to another what he has not met himself and knows he cannot claim. It is solacing to wounded pride to deny the reality of a tribute elsewhere. And the wound to the pride makes the denial bitter.

True pride would refuse to allow the soul to express, even to feel, chagrin at another's honor. True dignity would rejoice if the race produces better fruits than oneself. True philanthropy would beam over happiness accruing to any fellow-worker. And true Theosophy would take courage as it found any additional evidence that Masters are alert for the common Cause, and eager to aid their servants in a service which by that aid shall the sooner triumph.

ALEXANDER FULLERTON.

CONVERSATIONS ON OCCULTISM.

STUDENT.—Are there any rules, binding on all, in white magic or good occultism? I mean rules similar to the ten commandments of the Christians, or the rules for the protection of life, liberty, and property recognized by human law.

Sage.—There are such rules of the most stringent character, the breaking of which is never wiped out save by expiation. Those rules are not made up by some brain or mind, but flow from the laws of nature, of mind, and of soul. Hence they are impossible of nullification. One may break them and seem to escape for a whole life or for more than a life; but the very breaking of them sets in motion at once other causes which begin to make effects, and most unerringly those effects at last react on the violator. Karma here acts as it does elsewhere, and becomes a Nemesis who, though sometimes slow, is fate itself in its certainty.

Student.—It is not, then, the case that when an occultist violates a rule some other adept or agent starts out like a detective or policeman and brings the culprit to justice at a bar or tribunal such as we sometimes read of in the imaginative works of mystical writers or novelists?

Sage.—No, there is no such pursuit. On the contrary, all the fellow-adepts or students are but too willing to aid the offender, not in escaping punishment, but in sincerely trying to set counteracting causes in motion for the good of all. For the sin of one reacts on the whole human family. If, however, the culprit does not wish to do the amount of counteracting good, he is merely left alone to the law of nature, which is in fact that of his own inner life from which there can be no escape. In Lytton's novel, Zanoni, you will notice the grave Master, Mejnour, trying to aid Zanoni, even at the time when the latter was falling slowly but surely into the meshes twisted by himself that ended in his destruction. Mejnour knew the law and so did Zanoni. The latter was suffering from some former error which he had to work out; the former, if himself too stern and unkind, would later on come to the appropriate grief for such a mistake. But meanwhile he was bound to help his friend, as are all those who really believe in brotherhood.

Student.—What one of those rules in any way corresponds to “Thou shalt not steal”?

Sage.—That one which was long ago expressed by the ancient sage in the words, “Do not covet the wealth of any creature”. This is better than “Thou shalt not steal”, for you cannot steal unless you covet. If you steal for hunger you may be forgiven, but you coveted the food for a purpose, just as another covets merely for the sake of possession. The wealth of others includes all their possessions, and does not mean mere money alone. Their ideas, their private thoughts, their mental forces, powers, and faculties, their psychic powers—all, indeed, on all planes that they own or have. While they in that realm are willing to give it all away, it must not be coveted by another.

You have no right, therefore, to enter into the mind of another who has not given the permission and take from him what is not yours. You become a burglar on the mental and psychic plane when you break this rule. You are forbidden taking anything for personal gain, profit, advantage, or use. But you may take what is for general good, if you are far enough advanced and good enough to be able to extricate the personal element from it. This rule would, you can see, cut off all those who are well known to every observer, who want psychic powers for themselves and their own uses. If such persons had those powers of inner sight and hearing that they so much want, no power could prevent them from committing theft on the unseen planes wherever they met a nature that was not protected. And as most of us are very far from perfect, so far, indeed, that we must work for many lives, yet the Masters of Wisdom do not aid our defective natures in the getting of weapons that would cut our own hands. For the law acts implacably, and the breaches made would find their end and result in long after years. The Black Lodge, however, is very willing to let any poor, weak, or sinful mortal get such power, because that would swell the number of victims they so much require.

Student.—Is there any rule corresponding to “Thou shalt not bear false witness”?

Sage.—Yes; the one which requires you never to inject into the brain of another a false or untrue thought. As we can project our thoughts to another’s mind, we must not throw untrue ones to another. It comes before him, and he, overcome by its strength perhaps, finds it echoing in him, and it is a false witness speaking falsely within, confusing and confounding the inner spectator who lives on thought.

Student.—How can one prevent the natural action of the mind when pictures of the private lives of others rise before one?

Sage.—That is difficult for the run of men. Hence the mass have not the power in general; it is kept back as much as possible. But when the trained soul looks about in the realm of soul it is also able to direct its sight, and when it finds rising up a picture of what it should not voluntarily take, it turns its face away. A warning comes with all such pictures which must be obeyed. This is not a rare rule or piece of information, for there are many natural clairvoyants who know it very well, though many of them do not think that others have the same knowledge.

Student.—What do you mean by a warning coming with the picture?

Sage.—In this realm the slightest thought becomes a voice or a picture. All thoughts make pictures. Every person has his private thoughts and desires. Around these he makes also a picture of his wish for privacy, and that to the clairvoyant becomes a voice or picture of warning which seems to say it must be let alone. With some it may assume the form of a person who says not to approach, with others it will be a voice, with still others a simple but certain knowledge that the matter is sacred. All these varieties depend on the psychological idiosyncrasies of the seer.

Student.—What kind of thought or knowledge is excepted from these rules?

Sage.—General, and philosophical, religious, and moral. That is to say, there is no law of copyright or patent which is purely human in invention and belongs to the competitive system. When a man thinks out truly a philosophical problem it is not his under the laws of nature; it belongs to all; he is not in this realm entitled to any glory, to any profit, to any private use in it. Hence the seer may take as much of it as he pleases, but must on his part not claim it or use it for himself. Similarly with other generally beneficial matters. They are for all. If a Spencer thinks out a long series of wise things good for all men, the seer can take them all. Indeed, but few thinkers do any original thinking. They pride themselves on doing so, but in fact their seeking minds go out all over the world of mind and take from those of slower movement what is good and true, and then make them their own, sometimes gaining glory, sometimes money, and in this age claiming all as theirs and profiting by it.

THE OLD WISDOM-RELIGION.<sup>1</sup>

ALL readers of T. S. literature are aware that the terms Theosophy, Secret Doctrine, and Wisdom-Religion are generally used as synonymous. While such use of these terms is permissible, and while each of these terms may be made to convey the full meaning of the others, perhaps the real meaning of all the terms can best be shown by an object-lesson in the Wisdom-Religion. The most permanent embodiment and the most accessible form of the Secret Doctrine has always been in the form of religion, the outer forms serving only as a veil to the deeper meaning which was always represented by symbols, glyphics, allegories, and parables. The sublimest truths were ever regarded as a divine revelation to man, and therefore formed the basis of devotion and gave the forms of religious worship. The deeper mysteries completely coördinated the three departments of human action in the search after truth, viz.: Religion, Philosophy, and Science, so that there was perfect agreement between them. Science had no missing-links, Philosophy no false syllogisms or irreconcilable paradoxes, and Religion was entirely divorced from superstition and blind credulity or unreasoning dogmatism. That all such statements will be angrily denied we are quite well aware, and I am as little anxious that the general statements herein made and illustrated by the diagram shall be believed. My only desire is that they shall be understood, and so far apprehended that the reader may be enabled to preserve the picture in the mind for future reference. They who do this need never confound the Secret Doctrine with the outer garb or the degenerate form of any religion known to the world to-day.

The diagram is not meant to be historically or chronologically exact, though philosophically it is, I believe, true and exact as to relations and sequence. It may be read from below upward, tracing our inheritance backward beyond written history, or it may be read in the reverse order. I prefer the latter method.

Let us, then, assume that there existed in the remote past a Wisdom-Religion emanating from the "Elder Brothers" of the human race who constituted a Lodge of Adepts; whose office it was to preserve and transmit to later generations the accumulated wisdom of all previous humanities. This Wisdom-Religion was a complete coördination of the Religious, the Scientific, and the Philosophical elements in human knowledge. It is therefore represented by a circle divided equally into three parts, with the Lodge in the center as a nucleus. The earliest embodiment of this ancient wisdom was in the Vedas of old India. From the Vedas and Upanishads sprang ancient Brahmanism and later Buddhism, both of which preserved the three-fold division of religion, philosophy, and science. Next in order of importance came the religions of Chaldea and Egypt, each again preserving the three-fold form. Each of these had its organized Mysteries, in which the philosophical and scientific doctrines were preserved and taught to neophytes, with which the outer religious forms taught to the masses were originally in perfect harmony. Next came the religions of Persia and China, emanating from Zoroaster, Confucius, and Laotse, still showing the three-fold form, and followed by the philosophy of Pythagoras and Plato, and then again becoming embodied in the Kabalah with which the Pentateuch and the "Oral Teachings" (afterwards the Talmud) constituted the Jewish Religion. Repudiating later Judaism, with its ceremonies, bloody sacrifices, and traditions, and in keeping with the warnings and anathemas of the Prophets, the religion taught by Jesus embodied the more direct wisdom of the Kaballa, the philosophy of Plato (the doctrine of the Logos), and the doctrines of the Essenes and Gnostics. Thus was shown a direct descent from the old Wisdom-Religion, though giving prominence to the religious and ethical rather than to the scientific and philosophical elements. Nothing is easier than to trace this inheritance by tradition and glyphic. In Christianity under Constantine and Eusebius dogma and the sword established the reign of ecclesiasticism, superseded the religion of Jesus, and prepared the way for the dark ages. The religion of Mahommed, though a religion of conquest and blood, still through its Sufis preserved at least the traditions of a Secret Doctrine, while modern Free Masonry, coördinating the symbols from many sources (largely Kabalistic), has transmitted to modern times the science and philosophy once embodied in the Wisdom-Religion, though it has failed to recover the Key to the lost secret. Coming at last to the sects into which Christianity is to-day divided, ignorant theological speculations have failed entirely to discern the synthesis of the Wisdom-Religion, and while making a fetich of the name of Jesus have preserved only the ethics he taught, and so divorced his Divinity from his Humanity and became an easy prey to the materialism of modern science. Religion is the divinest part of the ancient three-fold wisdom, because it is through religion that divine truth alone reaches the toiling, sorrowing masses of humanity. Christ ~~knew~~ and taught the Wisdom-Religion, but Christianity to-day with ~~its~~ ironclads and standing armies is more an heir of Constantine than of Christ. Other and older religions are largely ethnic, and Christianity might indeed become in the truest sense catholic if it would go back to Christ. It is now slowly but surely being undermined by modern materialism. It might find in Theosophy a mighty ally that would enable it to defy materialism and convert the world, but it is too proud and creed-bound to do that, and so Karma awaits it.

J. D. BUCK.

MR. GREER'S EMANCIPATION.

MR. Benjamin Greer sat alone in his chamber at 11 o'clock one summer evening. For some time back he had been interested in the occult side of Nature and in the matter of spiritual philosophy, and had betaken himself to the perusal of Oriental works thereon, India being supposed by most of his Theosophical friends the main fountain of soul-truth for the human family. From these he had learned the great recipe for spiritual evolution, or, rather, for emancipation from those terrestrial rebirths which otherwise are sure to afflict the aspiring soul. That recipe was contemplation of the navel. It is true that contemplation of the end of the nose is equally efficacious, Paradise—so to speak—being accessible nasally as well as abdominally, but the latter process is apt to induce a squint, and is anyhow attended with much discomfort. Mr. Greer therefore adopted the former, especially as it was sustained by the great mass of Indian authorities. After some research in medical works and cautious questioning among professional friends, he had ascertained the exact spot to which his gaze should be directed, but as in spiritual matters precision is imperative, and as an unhappy corpulence made the existing expanse somewhat misleading, he had affixed to the spot in question a small disk of black courtplaster, so tenacious of hold as to defy accident or baths. There was one other difficulty,—the rotundity of his person precluded direct concentration upon the spot, but this he had met by sitting in front of a mirror and fastening his gaze on the reflected disk. Arrangements for his nightly practice had been facilitated on this occasion by the great warmth of the season and by the necessity of preparing for his couch.

Hardly had Mr. Greer taken a favorable position and brought the courtplaster well in view, when a fly alighted on his shoulder. Without diverting his eyes from the disk he gave enough of a twitch to alarm the fly, which, however, almost instantly returned and settled this time within an inch of the disk itself. "Damn that fly!", ejaculated Mr. Greer, recurring instinctively to an expression of what the Rev. Cream Cheese would call his "carnal days", and incautiously looking away to see if the accompanying slap was well aimed. It was; but the charm was momentarily broken, not only by the deflection of gaze but by the murder of an insect, which, as the best Buddhists agree, is equally fatal to spiritual emancipation. This was a little disheartening, but Mr. Greer resolutely turned again to his reflected navel and stared intently at that center of ultimate enlightenment. Suddenly there occurred to him the question as to what must be the fate of beings without navels, and this raised speculation as to pre-historic creatures, with a consequent thought of Mr. Baring-Gould's illustrations. But Baring-Gould was not a Theosophist, any more than Michael Angelo in the Sistine Chapel Gehenna. Italy was all very well for Art, but, as his cousin's letter of that morning had said, there was no such comfort anywhere as could be found in America. True, the government was bad, but what could you expect when every loafer and ragamuffin had a vote? And now the women were clamoring for the suffrage, and a pleasant life he would have if his landlady took to the primaries and served politics along with breakfast! Better that, however, than babies. He would tolerate no squalling in the house. What would become of his concentration if—alas, what had become of it? Mr. Greer was brought up by a round turn to perception that concatenated thoughts had drawn him far from that pathway to illumination whereof the courtplaster was as a portal. Strange that such difficulties should beset the pilgrim! It would almost seem that Black Magicians were responsible.

Foiled for the evening, Mr. Greer bethought himself of literature and turned for edification to the Apollyon for October, 1894. Before reading far he encountered this paragraph: "The only child of the celibate mocks his elder brother with the reawakening of forges, but the sixty-seventh among the diamond eggs warbles menacingly over its 'inner nectar'. Thus the cosmic sister-in-law attains". Unable to interpret this mysterious teaching, he made the slight change of costume left possible after his season of contemplation, and sought an unblest repose.

It was with a feeling rather of irritation than of discouragement.

ment that Mr. Greer started the next morning for his office. True, his attempts at contemplation did not always end so ignominiously as had the latest, but they certainly had not as yet developed any palpable change in his interior being, and while it was possible that the locality for the courtplaster had been inaccurately determined, a faint suspicion arose that spiritual studies might perhaps have loftier topics than the anatomical center prescribed in Indian treatises. Mr. Greer was a sincere man, very kind-hearted, really desirous of light on duty, not with a quick sense of absurdity, but with convictions and aspirations, a genuine, if obscured, sense of realities. He had done many a generous act in his career, and if through lack of the faculty of humor he had taken too seriously Oriental prescriptions, it might very well be that Karma would ordain his rescue through his charities.

Filled with reflections upon the slow progress of emancipation through the process heretofore pursued, Mr. Greer went somewhat leisurely along the sunlit street, abstractedly gazing at the shops. As he passed the window of a pawnbroker, an arm in shirt-sleeves suddenly pushed aside a little curtain and deposited just behind the glass a shining object of metal. Attracted by its glitter he stopped to examine it, and perceived it to be an East Indian ornament, rather curiously and ingeniously wrought. At this moment a shadow fell over the pane, and looking up he found a man emerging from the door. He was unmistakeably a Hindû, his poor clothing was mainly native, and a saddened expression on the dark face showed that he was the needy one who had just pawned the object in the window. The whole of Mr. Greer's Occult cravings surged up at the spectacle of this Oriental. One of the chosen people, undoubtedly a depository of racial privileges and wisdom, possibly a Brahman, a sage, a spiritual guide, able to prescribe knowingly the very exercises which in his own case were so imperilled by flies and precarious anatomy and terrestrial thoughts! Full of a mighty purpose, Mr. Greer resolved to accost this exile and solicit the Wisdom of the East. But before he was well under way the slim Hindû was lost in the throng, and again he had to lament that embonpoint which had already been his spiritual bane and was once more impeding his course.

This new element of vexation still further slowed his steps, and he had not gone half a dozen blocks when a small group before a door-step attracted his attention. They were staring irresolutely at a man who had evidently sunk from weakness. In a moment Mr. Greer recognized the garb and the face of the late customer at the pawn-shop. All thought of his previous purpose vanished before purely human need, and with kindly interest he spoke to the wanderer, found that he understood English, sent a boy for a cab, and carried him off from the curious crowd to his own lodgings. Then providing for his refreshment and rest, and telling him to remain till the evening, Mr. Greer departed once more for his office. What was to be done for this sufferer,—such was the burden of his thought. He worked out all the necessities of climate, habit, and costume, considered the possibilities of occupation and of support till it was obtained, perceived that only dire emergency had caused parting from an evidently treasured possession, and resolved to redeem it by procuring from his guest the ticket. A whole finished plan was elaborated in his mind by the time that evening brought him back to his home.

Then came an interview which was very different from the one he had depicted by the pawn-shop. The man was, as he had supposed, in want, and Mr. Greer's kind sympathy dispersed his national distrust and opened his heart. Rested and refreshed, he told his story. He was an educated Buddhist, familiar also with Brahminical works, himself a modest aspirant for interior illumination, but now in great need of help to secure occupation or, if possible, return to his own land. Mr. Greer described the plan he had elaborated, and in the mutual confidences this produced narrated his occult reading and his attempts at Oriental prescriptions. The Hindû did not smile; the national character does not include a sense of humor; but he gravely explained that universal tendency to seek things of spirit through things of matter which makes the Eastern look for regeneration in gazing fixedly at his abdomen and the Western in having a priest pour water over his head. "Some of my countrymen", said he, "worship Vishnu in an image, and some of yours worship the Almighty in a wafer. Between a god made of stone and a god made of bread there is no difference. The Eternal Spirit is in every man, to be sought and found in his own soul, not in ceremonies or bodily anointings or external practices of any kind. I thought that your Scriptures said this."

Mr. Greer was not strong in Biblical lore and said as much, adding that he had been led to believe that the truth was to be sought in Indian writings; "the Sun rises in the East".

"True", replied the Oriental, "but it does not stay there. It moves impartially over the heavens. There is as much light in the afternoon as in the morning, but it comes from the West."

Mr. Greer was amazed. "Then you do not approve of my following the Vedas and the Shastras and what we are told of the way to emancipation?"

"I approve of your taking truth from every quarter. But then it must be Truth. It will do you no good to accept fables and tancies instead of reasonable teachings of spiritual things. You are to find God within, and to serve Him in your life each day."

"And not to practice concentration?", asked Mr. Greer.

"What did you do to-day when you planned out my relief?", replied the Hindû.

"I put my mind to it and forgot everything else till I had worked out the whole thing."

"Exactly", rejoined the Oriental. "That was concentration. You dropped from your mind all but what you were working at. Why did you do this?"

"Because I wanted to help you."

"Just so. You were so intent on an act of charity that you forgot yourself and your business and all else. You were practicing concentration, and were doing it in the best way and for the best purposes."

Mr. Greer could hardly believe his ears. This indeed was a new doctrine, not at all what he had understood by Yoga.

The Hindû continued. "Do not concern yourself with your body except to keep it pure and healthy. If you wish to understand spiritual things, think of them and let the indwelling God disclose Himself to your soul. Banish thoughts which hinder that, and gradually the light will shine through you. Be kind to others as you have been kind to me. Do you feel happier this evening than when you saw me at the pawnbroker's?"

Mr. Greer admitted that he did. Some of the light was already breaking.

"Very well. You have the key to spiritual evolution,—Charity and Devotion. I cannot tell you better than this. But even this you have learned because you brought me to your house in kindness. You say you believe in Karma. Here is a case of it. And do you know why you felt the wish to be kind? Because you had formed the habit when on earth before. Our Buddha tells us how lives of such kindness will bring us to emancipation. But it will not be through contemplating your navel."

That night, before Mr. Greer retired, he removed the court-plaster.

ALEXANDER FULLERTON.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TO the many who hitherto sent me protests against the circular here referred to I would say that the time had not then come for publishing them, and the following will fully represent the views of the majority of the thousands I am acquainted with.

W. Q. J.

"OCCULTISM AND TRUTH."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PATH:—An article under the above heading having appeared in Lucifer for September and being also reprinted in the September PATH, and deeming it in point of fact, though perhaps not by intention, both a breach of good faith and an impeachment of the moral standards of every member of the T.S. save the "seven" who signed it, I wrote a general protest to that effect and sent it to Lucifer for publication. It was declined, partly because the senior editor was absent, and partly for the reason that its admission would open up afresh a discussion which it was thought desirable to avoid. Acquitting as I did the sub-editor from any intentional unfairness, I thought then, and still think, it unfair that not a word of protest should be allowed to such sweeping inferences as were in the article named laid against the moral precepts held by members of the T.S. excepting only the seven who had forestalled these inferences by signing the article.

From another standpoint the article is open to the charge of breach of good faith. In Mrs. Besant's "Statement" published in Lucifer, on page 459 occurs the following paragraph: "But there is another way, which I now take, and which, if you approve it, will put an end to this matter: and as no Theosophist should desire to inflict penalty for the past—even if he thinks wrong has been done—but only to help forward right in the future, it may, I venture to hope, be accepted." (The italics in the above quotation are mine.) The plan was accepted without protest, it being understood, as Mrs. Besant expressed it, that the action taken was to "put an end to the matter", and included in "the matter" to which an end was to be put was the charge that one at least of the officials of the Society held the doctrine, which, however, he denied and of which he has never shown a trace in all my intimate acquaintance, that a good end justifies the use of bad means. As to all of this Mrs. Besant agreed an end should be put.

My contention is that the circular Occultism and Truth was not only unnecessary but was in its essential part untrue and was also a breach of good faith. By inference it was an impeachment of the ethical code of all who had not the opportunity to affix their names and thus run to cover. While it is the fact that Mrs. Besant has since written that she was the author of the paper and its original instigator, I do not believe she was conscious of the desire to impeach the ethics of other members, but I cannot so readily acquit some of the other signers who had shown in the proceedings in July a personal hostility not at all commendable. None of the signers can escape the logical inferences.

After giving out as if new or as if not known to most of our members ethical doctrines which every one knows the merest tyro in Theosophy is well acquainted with, and while justly condemning the false view of occultism that "the end justifies the means", the document then says: "Finding that this false view of occultism is spreading in the Theosophical Society, we desire to place on record our profound aversion to it, etc".

Fortunate indeed is it for the T.S. that there are yet seven who are not contaminated by such false views! But I deny emphatically that any such false views and loose codes of ethics prevail anywhere in the T.S. or are spreading in it. Had the opportunity been given for repudiating such a false code, there is not a member of the T.S., I believe, in the whole round world who would not have signed it as readily and as consistently as any of the seven.

The convention had adjourned. The difficulties pending had been formally settled on the best basis acceptable to all parties. There was still some stress of feeling and with some bitterness and hostility, and this, under guise of a general lesson on morality, found an outlet in Occultism and Truth. So far as it can in any way refer to matters that had been considered and "put an end to", it was a breach of good faith, though doubtless not so regarded by the signers. So far as the insinuation of lax moral ethics is laid to the whole Society, I deny it in toto. It is not true: it is a mistaken judgment. A false statement such as this about a large society should never be put into the hands of our enemies, who have never been able to attack our moral teachings; the moment such a statement becomes true is the moment for us to dissolve. Therefore I hold that the whole article is misconceived, out of place, and should never have been printed. I agree fully with Mrs. Besant's statement in the paragraph already quoted. ". . . no Theosophist should desire to inflict penalty for the past—even if he thinks wrong has been done". Had this precept been generally adopted, not only much of the trouble that has arisen later might have been avoided, but those who do not "think wrong has been done" would have discovered more of that spirit of true Brotherhood which we regard as in no sense inferior to love of truth. All such accusations and insinuations must cease, and we must bear patiently with each other's infirmities if we are not to fall apart and disintegrate. No one man or woman, no one country, has all the virtue or love of truth, and he who has it in largest degree is ever the most charitable to the mistakes and follies of others. He who believes in the law of Karma need not trouble himself to pursue his fellow for either real or fancied wrongs. If, however, the accused be conscious of no wrong, Karma readjusts the scales and the accuser becomes the self-accused.

J. D. Buck, F.T.S.

KALI YUGA AND THE COMING RACE.

(1.) How many years are there in Kali Yuga? (2.) Will the sixth sub-race begin very soon, that is, will it be at the end of the cycle of the first five thousand years of Kali Yuga? (3.) Cannot a person of the fifth race come near where the sixth race shall live?

(1.) Kali Yuga is said by the Brahmins and by the Secret Doctrine to be 432,000 years long. We will have to accept the calculation for the present.

(2.) Many thousands of years will pass before the next race will be here, and you will have died several times over before that, and also it is probable you will be one of that race unless you go to some other planet. You have made the error of supposing that the end of the cycle in 1898 is the end of the race. It is not. It is but a minor cycle, though quite important in its way. Hence—

(3.) As we, including you, will be members of the new race in all probability if we take advantage of our opportunities, there is no profit in the question or its answer, for the sixth race not being due for so many centuries, and you being eligible for membership in it, there is no sequence. When the sixth race has fully come, many degenerate examples of the bodies of the fifth will be here with it and among it, but no special place will be kept for its development.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE PATH has now on sale the Bombay edition of the Twelve Principal Upanishads, with notes from the Commentaries of Sankarâchârya and the Gloss of Ânandagiri. Cloth, 710 pages; price by mail or express, $3.00.

THE LAMP, issued by Toronto members, still shines. The December issue has a most awful picture of the editor of the PATH, for which we forgive them. Five thousand copies are issued monthly. It contains short notes and extracts, and is designed for propaganda.

A COURSE OF READING. The General Secretary is getting out a small compact circular giving a course of theosophical reading, to be sent to enquirers. After the ten books in the course follow suggestions as to devotional, philosophical, instructive, and children's books.

DAS MEER DER THEOSOPHIE is a German translation of the Ocean of Theosophy by Eduard Herrmann, F.T.S., of New York. It is published by Wilhelm Friedrich of Leipzig, Germany, and can be obtained through the PATH office. It is well gotten up and on good paper with paper covers.

LIGHT ON THE PATH. A pocket edition of this favorite work is nearly ready. It contains the comments from Lucifer, is beautifully printed, and bound in limp cloth. As there has been no pocket edition of this work issued heretofore, it is hoped that this venture will meet with general favor. Price by mail, 50 cents, postage paid, from PATH office.

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VII, No. 10, is on "Philosophy and Ethics of the Zoroasters", and by Dr. Alexander Wilder. Of course it is learned and instructive, but there is in Dr. Wilder's papers a sweet and gracious tone which is even more attractive than his learning. Appended is a brief article called "Zoroastrism, an Afterword", apparently also by the Doctor, the first and last paragraphs of which are particularly good.—[A.F.]

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE, hastening to try and gather the pecuniary profits of its long attack on the T.S., at once, before the reply made by Mr. Judge had reached it, got out the whole thing in the form of a pamphlet in which it assumes on what it calls foreknowledge that no reply would be made. Mr. Judge's reply was about 5,000 words long, and will call for a new edition if the thing is to be printed complete. But that reply was printed in full by the New York Sun. The pamphlet is a monument of assumption, presumption, and ignorance, combined with malice and falsehood. It may be put on the shelf with the S.P.R. Report on H.P.B. It is not sold by the PATH.

MUSIC THEOSOPHICALLY needs attention. We have only the few simple songs of the Lotus Circles, where this branch of Theosophy first had attention, and in California by the way. In that state Bro. Walters gives it much attention. Recently Bro. A. Tregina of Washington made some more tunes for the New York Circle, which is copying them and sending to other Circles. This will broaden the matter somewhat. Bro. Tregina has also composed a song of more weight to the words "The Appeal to the Higher Self", from the Crest Jewel of Wisdom, and dedicated it to W. Q. Judge. The song will soon be gotten out by the PATH office as a beginning of this important branch of work. Perhaps later other musicians will try the same line and make the title always speak for Theosophy.

NOVEMBER THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves II" describes the early life in India of the Founders, the friends they made, some sturdy, some treacherous, the throngs of visitors, the discussions, the hypocrisy and attempted swindle of a native host named Hurrychund whose present incarnation is here branded for all time, and a striking phenomenon by H. P. B. "Sympathy a Source of Knowledge", J. C. Staples, is good; "Haunted Trees and Stones" illustrates that interpretation of "All things are possible to him that believeth" which renders it as "There is no limit to human credulity"; "Colors and Tones", by Miss Ellen S. Atkins, is so significant as to evoke a suggestive Editorial Note. The President announces that generous gifts from the Sections have more than made good the embezzlement by the late Treasurer.—[A. F.]

THE IRISH THEOSOPHIST for November contains the first in the series of Jasper Niemand's "Letters to a Lodge". Though sometimes a little indefinite and addicted to paradox, it is really able and with deep sounding, truly pointing out hidden dangers in the work of help to others. It may not be the fact that "our only justice is compassion", and we should drop into unintelligent hero-worship if we readily attributed abstinence from needed self-defense to "greatness too high for bending", but one is very tolerant of the enthusiasms of a soul like "J. N.". Mr. Sinnett in "Theosophy and the Expiring Cycle" refers to a frequent notion among Theosophists that in 1897 "some mysterious extinguisher" is to descend and make abortive future attempts at Theosophic work, and gives some wise distinctions and cautions, though apparently thinking the "cultured classes" the hope for Theosophy's future.—[A. F.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VII, No. II, "The Doctrine of the Resurrection", A. M. Glass. This is one of those specially good numbers which make F. T. S. lament the approaching end of the publication. It is excellently well reasoned out, copious in treatment and apt citation, reverent and sweet in spirit, and with most pleasing style, very smooth and melodious, a felicitous phrase delighting from time to time percipient minds. Perhaps one cannot say that the word "resurrection" is here given any very definite meaning, and, indeed, that is by no means easy when the word is applied to anything else than a corporal revival, even Alger in his elaborate treatise failing to expound with clearness what he supposed St. Paul's idea to be. Mr. Glass beautifully unfolds the truth of a spiritual evolution, advancing from stage to stage as man strives for it, and culminating in a return to the very bosom of Deity. But does the word "resurrection" fit this thought, however correct the thought? Nevertheless, the paper is delightful, and the quoted teachings of Origen and Justin Martyr should open the eyes of "orthodox" Christians to aspects of doctrine they never dreamed of.—[A. F.]

NOVEMBER LUCIFER is the third issue without the title-page as H. P. B. framed it. Mr. Mead's "The Web of Destiny" treats of man's triple nature as correspondent to the three worlds, and of the three vestures he weaves as he is hylic, psychic, or pneumatic. There is a tone throughout this paper of gentle spiritual fervor which is no less attractive than touching. Most true and wise is H. T. Edge's "Conditions of True Union". There is begun a translation from French of Madame Jelihovsky's reminiscences of her sister, H. P. B., which must certainly be acclaimed by all Theosophists. "Some First-Hand Notes on Tibet" is from facts given by a disciple now resident there, and is most interesting. Eliphas Lévi remarks that the occult philosophy is the philosophy of good sense,—a remark which, considering the source, rather makes one stare. This number of Lucifer is unusually fine, but its gem, its transcending content, is Dr. Herbert Coryn's exquisite "Heaven-world", so admirable in thought and exposition, so clear and sweet and tender, so rich in sensibility, so singularly apt in its use of words, so noble in its spirit and purport and diction. What a magnificent description of death this is,—"the benediction of Nature upon whatever may be good in us"! We are taught the wrong of fear of death, how it arose, wherein we mistake as to the quality of the Heavenworld, what friendship means and how it persists. No reviewer of less ability than the author could adequately describe the treatment of this last topic, or, indeed, any part of the paper. Happily there is to be continuance in future issues. A small drawback is in denying objectivity to color and harmony (page 237), as if the mind created instead of perceiving these, but this is mentioned only lest enthusiasm should seem to sweep away impartiality.—[A.F.]

THE SCHOOL OF LIFE, by Theodore F. Seward, is interesting because it marks one of the earlier stepping-stones on which an intensely devout soul, freed from the spirit and from the coarser dogmas of old orthodoxy and yet finding its very life in distinctive Christianity, passes from a narrow creed to a broad Theosophy. Beautiful and warm in its love for and delight in religion, it has hardly less delight in science because it believes science so copiously to affirm its own new discovery of an old religious truth—the immanence of God in every particle of His universe. It uses this as explaining the genesis and evolution of things and men, and the whole of teleology. The charm is in its utter faith in God, its ready abandonment of schools and scholasticism, its sunny hope and anticipation, its sympathy with the Christ-spirit, its devotion to truth and purity and right, its fraternal touch with every sincere thinker. Verbal inspiration and a personal Devil and a lingering fondness for some old-time theological thought it has not got rid of, but these are evidently weakening. The problem of human misery and the inadequacy of one earth-life as a preparation for eternity are wrestled with manfully but unsuccessfully, as they must always be without Karma and Reincarnation as solvents. And here is the book's weak point. God's mere will and an unknown provision for the future cannot meet the exigencies of those two problems. Nothing short of the Theosophic exposition can. Such a writer is unconsciously ripening for just this, and his lovely spirit of sweetness and light, fortified with the whole strength of Karma and Reincarnation as doctrines, may—let us hope, will—give his ultimate teaching enormous influence. At present it is too liberal for orthodox zealots, and yet unsatisfactory to the unorthodox because still weighted with a theology and with difficulties only removed by Theosophy. But it is a symptom of the times, and, as has been said, a stepping-stone.—[A.F.]

AMERICA.

BRISTOL T.S. has elected as President Mr. Arthur E. Muzzy, and as Secretary Mr. Elbert W. Gaylord.

MERIDEN T.S. has elected as President Mrs. Louise E. Sorg, and as Secretary Mrs. Frances A. H. Loomis, Station A, Box 244.

HAWAII LODGE T.S., Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, was chartered on Dec. 5th with nineteen charter-members, eleven of them being new additions to the T.S. It is the 101st Branch on the American roll.

LYNN T.S., Lynn, Mass., was chartered on Dec. 19th with seven charter-members, and is one result of the work of Mr. Burcham Harding. It would be the 102d Branch, but the extinction of the Harvard T.S. makes it the 101st.

"H. P. B." T. S. had Sunday evening lectures in December: Talk on Theosophy, William Main; The Human Soul. Dr. E. G. Day; Scientific Religion, Dr. E. B. Guild; The Trinity in Man and Nature, J. H. Fussell; Jesus the Christ, Donald Nicholson.

ARYAN T.S. had Sunday evening lectures in December: Gods and Gardens, H. T. Patterson; Theosophic Light on Mundane Paths, Jas. H. Connelly; The Two Paths, Layton W. Crippen; Jesus the Christ, Donald Nicholson; Theosophy, William Q. Judge.

KSHANTI T.S., Victoria, B.C., had lectures in November: Some Teachings of Theosophy, H. W. Graves; Death and Birth, G. F. Jeanneret; Seven Principles of Man, F. C. Berridge; Diet, Capt. Clark. Average attendance has been a little over twenty. The room and free Library are at 28 Broad street.

YONKERS, N. Y., now has a series of Sunday evening lectures. A number of Theosophists of this city hired a hall at 34 North Broadway and have started a center there. Dec. 23d Mr. Budd lectured on The Nature and Aim of Theosophy, and on Dec. 30th Mr. Alex. Fullerton gave Theosophy as a Religion.

HARVARD T.S., the Branch in Cambridge formed of University students, has died out through their graduation. The only member remaining in the city has joined the Cambridge T.S., and the charter was cancelled by the General Secretary on Dec. 26th, the Executive Committee consenting. There are now 101 Branches in the Section.

THE VISIT in November of Claude Falls Wright to Ann Arbor, which is very conservative, resulted in much good. We had misgivings when making the arrangements, but were very glad to see large and cultured audiences at both of his lectures. His parlor talks were also crowded. The papers opened their columns for reports, and a reading-circle was formed before Mr. Wright left. There are other places in Michigan where good work could be done, and all that is needed is more money in the lecture-fund. Those who are interested here feel that if the members and Branches gave more to the funds at the headquarters other lecturers would be sent to waiting places, of which there are many.—[L. H. F.]

CHICAGO T.S. at its annual meeting on Dec. 5th unanimously reelected Mr. George E. Wright as President, and enlarged the Branch representation on the Central States Committee for Theosophical Work. Each of the other three Branches in Chicago has elected a number of this Committee, which Committee will take over to itself the work hitherto done by the League. The new arrangement promotes both harmony and vigor.

BLAVATSKY T.S., Washington, D.C., has taken a new and better hall at 419 Tenth street, with larger capacity and general excellence than any yet secured. A lecture is now given every Sunday evening. On the 2d Mr. Coffin spoke on The Influence of Theosophy on Daily Life; on the 9th Mr. Tregina spoke on Occult Science in Washington City; on the 16th Mr. Robert L. Lerch spoke on A New-Old View of Life. Attendance at the regular Thursday evening meetings is good, with prospect of being much better through the winter.

CHICAGO HAS BEGUN a new year with unwonted encouragement. The reorganization of the Central States Committee and the purchase of a printing-press are two events which promise wide and immediate growth in activity. During the past two months the following Sunday lectures have been delivered at the four Theosophical centers in Chicago: Ghostland and Karma, by Miss Eva F. Gates; Human Evolution and Immortality, by Miss Leoline Leonard; Old Truths in New Forms and Heaven and Hell, by R. D. A. Wade; and Theosophy and A Perfect Man, by Marpole Willis.

BURCHAM HARDING has accepted the honorary position of Lecturer to the New England Theosophical Corporation of Boston. A very thorough system of lecture-work has been inaugurated for carrying Theosophy into every town of over 5,000 inhabitants, and into smaller places where it may be desired. The state of Maine is first on the rôle, as at present it has but one Branch (at Portland), and one F.T.S. in the far east. Mr. Harding spent nine days at Portland, giving two lectures in a public hall and one before the "Beecher Evolution Club", holding Branch meetings on the other nights. Several new members joined, and greater activity was imparted to the Branch. He then started on the pioneer-work into the north and east, taking the leading cities in rotation—Auburn, Lewiston, Bath, Brunswick, Augusta, Gardiner, and Waterville. Two lectures were given in public halls at each place, and a night devoted to forming a center. At every city some have been found to take up the study. At Bath the Y. M. C. A. hall was used for the lectures, and in other places the Y. M. C. A. have rendered assistance. The leading Maine newspapers have generously granted space for articles on Theosophy, and given full reports of the lectures. This pioneer work involves a good deal of expense in travelling, as the ground has to be covered three times. Having no local assistance, the lecturer has to visit the towns a week in advance to arrange for halls and advertising, and then retrace his steps. It is intended to continue this work until all the larger towns in New England have been visited. Members-at-large and others desirous of assisting and willing to arrange for lectures will please communicate with the Secretary New England Theosophical Corporation, 24 Mt. Vernon street, Boston, Mass.

CLAUDE FALLS WRIGHT lectured on Tuesday, the 20th November, to a large audience at Sandusky, O., in the Mahala Hall; his topic was Occultism. After organizing a class there he left for Ann Arbor, Mich., lecturing Nov. 21st in Frieze Memorial Hall on Reincarnation. This hall was also crowded. Thursday he gave a parlor talk at Mrs. Fisk's on The Nature of Theosophy. Friday evening another parlor talk was given at Mrs. Fisk's on The Constitution of Man. On Saturday he gave a public lecture on Occultism in the Frieze Memorial Hall, and announced the formation of a class in Theosophy. Then, after some other work, the class was duly formed on Tuesday evening at Mrs. Fisk's. Mr. Wright then left for Toledo, and on the 29th lectured before the Branch there on Concentration. On Friday he addressed a large audience in the Church of our Father on The Constitution of Man, and on Dec. 1st a still larger one in the same hall on Reincarnation. After that lecture he arranged for a series of lectures on Theosophy in Lotus Hall, provided sufficient persons in the audience put down their names to attend. Fifty outsiders immediately sent in their names, but by the following evening the class had swollen to over one hundred. This course of lectures was as follows: Sunday, Dec. 2d, he lectured on First Principles of Theosophy, 3d on The Cosmos, 4th on Man in his Relation to Nature, 5th on Practical Occultism. On Dec. 6th he addressed a members' meeting on The Theosophical Society. He then left for Fort Wayne, Ind. On Sunday, Dec. 9th, he addressed a meeting there in the Standard Hall on Reincarnation. On Monday no meeting was held on account of the weather. Dec. 4th After-death States was the topic of a lecture in the Branch Rooms. Wednesday he addressed another meeting in Branch Rooms on First Principles. Thursday he attended a small gathering of members in the afternoon, and in the evening addressed a large audience in Standard Hall on Hypnotism. Friday was devoted to making calls on some of the members, and then Mr. Wright left for Dayton, O. On Saturday he addressed a meeting there on Theosophy. Sun-afternoon afternoon he lectured to a full house in the K. of H. Hall on Theosophy and Brotherhood. Monday evening the 17th he lectured again to a yet larger audience in the same Hall on Reincarnation. Mr. Wright will deliver other lectures in Dayton, O., and organize a Society there; he then goes to Cincinnati, St. Louis, Kansas City, and other places, to Denver, Col. The average attendance at his public lectures this month has been from 200 to 500, and the papers have been full of reports all the while.

PACIFIC COAST.

HAWAII LODGE T.S. has elected as President Mr. Mark P. Robinson, and as Secretary Mr. George W. Smith, P. O. Box 319, Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands.

Mrs. ANNA L. BLODGETT of Seattle has been visiting and working among the Branches in Victoria and Port Townsend, having given three public lectures in the former town to good audiences and having met the Branch for consultation. The Kshanti T. S. is doing admirably, four or five of the members being especially active. In Port Townsend it was said that the lecturer had the largest audience in town that Sunday evening. Good questions were put, and very close attention given to the subject.

UNDER THE AUSPICES of Stockton Branch, of Stockton, Calif., Dr. Griffiths gave two lectures in T.S. Headquarters. Sunday, November 18th, he discoursed upon Adepts, who, what, and where are They?; November 20th the subject was Brotherhood on Physical, Mental, and Spiritual Planes. November 21st a public Quiz was held. Headquarters were crowded to their full capacity with very attentive audiences, and great interest was manifested at the Quiz. A full meeting of the Branch was held November 22d, where plans were discussed for better and more extended work. A fraternal spirit prevailed, and strong determination to work more vigorously. Stockton Branch has done good and telling work during the past year. Splendid results always attend those Branches which aspire to do the Masters' bidding and surely receive Their help. Lectures upon Adepts and Brotherhood were in Sacramento, November 29th and December 2d, and a Quiz held December 4th. A Committee for Public T.S. Work has been jointly formed by the two Branches in that city, Pythian Castle secured, and regular Sunday evening public Theosophical lectures begun.

FOREIGN.

ENGLAND.

This Westminster Gazette flare seems to have moved many members to redoubled activity and so resulted in good. Mr. Sydney Coryn, President of the Croydon Lodge, who has been lecturing a good deal at workingmen's Clubs in and about London during the past month, reports splendid and most interested and attentive audiences, and no reference whatever to this so-called "Isis-very-much-Unveiled" exposé. It has fallen perfectly flat; but remains, nevertheless, as a gigantic advertisement for the T.S.

Countess Wachtmeister sends good news from Paris; she passed through there on her way south, and had a long talk with M. Bailly, who is bent on active propaganda. The circulation of Le Lotus Bleu has increased considerably, he told her.

The North of England Federation held its Sixth Conference last month at York, and Mr. Mead took the chair, giving a sensible and practical turn to the current excitement in the Westminster Gazette. Steady work and propaganda was reported as going on well during the past three months in the Northern Lodges and Centers, eight of the former and three of the latter being represented at the Conference.

A South-Western Correspondence Circle has been started, and twenty out of the thirty members notified have joined.

A new Lodge at Norwich—which has long been a Center—was opened by Mr. H. T. Edge last month.

Mr. Staples of the Brighton Lodge having volunteered for theosophical work in Australasia, left for New Zealand a few weeks ago. He is going to help work up Lodges and Centers there, do lecturing tours, etc.

Blavatsky Lodge meetings have been very well attended lately; the quarterly Conversazioni have been given up, and a capital lending library—starting with seventy volumes—established, for the use of members. Miss Cooper has resigned the honorary Secretaryship, Mrs. Sharpe being elected in her stead.

A Secret Doctrine class, too, is held in the lecture-hall on alternate Saturdays by Mr. James Pryse, as many as from twenty to thirty attending it.

The Ocean of Theosophy is at present being made the subject of study by the Croydon Lodge and Streatham Center.

Sweden sends a long and capital report of recent activities. Many of our Scandinavian brethren, notably Dr. Zander, are doing much good in the lecturing line. The Arion Lodge, Malmö, which has only been founded a year, now numbers forty-eight members.

I must not forget to tell you that Mr. Hargrove has just been over to Dublin on a short lecturing-tour, and has met with great success.

ALICE CLEATHER.

AUSTRALASIA.

AUCKLAND, NEW ZEALAND. The feature of the month has been the visit of Mrs. Annie Besant, who arrived on the afternoon of October 5th from Sydney. A reception was held at Mrs. Draffin's in the evening and a program of work arranged for her stay in Auckland. On Oct. 6th she lectured on The Dangers that Threaten Society; on Sunday evening she lectured on The Mahâtmas; on Oct. 8th she spoke on Why I Became a Theosophist; on the following evening on Human Evolution; and on Oct. 10th upon The Teachings of Theosophy. All the lectures were crowded, and during each day she was interviewed upon theosophical subjects by hundreds of citizens in the local Society's rooms. In response to an invitation she breakfasted with the Most Rev. Dr. Cowie, Bishop of Auckland and Primate of New Zealand, at Bishop's Court. She left on Oct. 11th to fulfill her lecturing engagements in the southern districts of the colony, and was accompanied by Mrs. Draffin.—[W.]

SUPPORT OF THE T. S.

I have received several encouraging letters since last report, and prospects seem brighter than at any time since the organization of our classes. If every F.T.S. will make it a personal duty to secure at least one new pledger our fund will soon be doubled. Since last report I have added the following:

H.C. and S.E.F.—10 c. per month.

G.T. and E.V.B.—25 c. per month.

J.D.B.—$10 per month.

Collections since last report, $72.70, remitted herewith.

I wish to specially acknowledge the receipt of $8.00 as an extra contribution from one of our pledgers who wishes to be known simply as "King's County". Shall endeavor to make full report of condition of fund to date next month. G.E.H.

51 Huffman avenue, Dayton, O., Dec. 12, 1894.

Received, Dec. 17th, 1894, from George E. Harter $72.70, collected through his scheme since remittance of Oct. 17th.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE, General Secretary.

NOTICES.

EXECUTIVE NOTICE.

THEOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, PRESIDENT'S OFFICE, }
ADYAR, OCT. 7, 1894. }

The Society is notified that Señor Dr. Alberto Das, formerly of Spain and subsequently of Buenos Aires, Republic of Argentina, South America, has been expelled from membership; his two diplomas, the second of which he obtained under an alias, are hereby cancelled; and the charter granted him for the organization of the Luz Branch T.S., at Buenos Aires, has been rescinded, and a new charter issued to Señors D. Ferdico Fernandez, D. Alejandro Serondo, and their associates.

General Secretaries are requested to notify the above to their Branches, and conductors of the Society's journals to publish the facts for the protection of our members and the public. H. S. OLCOTT, P.T.S.

POEMS FOR THE LOTUS CIRCLE.

The Lotus Circle in New York wishes to procure good short poems to be used in the meetings after being set to music and in addition to those already printed. They request that some be sent in. No guarantee is given of accepting any; selection of those deemed most suitable will be made. Address Mrs. E. C. Mayer, 138 Fifth avenue, New York City.

THE FORUM.

January Forum will only be sent to such Branches and members-at-large as have paid dues for 1895. Those paying later will of course receive the back numbers due them, but much extra trouble to this office, as also risk of confusion and delay, are occasioned by tardy payment.

Thou, O disciple, in thy work for thy brothers hast many allies—in the winds, in the air, in all the voices of the silent shore.—Farewell Book.

III.

THE following letter was written before the foundation of the Theosophical Society. A somewhat inaccurate translation appeared in Mr. Sinnett's Incidents in the Life of Madame Blavatsky, but as some additions were made to the original it is interesting to see what was actually written by H.P.B. at such an early date.

“The more I see of spiritist séances in this cradle and hotbed of Spiritism and mediums, the more clearly I see how dangerous they are for humanity. Poets speak of a thin partition between the two worlds. There is no partition whatever. Blind people have imagined obstacles of this kind because coarse organs of hearing, sight, and feeling do not allow the majority of people to penetrate the difference of being. Besides, Mother-Nature has done well in endowing us with coarse senses, for otherwise the individuality and personality of man would become impossible, because the dead would be continually mixing with the living, and the living would assimilate themselves with the dead. It would not be so bad if there were around us only spirits of the same kind as ourselves, the half-spiritual refuse of mortals who died without having reconciled themselves to the great necessity of death. Then we might submit to the inevitable. One way or another, we cannot help identifying ourselves physically and in a perfectly unconscious way with the dead, absorbing the constituent atoms of what lived before us: with every breath we inhale them, and breathe out that which nourishes the formless creatures, elementals floating in the air in the expectation of being transformed into living beings. This is not only a physical process, but partly a moral one. We assimilate those who preceded us, gradually absorbing their brain-molecules and exchanging mental auras—which means thoughts, desires, and tendencies. This is an interchange common to the entire human race and to all that lives. A natural process, an outcome of the laws of the economy of nature. . . . It explains similarities, external and moral. . . . But there exists another absolute law, which manifests itself periodically and sporadically: this is a law, as it were, of artificial and compulsory assimilation. During epidemics of this kind the kingdom of the dead invades the region of the living, though fortunately this kind of refuse are bound by the ties of their former surroundings. And so, when evoked by mediums, they cannot break through the limits and boundaries in which they acted and lived. . . . And the wider the doors are opened to them the further the necromantic epidemic is spread; the more unanimous the mediums and the spiritists in spreading the magnetic fluid of their evocations, the more power and vitality are acquired by the glamour.”

Madame Jelihovsky says that “Helena Petrovna described many séances in terms of horror in consequence of the sights she was enabled to see as a result of her clairvoyance. She saw details hidden from the others present: perfect invasions of hosts of soulless remains of mortals, ‘woven of fleshly passions, of evil thoughts, of vicious feelings which had outlived the body’”. And H. P. B. wrote:

“It stands to reason that this mere earthly refuse, irresistibly drawn to the earth, cannot follow the soul and spirit—these high-est principles of man’s being. With horror and disgust I often observed how a reënimated shadow of this kind separated itself from the inside of the medium; how, separating itself from his astral body and clad in someone else’s vesture, it pretended to be someone's relation, causing the person to go into ecstasies and making people open wide their hearts and their embraces to these shadows whom they sincerely believed to be their dear fathers and brothers, resuscitated to convince them of life eternal, as well as to see them. . . . Oh, if they only knew the truth, if they only believed! If they saw, as I have often seen, a monstrous, bodiless creature seizing hold of someone present at these spiritistic sorceries! It wraps the man as if with a black shroud, and slowly disappears in him as if drawn into his body by each of his living pores."

In the year 1878, or thereabouts, a defence of modern Spiritualism was brought out by Alfred Russell Wallace. This greatly pleased H.P.B., who wrote on the subject to her sister:

"See how cleverly he proves how mistaken people are who say that we propagate ancient prejudices and superstitions; how he proves that a body of people who preach the study of man's nature, who teach the acquirement of eternal bliss as a consequence of attaining the full perfection of their moral and spiritual powers, is the chiefest enemy, not only of gross materialism, but also of all kinds of silly bigotry and myth-worship. Spiritualism is an experimental science; its development—which is the object of the Theosophical Society<sup>1</sup>—will make it possible to find a foundation for a true philosophy. There is only one truth, and it is higher than anything else. Theosophy is bound to destroy such meaningless expressions as 'a miracle' or the 'supernatural'. In nature everything is natural, but everything is not known; and yet there is nothing more miraculous than her powers, hidden as well as revealed. Spiritualism, meaning the spiritual powers of man and the deeper knowledge of the psychical aspects of life, which we Theosophists preach, will cure the old evils of religious quarrels, owing to which the faith of man in the primitive truths of immortality and repayment according to deserts is disappearing. Wallace speaks the truth when he says that Spiritualism well deserves the sympathy of moralists, philosophers, even of politicians and of everyone who desires the perfecting of our society and our life."

H.P.B. did not spare herself when portraying the humorous side of her surroundings. The American Phrenological Society wrote and asked for her portrait and for a cast of her head, and <sup>1</sup> At this time a wide distinction was drawn between "Spiritualism" and "Spiritism". It will be seen from H.P.B.'s own definition that she was not speaking of "Spookology" as the object of the Theosophical Society.

Professor Buchanan, the phrenologist and psychometer, called on her for an interview. She describes the incident in writing to Madame Jelihovsky:

“And so this poor victim (victim in view of his awful task) was sent to me—a phrenological occultist, who came in the company of a huge bouquet (as if I were a prima donna!) and with three trunk-loads of compliments. He fingered my head and fingered it again; he turned it on one side and then on the other. He snorted over me—snorted like a steam-engine, until we both began to sweat. And at last he spat in disgust. ‘Do you call this a head?’, he says; ‘It’s no head at all, but a ball of contradictions.’ ‘On this head’, he says, ‘there is an endless war of most conflicting bumps; all Turks and Montenegrins.’ I can’t make anything of this chaos of impossibilities and confusion of Babel. Here, for instance’, he says, poking my skull with his finger, ‘is a bump of the most ardent faith and power of belief, and here, side by side with it, the bump of scepticism, pessimism, and incredulity, proudly swelling itself. And now, if you please, here is the bump of sincerity for you, walking hand in hand with the bump of hypocrisy and cunning. The bump of domesticity and love for your country boxes the ears of the bump of wandering and love of change. And do you mean to say you take this to be a respectable head?’ he asked. He seized himself by the hair, and in his despair pulled a considerable lock from his own respectable head, answering to the highest standards of phrenology. . . . But all the same he described, drew, and published my poor head for the amusement of the hundred thousand subscribers to the Phrenological Journal. Alas, alas, ‘heavy is the crown of Monomach!’<sup>1</sup> The aureola of my own greatness, acquired so undeservedly, is simply crushing me. Here, I send you a copy of my poor head, which you are requested to swallow without any sauce. A hundred thousand Yankees are going to feast upon it, and so I am certainly going to save a bit for my own blood!”

“Now listen to this, little brothers”, she writes in her next letter, “I am sending you a great curio. Examine it, wonder at it, and improve by it. The Freemasons of England, whose Grand-Master is the Prince of Wales, have sent me a diploma, which means to say that I am raised to a high Masonic dignity, and so my title is ‘Mysterious Freemason’. Ah me! next I shall probably be elected Pope of Rome for my virtues. The decoration they sent me is very beautiful: a ruby cross and a rose. I send you the cutting from the Masonic Journal."

Many honors were showered upon H.P.B. as a result of the publication of Isis Unveiled. A very ancient Society in Benares, founded before the beginning of the Christian era, called the Sat-Bai, sent her a diploma in Sanskrit, decorated with many symbols. It is remarkable that in this diploma Helena Petrovna is alluded to as a "Brother of the female sex". "Henceforward our brother Rad is entitled, owing to his great knowledge, to power over the inferior grades of ministers, couriers, listeners, scribes, and the dumb ones." H.P.B. also received a very ancient copy of the Bhagavad-Gītā, in a mother-of-pearl and gold binding, from an Indian Prince. At the approach of the Russo-Turkish war of 1877-1878, H.P.B. wrote many articles against the Roman Catholics, because the Pope had blessed the weapons of the Turks. These articles she signed "A Russian Woman". They created such a stir that Cardinal McCloskey sent his Jesuit secretary to her, under the pretext of making the acquaintance of "such a remarkable woman, and pioneer thinker, who knew how to shake off the prejudice of patriotism and to create for herself an independent position in an independent country". In February, 1877, she wrote to her sister:

"I told him his endeavors were in vain; that whatever I personally, as a Theosophist, might believe was no business of his at all; that the faith of my Russian fathers was sacred to me; that I shall always stand up for this faith and for Russia, and shall always write against the attacks of the hypocritical Catholics upon them as long as my hand can hold a pen, and without letting myself be frightened by the threats of their Pope or the wrath of their Roman Church, the Great Beast of the Apocalypse!"

The result of this visit was a new article by her against the head of the Western Christian Church, who blessed Musselmans that they might the better kill Christians, Slavs, and Russians. Soon after this move Mme. Jelihovsky received newspaper cuttings containing the report of H.P.B.'s real fight—but this time not with an ecclesiastic, but with a propagator of materialistic views, of European renown. She writes to her sister in her usual humorous way:

"I send you, friends, one more article of mine, which received by no means small honors here and was reprinted by several New York papers. This is the way it happened: the London scientist Huxley has been visiting here, 'the progenitor of protoplasm and high-priest of psychophobia', as I have surnamed him. He delivered three lectures. At the first, he made short work of Moses and abolished the whole of the Old Testament, declaring to the public that man is nothing but the great-grandson of a frog of the Silurian period. At the second he 'beat everyone', like a new Kit Kitich.<sup>1</sup> 'You are all fools', he says, 'you don't understand anything. . . . Here is the four-toed foot of Hipparion, the antediluvian horse, for you, from which it is evident that we, five-toed men, are closely related to it as well, through our origin.' There is an insult for you! But at the third lecture our wise psychophob tried to sing it altogether too high, and so started telling fibs. 'Listen to me', he says, 'I have looked into the telescopes, I have whistled under the clouds in balloons, I have looked out for God everywhere with great zeal; and nowhere, in spite of all my researches, did I see or meet him! Ergo—there is no God and there never was any such!' It was worth these peoples' while paying him $5,000 for three lectures of this sort of logic. 'Also', he says, 'the human soul. . . . where is it? Show it to me as I can show you the heart and the rest of the 'inwards'. Anima Muni, ether, Archos of Plato. . . . I have searched for the soul with the aid of spy-glasses and microscopes; I have observed the dying and anatomized the dead, but upon my word of honor, there is no trace of it anywhere! It is all a lie of the spiritists and the spiritualists. Don't you', he says, 'believe them.' I felt awfully sorry at all this. So sorry as even to be angry. So I thought to myself, let me go and write an article against this self-willed, self-opinionated Kit Kitich. And what do you think? I have written it. And it came out not at all so bad, as you can see by the enclosed copy. Needless to say, I immediately took this article, sealed it, and sent it through our corresponding members to London, to be delivered to Huxley with my most earnest compliments."

H. P. B. was compelled for various reasons to become an American citizen. This troubled her considerably, as, like all Russians, she was passionately devoted to her country. She wrote to Madame Fadeef:

<sup>1</sup> Kit Kitich, or in Academic Russian Tit Titich, is a stage character whose favorite saying is: "Who can beat Kit Kitich when Kit Kitich will beat everyone first?" He has long become the synonym of a bully, a petty, self-willed, domestic tyrant. The popular Russian dialect quite unconsciously transforms "Titus, the son of Titus" (Tit Titich) into "the Whale, the son of the Whale" ("Kit" means "whale" in Russian); and H. P. B. used this unconscious pun to make fun of the biological evolutionist who claimed to be, in some sense, the son of the whale, and whose doctrine she found to be "very like a whale", too. But a pun, unlike a bishop, loses by translation.

“My dearest, I write to you because otherwise I would burst with a strange feeling which is positively suffocating me. It is the 8th of July to-day, an ominous day for me, but God only knows whether the omen is good or bad. To-day it is exactly five years and one day since I came to America, and this moment I have just returned from the Supreme Court where I gave my oath of allegiance to the American Republic and Constitution. Now for a whole hour I have been a citizen with equal rights to the President himself. So far so good: the workings of my original destiny have forced me into this naturalization, but to my utter astonishment and disgust I was compelled to repeat publicly after the judge, like a mere parrot, the following tirade: that I ‘would renounce for ever and even to my death every kind of submission and obedience to the emperor of Russia; that I would renounce all obedience to the powers established by him and the government of Russia, and that I would accept the duty to defend, love, and serve the Constitution of the United States alone. So help me God in whom I believe!’ I was awfully scared when pronouncing this blackguardly recantation of Russia and the emperor. And so I am not only an apostate to our beloved Russian Church, but a political renegade. A nice scrape to get into, but how am I to manage to no longer love Russia or respect the emperor? It is easier to say a thing than to act accordingly.”

TESTIMONY AS TO MAHATMAS.

THE name Mahâtma in these articles is intended to embrace also Masters, Brothers of the Lodge, Initiates, and the like. The word testimony embraces all statements and proofs intended to bring out and constitute evidence of fact. All persons who have testimony on this subject are invited to send it to the PATH, where it will appear either in full or condensed. I should be informed in each case whether or not names may be used. If not to be used, an initial will precede the published statement.

W. Q. J.

1. The Vedas, admittedly among the oldest of religious books, if not in fact the oldest, contain the word Mahâtma, which means “great soul”. The Bhagavad-Gîtâ says that “such a one [a Mahâtma] is difficult to find”.

2. From H.P.B. Her assertions to her relatives many years ago that she knew such wonderful beings; later, similar assertions and objective proofs to her American friends, then to her English and Indian friends; her statement and that of Masters themselves in writing that they had assisted her in most of the book Secret Doctrine. This message was received by Dr. Hübbe-Schleiden of Germany, and has been reprinted in the PATH. With H.P.B. begins the testimony for the Western world in this age, and she began a revival in India of the belief in the actual present existence of Mahâtmâs, as to whom a general belief had always existed there.

3. Col. H. S. Olcott has asserted continuously, in private and public, in all parts of the world by speech and writing, that he has had personal objective and introspective proof of the existence of not only the one Master so much spoken of, but also of K.H. and others. He declared very often most unequivocally that he had met the Masters. In the London Convention of 1894 he made the same statement in public on the platform. He writes publicly that Isis Unveiled was worked upon in New York by more than one of the Masters; he gives testimony as to having received a turban from one of the Masters; he further mentions that many of the Masters came to New York when he met and worked with H.P.B., and that he conversed with some of them.

4. Damodar K. Mavalankar, a Hindû who joined the Society soon after H.P.B. went to India and worked for it unselfishly for seven years, has often declared that he knew personally of the existence of the Masters spoken of in Theosophical literature.

5. Mohini M. Chatterji, another Hindû, often stated prior to 1884 that he knew of the existence of said Masters personally.

6. Mr. A. P. Sinnett, President of the London Lodge T.S. and author of Esoteric Buddhism, says that that book was made up from letters from the said Masters, and in that book and The Occult World he gives certain particulars on the subject, testifying to the same point. He has always asserted his belief in their existence on personal knowledge as well as on argument and testimony.

7. William Q. Judge has given testimony for many years to the same effect; to wit, that he knows personally of the existence of the said Masters, as well as of others, and also that he knows a great many persons, and has for many years, who personally know independently of himself the same fact.

8. R., an American, testifies to having known, before hearing of the Theosophical Society, the Master whose picture is known to several members, and that many years' help from the same Master has given complete proof of his existence and the possibility of the existence of any others.

9. The Christian Bible describes in many instances saints and sages who appear to stand in the same position as a Mahâtmâ. The mysterious character who appeared in the Bible once for the purpose of blessing Abraham, "the friend of God", was named Melchizedek and was probably a Master.

10. The Countess Wachtmeister has repeatedly declared that she has seen in the astral light at Theosophical meetings and at other places, and very often near H.P.B., the figure of the Master as described by many other persons and as pictured, and that she has received, independently of H.P.B., in circumstances where fraud or trick would be impossible, messages from said Master.

11. D., a member of the American Section, says that in early youth, in a vivid dream, a being came and offered comforting remarks on the subject of predestination which then was oppressing D.'s mind. The face of the being was deeply impressed on the memory. After joining the T.S., D. one day was shown the Master's picture, and was amazed beyond measure to see that it was the likeness of the being who in youth, many years before, had come in the dream.

12. W.D. says that for a long time he wished to have introspective proof of the existence of the Masters, believing in the possibility of such existing. He became deeply involved in business, and was engaged in his work in a sparsely inhabited place. While writing on business he became conscious that some one appeared to be standing near him, and then he saw it was the Master, either present astrally or in thought-picture. This aroused the surety within of their actual present existence.

13. T.P.T., an American, says that during almost the whole of life, for many years, a being, identical with the picture of the Master, has been continually helping in spiritual development, insisting on altruistic work and guarding against falling into personalities. "He is glorious in appearance, majesty, power, and kindness; he is human, yet far beyond us: he has directed me to the Theosophical Society; I am as sure of his existence as I am of any fact in my entire life. He not only directed me to the T.S., but also told me to join it; he has identified himself to me as H.P.B.'s Master; he watches the T.S. I know as surely as I know anything."

HAVE FAITH.

WHEN the truths of Theosophy first dawn upon the student, shedding new light on the meaning of life and of death, on the mystic word "Brotherhood" and all that it may convey, on the origin of evil, on the meaning and use of suffering and pain, a new impetus is given to effort, and for a while, perchance, it seems very easy to live the life of an ascetic. Personal griefs and losses! O how little do they count, we say to ourselves. How can people, on perceiving the first gleam of the light of truth, allow themselves to remain longer prisoners in the dungeons of selfishness, of ambition, of jealousy, and of wrath? How easy it is to snap the chains of conventionality and to march forth into the sunlight of peace and knowledge, never more to be drawn backward into the darkness of this illusionary world! These and kindred thoughts pass through the mind of the enthusiastic student, who would fain enter the realm of practical occultism, to whom the path now looks so easy, so comfortable, so delightful. Away with unkind sentiments towards our brothers and sisters; away with desires for material advancement; away with selfish griefs and care for the world's opinions! How easy it now seems to work for the great orphan Humanity, towards whom our hearts leap forth in sympathy!

And so for a time we are at peace with ourselves and the world. We feel our lives pledged to devoted work for others; we think it possible that, unknown though it be to ourselves as yet, we may already be accepted chelas to some high teacher. We breathe the air of spiritual purity, while we feel we have brushed from us forever the dust of material and personal interests. We think much about the Masters, those lofty souls pledged to self-sacrifice, and we feel very near them,—as, indeed, we may be for the time being.

Days pass by in this condition with nothing to disturb the harmony, and we, though still weak, believe we are strong. Alas! a time comes when some new temptation assails us, an unlooked-for foe appears, and lo! whither has all our seeming strength departed? Where are all our stern resolves? Whence, indeed, has fled that boasted peace of mind, which we fondly thought that naught could ruffle? We had been resting in such strong faith in our Elder Brothers, and our intuition had assured us of their Radiant Presence; and in the recognition of such a Presence it had seemed impossible to be disturbed and troubled by earthly concerns. Why, then, this weakness? How could it be possible to succumb anew and so strongly to the "sense of separateness"?

Such, indeed, was the experience of one who was very young as yet in knowledge and understanding of herself. At first, wildly enthusiastic to embrace the new life of the spirit which opened before her in its possibilities, she thought to make a sudden leap from olden habits and desires, loves and hopes and jealousies, straight forward into a life of self-forgetfulness. And falling, she was very sad, very sore and bruised. She was discouraged, alas, as well, and wondered that she ever could have hoped and believed that conquest of her lower nature could be easily compassed.

Fainting and weary, she had a vision. Before her stretched a rugged mountain, reaching far, far up into the mountain, and a path led up the mountain, aye, to the very top; but so steep it was, so sharp the ascent, that she, a pilgrim on the way, was overcome by dizziness when but a few steps had been taken upward. Exhausted, she sank upon the ground. But looking up, she beheld two Brothers of the race, tall and grand-looking men, loving and tender of mien. They were standing in the pathway above her, reaching downward a helping hand to herself, just started on that difficult journey which leads to knowledge and to freedom. They saw her fall, those Elder Brothers, and they realized that as yet her strength was not equal to climbing that rugged, steep ascent. She must rise, but a longer, slower way must be followed by her because of her great weakness. Should they leave her to take that journey alone, her whose store of energy must not be drawn upon too exhaustively, whose weakness would not allow her to mount rapidly? No, indeed, no! They turned their way downward towards her, and with a tender, pitying smile led her aside into another path hidden among the bushes and the trees, and rising more gradually and slowly upward. The way was dark, it is true, save for their Radiant Presence, the light of freedom was hidden from view in many places, and yet flashes of it illumined the path at intervals. It was restful to the poor, weak soul who had once hoped and trusted in her strength to rise more rapidly. It was comforting to know that her Guardians, the Guardians of the Race, were not impatient, but were still watching and helping, never wearying in their care and tenderness, even though the journey must be slow because of her great weakness. And she kept her eyes turned toward them and she had faith.

CONVERSATIONS ON OCCULTISM.

STUDENT:—At a former time you spoke of entities that crowd the spaces about us. Are these all unconscious or otherwise?

Sage.—They are not all unconscious. First, there are the humdrum masses of elementals that move like nerve-currents with every motion of man, beast, or natural elements. Next are classes of those which have a peculiar power and consciousness of their own and not easily reached by any man. Then come the shades of the dead, whether mere floating shells, or animated elementals, or infused with galvanic and extraordinary action by the Brothers of the Shadow. Last, the Brothers of the Shadow, devoid of physical bodies save in rare cases, bad souls living long in that realm and working according to their nature for no other end than evil until they are finally annihilated—they are the lost souls of Kâma Lôka as distinguished from the “animated corpses” devoid of souls which live and move among men. These Black entities are the Dugpas, the Black Magicians.

Student.—Have they anything to do with the shocks, knocks, bad influences, disintegration of soft material accompanied by noises more or less distinct?

Sage.—Yes, they have. Not always, of course. But where they are actually seen at the time preceding such occurrence, they are the agents.

Student.—Then I am to suppose that if such takes place with me I am the attracting person, the unfortunate channel through which they have come?

Sage.—No, you are thoroughly in error there. You are not such channel in that case. You are in fact the opposite, and the very cause for the temporary defeat of that dark entity. You have mistaken the appearance, the outer manipulation of forces, for the thing itself. If you were their channel, their agent, the cause for their coming and thus making their presence possible, there would be no noise and no explosion. They would then act in and through you for the hurt of others, silently and insidiously. They approach your sphere and attempt to make entry. The strength of your character, of your aspiration, of your life, throws them off, and they are obliged, like rain-clouds, to discharge themselves. The more strong they are, the louder will be their retreating manifestation. For the time they are temporarily destroyed or, rather, put outside the combat, and, like a war vessel, have to retire for repairs. In their case this consists in accumulating force for a new attack, there or elsewhere.

Student.—If, then, such loud explosions, with pulverization of wall-plaster and the like, take place, and such an evil entity is seen astrally, it follows that the person near whom it all occurred—if identification due to solitude is possible—was in fact the person who, by reason of inner power and opposition to the evil entity, became the cause for its bursting or temporary defeat?

Sage.—Yes, that is correct. The person is not the cause for the entity's approach, nor its friend, but is the safeguard in fact for those who otherwise would be insidiously affected. Uninformed students are likely to argue the other way, but that will be due to want of correct knowledge. I will describe to you condensedly an actual case. Sitting at rest on a seat, eyes closed, I saw approach one of those evil entities along the astral currents, and looking as a man. His hands like claws reached out to affect me; on his face was a devilish expression. Full of force he moved quickly up. But as I looked at him the confidence I felt and the protection about me acted as an intense shock to him, and he appeared to burst from within, to stagger, fall to pieces, and then disappeared. Just as the disintegration began, a loud noise was caused by the sudden discharge of astral electricity, causing reactions that immediately transmitted themselves into the objects in the room, until, reaching the limit of tension, they created a noise. This is just the phenomenon of thunder, which accompanies discharges in the clouds and is followed by equilibrium.

Student.—Can I carry this explanation into every objective phenomenon, say, then, of spiritualistic rappings?

Sage.—No, not to every case. It holds with many, but specially relates to the conscious entities I was speaking of. Very often the small taps and raps one hears are produced under the law referred to, but without the presence of such an entity. These are the final dissipations of collected energy. That does not always argue a present extraneous and conscious entity. But in so far as these taps are the conclusion of an operation, that is, the thunder from one astral cloud to another, they are dissipations of accumulated force. With this distinction in mind you should not be confused.

Student.—Have not colors a good deal to do with this matter?

Sage.—Yes; but just now we will not go into the question of color except to say that the evil entities referred to often assume a garb of good color, but are not able to hide the darkness that belongs to their nature.

STEPPING-STONES.

IT would seem by the way in which many members regard the working of the T.S. that the old traditions concerning esoteric wisdom and the method by which it is taught are but lightly regarded. There is a great difference between learning and wisdom, and a little reflection on that fact would be of use to many. The Theosophical movement was intended to give men Wisdom more than anything else, and the methods which it adopts in thus training its members are those which have held good in the East and in all Occult Brotherhoods from time immemorial. The peculiar and particular difference between the method of instruction employed in Occult bodies and that of our western colleges lies mainly in that the one, while apparently saying very little, seeks to develop the intuitions, and the other, while saying a great deal, merely supplies the brain with facts. The former deals in generalities, the latter in particulars. Mr. Sinnett rightly said in his Esoteric Buddhism that the traditional methods of teaching in the East aimed at impressing every fresh idea on the memory by provoking the perplexity it at last relieved. This perplexity arises from an absence of a certain power in the Ego of the student to perceive the greater laws of Nature. But by dwelling on the thought that the Master puts forward, in time the student comes to develop that power and thereby to recognize a new fact in Nature. Madame Blavatsky's Secret Doctrine was written in that way, and it will always perplex students until they have reached to the development of the author of that book. She has been criticized for her want of order, and sometimes for the absence of such statements as would lead the brain-development forward by orderly processes, but she did not seek to develop the reflective powers, but rather to awaken the perceptive ones.

Now we should remember, and always hold to in our endeavor to help the world, the occult and traditional method of teaching. In our Branches we should be sure that we are conducting them on this basis. The writer knows some persons who try to turn their Branches into clubs or literary associations, merely placing them on the level of any other like club. Then, again, he knows of others who try to turn them into semi-religious institutions, but in both of these cases there is a distinct falling away from the original lines, and we must examine ourselves very carefully to see what is the proper thing to do in the management of Branches and in public meetings in order that we may awaken the spiritual insight of anyone in the outside world.

Now there is one very simple matter by which we can know how to act, and that is by noting carefully in our minds those things which have helped us and developed us, and those things which have, on the other hand, held us back. The use of these things will undoubtedly have a similar effect upon the generality of other persons and we should remember this. If we want to help others we should bring forward the ideas that have aided us. It does not matter if we ourselves have now gone far beyond them: they were stepping-stones to us at one time and would be helps now to other persons if rightly employed. It is not difficult to find members amongst us who are throwing aside a great many conceptions as materialistic now, that were aids to them once. The simple statement, for example, of reïncarnation: that the soul is an intelligence which passes on from life to life, entering new physical bodies and coming back to the race again and again; is regarded now by many as a very crude and even materialistic statement of the truth of the matter. Yet it was a very new idea to them but a few years ago, and, moreover, they would never have advanced to their present high development had not Reïncarnation been presented to them then in that very crude and materialistic manner. Therefore, what they should do now, when speaking to others below them, is to waive aside the immense knowledge they have gained and be content to present matters in a simple and clear light to those who know less than they.

If we enquire into the reason as to why it is that many desire to present such a vast amount of information in their essays and papers at a Branch meeting or before the public, or to become very metaphysical and discourse on the Absolute and Be-ness and the like, we should see that it arises really from a subtle form of egotism. They wish to show how much they know, and it does not mean simply that they wish to show how much book-learning they have, but often how much spiritual enlightenment they possess; this latter making it very difficult for them to find any egotism in what they do. To present a spiritual truth in a materialistic manner, and without referring to "spirit and matter", and "good and evil", or Sanskrit terms, would seem to them almost profane. Why? Because they know better, they have passed beyond all materialistic thought! But nevertheless they should remember that there are many others who have not yet reached this pinnacle of enlightenment, and their object in getting up to speak should be, if they are Theosophists at all, not to show how much they know, but really to help. Egotism springs from a want of sympathy with the race, and if one who speaks or writes or even converses with a fellow-student or one who knows nothing of Theosophy does so merely with the idea of impressing him with the amount of his own information he cannot help him in the slightest degree. True sympathy is a desire to help another, and this again is the root of one's own possible advancement. Egotism is a desire to get as much praise as possible from others, and it therefore closes up and destroys the nature of him who possesses it.

Always there is this difference between the egotist and the sympathetic helper of man. The one desires to tell how much he knows; the other seeks to aid men in knowing as much as he. The former tries to surprise with the amount of his learning and even spiritual wisdom, the latter always seeks to give his fellow-men instruction as to how to obtain that information and spiritual wisdom.

So, then, if we are going to develop teachers and helpers for the race, we must instruct others by picking out those things that have aided us from the mass of Theosophical literature that is given to the world, and speak of them in the simplicity in which we received them; in that way to lead others up to our own enlightenment. Many say that Madame Blavatsky made a mistake in her method of enlightening the world; yet all her "mistakes" had definite objects in them. She knew infinitely more than she said, but she did not care about saying all she knew because she was not an egotist. She desired rather to help the world than to surprise it with the profundity of her knowledge. And those persons who decry Madame Blavatsky and point to her mistakes are the very ones who but a short while past learned all that they now know of the sacred truths of life from her teachings.

Let all members, then, get rid of this egotism, and, remembering the old traditions, teach the philosophy as it was given out in the earliest T.S. days. Those things that helped you at first will help others now. It may be that in your idea that you have gone far beyond Madame Blavatsky, you have not come near to where she stood. You may have but intellectually recognized wisdom which she knew intuitively. The simple expression of the Theosophical doctrines, the teachings about Karma and Reincarnation and those about the seven principles of man and the like, in their simplest form, should be given to the public in order that they may be aided as you have been. For it is a fact that those things that aided you will undoubtedly aid others.

Again, remember also that the philosophy more than the mere ethics is what the world needs. Telling a person to "be good" instead of showing him why he should thus act, is what is being done in every church. It is not suitable to this age. Only a week ago one member overheard a visitor to a Theosophical meeting saying as he left the hall, "Universal Brotherhood! I don't know about that! Why should I not skin a man? He'd skin me if he had the chance." Showing that what the visitor wanted was not the mere telling him to become one of a body of universal brothers, but the giving to him of a philosophy which should explain the rationale thereof.

Remember, then, to place before the world and those you come in contact with the stepping-stones which have served as helps to you, and think constantly upon this rule of life:

Do not desire to tell people how much you know or how wise you are, but rather instruct them so that they also may acquire the knowledge and the wisdom for themselves.

PROJECTED HARI-KARI.

AT an epoch of crisis in any organization with high aims, there always appear promoters of remedies. Sometimes they come from without, beneficently proffering advice though never having proffered service; sometimes from within, and then the advice either has the force of previous interest demonstrated by work, or has the familiar sound of that gratuitous counsel which is so proverbial of the idle. And once in a while a member steps forth in full garb as such, solemnly asseverating his deep interest in the organization and his calm conviction that its true policy is to commit hari-kari. Its purposes have been perverted, its mission a failure; his own moral earnestness gives pain as he compares it with the turpitude around; saddened at the prevalent corruption, he must voice the truths within his soul; really there is nothing to be done but for the organization to disembowel itself and to end its career of pitiable disaster. He will not resign; his heart still clings to the Cause; let all collapse together, and then there will be hope for the race.

In The Unknown World of December 15th is an article of this nature upon the Theosophical Society. The author signs his name,<sup>1</sup> a name perhaps less known for vigorous services to the Society than for criticism of its operations and for distrust of its active workers, and he frankly sustains all previous reputation, telling us of the lamentable pretensions of the Society from the first, the utter hypocrisy of its platform, the frightful corruption and folly continually accumulating, the error and humbug and conceit inevitably generated, the impending crash brought on by duplicity and fraud. And what is the conclusion? To withdraw from a body so deceptive and vile? To discountenance all such rascality by refusing longer connection with it? To attempt a reform and rally the pure to extrude the hypocritical and the pretending? Not at all. This; to disband the Branches, have as loose a connection as possible among all mystic bodies of every name, capture from Theosophists the property they hold as such, give the coup-de-grace to the Theosophical Society, and do so under the auspices of the author as an F.T.S.!

On the moral quality of the proposition there is perhaps no need to speak, but there are some assertions as to fact which should have notice because coming from one still proclaiming membership in the Society, a membership dear to him in spite of its revolting associations and of his own hopeful purpose to end up the Society itself. Among them are these: that the Society holds Oriental doctrines and discountenances others; that the General Secretaries virtually mould the faith of the Branches and members; that the use of literature and lectures is wrong and antagonizes spontaneous thought and study; that suspicion of individual officials blasts belief in Theosophy; that the T. S. teaches the existence of Mahâtmâs and a possible connection with them; that no proof of connection with Mahâtmâs can be other than subjective; and that the present need is to abolish organization and officers and have a book-depôt and a magazine office.

Now one might combat these assertions seriatim. One might say that the disproof of the holding of doctrines by the T. S. is found in (a) the explicit language of its Constitution, (b) the absence of any such exaction from candidates for membership, (c) the unrestrained freedom of opinion and discussion in the T. S. which in fact obtains, (d) the universal opposition to any dogmatic stand, strongest in the most conspicuous workers. One might say as to the practical moulding by General Secretaries that of course their work in a Theosophical Society must necessarily pertain to Theosophical topics and efforts, and that the views of men put in office because of their capacity and record will naturally have weight with private members, just as in any other organization; but that (a) there is absolutely no evidence of any attempt to enforce or even unduly urge these views, (b) that the correspondence of their offices is adducible to show their insistence on freedom, (c) that the publications under their control (the Vahan, the Prasnottara, and the Theosophical Forum) invite and publish views divergent from the Secretaries'. One might say (a) that a Theosophical Society without Theosophical literature and speakers might as well be a Society under any other name, or, better yet, not exist at all, (b) that both writings and speeches are avowedly on the basis of individual opinion, and, if sustained by contributions from members, are so on the right of free action guaranteed by our Constitution, (c) that the T.S. literature emphasizes spontaneous thought and study, giving them larger material for use and urging that use, (d) that if Theosophists desire to spread a knowledge of the truths they have found valuable, they are really manifesting the philanthropic spirit which Theosophy inculcates. One might say that the basing recognition of truth upon the characters of individual teachers is exactly one of those forms of personality which Theosophical literature discountenances, and that the man who does not find his best proof of truth in the affirmation of his own consciousness is precisely the man least influenced by the literature put forth; also that no evidence has been thus far adduced that any considerable number of Theosophists have abandoned Theosophy because T.S. officials have been accused of wrong,—no evidence, that is, other than the assertions of this article. One might say that the statement that the T.S. teaches the existence of Masters has no support in any of its authoritative pronouncements, but exactly the contrary, and that its highest tribunal refused only last July to decide a case which might imply such teaching, the writer of the Unknown World article being a member thereof, and not voting against the refusal. One might say that the assertion that no proof of intercourse with Masters can be other than subjective denies the contrary assertion of Madame Blavatsky, Col. Olcott, and various other witnesses, and sounds rather like the à priori dictum of an uninformed person generously confident of his own powers than the evidential result of actual experience. One might say that if literature perniciously checks spontaneous thought, the establishment of a book-depôt and a magazine office would but intensify the evil, ensuring in the new system without organization and officers the very calamities which justify hari-kari to the old.

But having thus disposed of specific allegations, a reader might very well glance over the whole field and note the general conditions producing results which have thus been misrepresented by the writer. He would instantly perceive that in any Society the activities pursued must be by the more intense members and upon their lines. In the T. S. the only exacted belief, that in the doctrine of Universal Brotherhood, prompts to no special work. Members who hold that and no more do little but cherish a gracious sentiment. Those who, in addition, hold distinctively Theosophic tenets betake themselves to study and discussion. Those who, still further, are swayed by Theosophy as a regenerating influence naturally wish to extend its benefits in every direction. Not for sectarian propagandism, not as an effort to draw members into the T. S., but in order to enable all men to perceive the Laws of Life and thus to reform human existence, they endeavor to spread everywhere a knowledge of Karma and Reincarnation. They wish to persuade nobody, but they do wish to so pervade society with these facts that souls which are ready may seize them, as they did themselves. Therefore arise leaflets, pamphlets, treatises, lectures, the whole apparatus for dissemination of seed; and this is of necessity maintained by the earnest of the members, the real Theosophists. To complain that members are active is to complain that they are alive. Why should they not be alive if there is any vitality in Theosophy itself?

Furthermore, any rational activity uses for its methods that which all human experience shows most effective,—organization. If members desire the best books for study, the most profitable topics for Branch discussion, the most fruitful agencies for popular instruction, these can be most cheaply and valuably supplied through an organized experience. Hence a central office which has touch with all parts of the body falls inevitably into the work of help and suggestion and coöperation. Nobody is obliged to accept such who does not want to; why should anybody who wants it not have that privilege? Here again, to complain that the active section of the Theosophical Society does what every other united group does,—use the results of all human experience, is to complain that Theosophists are as intelligent as non-Theosophists.

And still further. F. T. S. having the constitutional right to think and speak as they please, many have concluded from evidence satisfactory to themselves that Masters exist and that They have directly instigated the formation and now directly promote the work of the Theosophical Society. These members believe that a Master has distinctly counselled, as the great Theosophic contribution to social regeneration, the most wide-spread promulgation of the doctrines of Karma and Reincarnation. To some has come conclusive proof that Masters are interested in their faithful servants and give them help and encouragement when needed. Is there any reason why a man should ignore the facts of his own experience and refuse the duties he feels incumbent, because another man has not had that experience and does not feel those duties? To complain that earnest Theosophists do not accept the test of Mahâtmic intercourse prescribed by the non-earnest, that they speak that they do know and testify that they have seen rather than what others do not know and have not seen, is virtually to insist that the dog in the manger exemplifies true Theosophic polity.

That the Theosophical Society will welcome the proposal to commit suicide will seem probable only to the most sanguine natures. Possibly the Spartan virtue of the Unknown World contributor, still delicately sensitive after all these years of exposure to the corrupting influences of the Society, still stern to impurity in every form, may over-rate the general distress and despair. It may, indeed, be that the present tempest may prove too much for the rotten craft, and that she may soon founder in the deep, one voice heard to the very last in righteous denunciation of her officers and sturdily—as one may say—defying the thought of desertion. And yet it may be that the crew, less cognizant of the moral enormities so long befouling their vessel, may bestir themselves to greater effort, may carry through the voyage in spite of hostility without and defection within, and may even make port in safety, the old officers still on deck, after having invited Jonah to commit himself to the deep.

ALEXANDER FULLERTON, F. T. S.

ON THE SCREEN OF TIME.

ONE who looks carefully at the shadow-pictures thrown upon our universal screen must observe strange figures and new combinations pointing to changes in the future. Sometimes even a Christian minister is slightly inspired, as in the case of the Rev. Parker at the Temple in London last month. Prophesying of next century, he said there will be no creeds and no need for preachers—as there is none even now. H. P. B. once made a somewhat similar forecast, though not so fixed in date. Such a change would be good.

But the American Section of the Screen is the one to look at for advance indications. Here came about—insensibly, yet most powerfully—the great Religious Parliament, which started as a mere annex to a Fair but soon grew to an enormous affair in itself. It has left traces far deeper than the commercial Fair, its shadows still move over the surface. It aroused people in distant lands, and many Orientals came here through it. They attracted more attention than any other priests, they still in part remain. One of them on the way over stopped at London to lecture, beginning by abuse of the Theosophical Society, went to Chicago and discovered that Theosophy had been drawing people's minds eastward for twenty years. The Sanyasi, the Brahmō Samajist, the Buddhist, the Brahmin, spoke at the Parliament and created more stir than all others. The meeting closed.

But while some of the Orientals departed, others remained and still go about America lecturing in public halls and private dwellings and obtaining pupils. Some get their classes for Yoga. All succeed in invading the parlors of Boston, New York, Chicago, of any town. Dull England, the Conqueror, would not thus harbor them, but they find constant welcome in lively America. And they continually write home their impressions, their successes, their hopes. All this is significant.

Although not so heralded, it is part of the great Theosophical movement. It points to the subtle current running West, joining the East. The East lies almost dead, almost paralyzed by Western materialism. The West is waking to the greatness and value of the ancient Aryan philosophy; it has the energy to appreciate and use it under new conditions; when made a part of Western thought, it will react back to the East, when an awakening will take place—it will not take place till then. This is the great secret of the Screen. There is no division of races in it. He who says that those who insist on Western destiny and point to the current flowing West are trying to make discord between the East and West, is blind when not malicious. 'Tis true the Mahâtâmâs are of no country, and just because of that they are wise, and run with the great cyclic currents so as to turn into the obstructed and befouled canals of the Orient the newly-purified water of the ancient wells. To obtain the purification they must have a free land and a free or partly-free people to work with; they can also wait while doubting or vain people dispute the question.

As the Theosophical Society represents outwardly the whole Theosophical Movement, so the Screen shows its most powerful influence in America. In India a comparatively small section of the people know of it. The masses know nothing about it. They require almost centuries to change and raise them from their superstitious state. One of the Masters—K.H.—himself a Hindû, wrote years ago that he could not stand the magnetism of his own country and had to flee after a short visit. The Rajahs care nothing for it, and mostly live in luxury, bound to the English Bank. In Europe Theosophy has some headway, but not a great deal. Almost every proposition has to be laboriously proved; psychic events are wholly doubted; those who have psychic experiences are obliged to excuse themselves; the land is still conventional. But in America the whole land rings with Theosophy. Its terms are known everywhere. Psychic facts are accepted, apologies are not needed. Ridicule arises here and there from editors, but the people think. The Masters have been freely spoken of and the perfectibility of man expounded. The whole land is asking for news of Theosophy. If for the present it be but an Athenian desire, that is an advantage, for it gains Theosophy a hearing. Verily the Screen shows the farther West to be the hope of Theosophy for both hemispheres, and those who shall sow the seeds of dissension by failing to see the real reasons and by calling any exposition of the cyclic Western wave an attempt to divide the Masters from the rest of the world, are heaping up for themselves a very heavy Karma.

DEAR JULIUS:—Che-Yew-Tsäng? There is little of interest to relate. You will remember that Lord Brougham sent news of his death to London in order to read his obituary notices before his actual decease. He wished for frank criticism. My first motive in writing under a nom-de-plume was similar to that which prompted his action: I had an article burning in mind and heart, but I wished that the subject should be worthily treated. I might write and use my own name, but I feared that my friend Mr. Mead, the editor of Lucifer, might insert it, even if indifferently written, for friendship's sake. That I did not want. So I thought I would have it taken or rejected on its own merits, and would hide the person behind the idea. Was it chance that made me take a Chinese name and write as a Chinaman? Probably not.

Once that I began to write I found an additional motive for doing so from behind a veil, as it were. Regardless of criticism or praise, I wrote what I felt and what I wanted to say. The entire anonymity (for I told no one living of my purpose) made it possible to write from an impersonal standpoint. Much is gained in that.

The first article was a success, and so many favorable things were said about it in my presence that I almost wished it had never been written! At its first most flattering reception, modesty forbade my claiming it as my own (Lost since then? Perhaps.); and besides, already I had ideas for further work, and good-bye to all impersonality if now the Chinaman's identity were revealed. From the Universal these ideas had come; why color them with a soon-to-be-forgotten name? But to one person I did reveal his identity, and because I knew that this person had seen the real author of those articles. This person, with my permission, told Mrs. Besant under a promise of secrecy who the Chinaman was: that was on October 6th, 1893. Mrs. Besant's pleasure and approval helped to satisfy me that it would be best to preserve the anonymity.

Some time later I informed Mr. Judge, who had previously written that he was sure Che-Yew-Tsang was no Oriental. He had been asked by several who the author was, and had replied that he did not know, nor did he care,—for if this writer spoke the truth, it should be accepted for what it was worth, and if what he said were judged false, what had names or persons to do with it?

And the writer's words were largely taken as true: people wrote to the Unknown, but only one correspondent was ever answered, for I feared they might tell me that which they would not have revealed to me personally. So I was silent, and only wrote to one to say that I spoke with no authority whatever. Do I deserve credit for those articles? I do not; for when I have said that "from the Universal" those thoughts had come to me, it is but a partial statement of the case. I have heard it said that there is useful teaching in those articles; others have said that they were written with unusual force. Did they not recognize that force and that teaching; did they not see the source of both? They might have felt so plain a thing. Let me put on labels, then: the force was that of William Q. Judge; the teaching I had got from his writings and from one who had been taught by him—Jasper Niemand. To him and to his "creation" is the credit due: but they do not want that credit. If those articles were helpful I am glad. But I would have it known that where the author stood when they were written, in loyalty, in trust, and in love, there this day as in all days stands—

CHE-YEW-TSANG.

LITERARY NOTES.

BHUTAS, PRETAS, AND PISACHAS, by R. Ananthakrishna Sastri, is a reprint of this well-known article from the Theosophist.—[G.]

BOOK OF THE DEAD. Price of new edition will be $6.00 after February 15th, 1895. Subscriptions for the book before that date will be filled at $5.00. Harry Steele Budd, Agent.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE VEDANTA, in its Relations to the Occidental Metaphysics, is a small pamphlet published by Mr. Tookaram Tatyā, and contains an address delivered before the Bombay Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society by Dr. Paul Deussen.—[G.]

A SKELETON OF A PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION: by Rev. Prof. M. Tokunaga of Japan, translated by Zenshiro Noguchi, is what its title indicates, a sketch of the philosophy of religion, and is interesting as the first production of the kind from a Japanese pen translated into English. The idiom is quaint.—[G.]

DR. JEROME A. ANDERSON of California sends us in Driftings in Dreamland a volume of very sweet verses. In the preface he sets a more modest value upon them than most readers will be willing to endorse. The feeling of the poems is elevated and sincere, and the versification melodious, with much felicity of expression.—[G.]

THE LEPROSY OF MIRIAM—a most unpleasant title—by Ursula N. Gestfeld, is a remarkably strong and interesting story, dealing principally with the higher mission of woman from a strictly mystical standpoint. The philosophical arguments are fairly well sustained, and the book teaches many morals, and teaches them with great power.—[G.]

COLLECTANEA HERMETICA, Vol. v, edited by Dr. W. Wynn Westcott, contains a translation of Cicero's famous Vision of Scipio, with an essay thereon by "L. O."; a translation of The Golden Verses of Pythagoras by "A. E. A."; and an interesting explanation of The Symbols of Pythagoras, by "S. A.". The editor's notes will prove of value to the student.—[G.]

THE VAHAN for December opens with some very sensible remarks on the asking and answering of questions, urging us to do both, and showing good reasons why we should. It is more often self-consciousness and a desire to shine that hold us back than true modesty, and we thereby lose much both in giving and receiving. Several questions are discussed, and we are given a pleasing list of activities.—[G.]

SPHINX for January (German) contains some biographical notes on Dr. Hartmann, "The Universe out of Nothing" by Dr. Hartmann, and a "Phrenological Examination of Paracelsus' Skull" from his monument at Salzburg, also by Dr. Hartmann, which about completes the original matter of this number. There are several translations, the chief of which is Annie Besant's N. Y. World interview. Some of the vignettes in the magazine are very pretty.—[G.]

ORIENTAL DEPARTMENT, No. 20, sends seven questions to its readers, with a request for answers. As matters once written are more easily remembered, the plan should prove valuable. The current number contains an extract from Shankara's Tattva Bodha entitled "The Self", a translation of Kena Upanishad with an illuminating commentary, and a translation from the Persian of a Mohammedan view of Jesus.—[G.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS Vol. VII, No. 12. "The Cambridge Platonists", a lecture by W. C. Ward, is a well written paper on a not very interesting subject. The author is a warm admirer of Dr. Henry More, and is himself no mean Platonist. The number ends with a reprint from the Theosophist of June, 1890, entitled "The Enthusiasm of Neophytes", by Francis Annesley. This is decidedly not a strong number.—[G.]

THEOSOPHICAL FORUM for December contains an interesting discussion on the nature and functions of the Ego, which in the various answers is clearly and satisfactorily explained, J. H. Fussell being especially lucid. The second question continues the discussion of H. P. B.'s use of "soul" and "mind", which is warmly defended, and "K. H." in the answer to the third question explains the difference between Hypnotism and Mesmerism.—[G.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, NO. VII, NO. 13, contains "Extracts from the Treatise of Synesius on Providence", translated by Thomas Taylor—an interesting and useful reprint. It is of value to note the close analogy of the ancient Greek and Egyptian teaching with that of Theosophy to-day, and students of the occult will find several hints scattered through these pages. The note on page 13 regarding the riddle of the Sphinx is full of suggestion.—[G.]

BURIED ALIVE, an examination into the occult causes of apparent death, trance, and catalepsy, by Franz Hartmann, M. D. This long-promised book is a more or less scientific treatise on premature burial, the philosophy of death, signs of death (of which an advanced state of putrefaction is said to be the only sure indication), and means to prevent being buried alive. It contains many gruesome and altogether wonderful cases of resuscitation from supposed death, and is most unpleasant reading.—[G.]

THE NORTHERN THEOSOPHIST for January. We commend the opening remarks of the Editor to all Theosophists. Should they take their stand, as he suggests, "upon a basis of common charity", we would not be shamed as at present by finding such envy, hatred, and malice in our ranks. A thoughtful and in every way excellent article entitled "Duty" is concluded, and this able little paper ends with "An Open Letter to the Society", followed by a "Declaration", which deal with the present crisis.—[G.]

ISIS AND THE MAHÂTMÂS is a handsome pamphlet issued by English friends of Mr. Judge, containing portrait, preface, Mr. Judge's letter to N. Y. Sun of December 3d (edition exhausted), several letters sent to the Westminster Gazette, a section devoted to "Comments and Criticism", and "A Final Word". The writers are often more under the sway of sentiment than of strict logic, but there are some admirable points in "The Part played by Masters in Human History". Copies may be had by remitting 20 cents to the PATH office.

DECEMBER THEOSOPHIST. "Old Diary Leaves III" describes the beginning of the Founders' acquaintance and meeting with Mr. A. P. Sinnett, a matter of momentous influence in the struggling Society; Col. Olcott's effort to induce some wealthy Parsees to organize their religious work along Theosophical lines; an incident upon which is based one of the principal scenes in Caves and Jungles; his first lecture in India. Henry Pratt begins a more or less technical article on the "Outlines of Astronomical Motion", and we are given an account of Mrs. Besant's Australian tour, with most eulogistic cuttings from the Australian press. Carl du Prel continues his masterly treatise on "Clairvoyance", and Colonel Olcott's "Mahâtmâ Quest" gives some account of the more recent meetings of travellers with so-called Mahâtmâs. The "Cuttings and Comments" are up to their usual interest, but the most entertaining thing in the number is the note on page 151.—[G.]

THE UNKNOWN WORLD for December 15th has as its important article the one by Mr. E. T. Sturdy, dealt with more particularly in the pages of this PATH. At the end of his article Mr. Sturdy holds out this seductive bait for the publishers of a struggling journal: "There is already in existence a Theosophical publishing Society which is a private enterprise, and another magazine Lucifer exists, also a private enterprise. It is thrown out as the merest suggestion that . . . an amalgamation of the various interests . . . might be arranged". The editor snaps it up in the following fashion: "The Editor invites correspondence on this important proposition made by Mr. Sturdy, and will do anything in his power to assist an organized plan along the line indicated in the above article". Italics are ours. Why, of course! How interested these outsiders are in the affairs of the Theosophical Society, in its books, depôts, and magazines!

SOPHIA is the monthly Theosophical journal of the T.S. in Spain. It was started by Brother Montoliu, and since his death is conducted by the members of the Madrid Branch at San Juan, 3 y 5, pral., dra., Madrid, Spain. Its price is twelve pesetas per year, about $2.40 American money. In the November number is begun a most charming and scholarly translation of Letters That Have Helped Me, which letters, as all our readers now know, were written by William Q. Judge at H.P.B.'s request. The December number contains, besides these, "The Tower of Babel of Modern Thought", "The Meaning and Use of Pain" by Annie Besant, "Is the Sun only a Mass Subject to Extinction by Cooling", an article by José Melián addressed "To Some Spiritualists", "The Impossibility of a Single Rule of Conduct in the World of Manifested Duality" by James M. Pryse, translated from the PATH of March, 1890, and a very fascinating story said to be by H.P.B., "From the Polar Regions", a tale of Adepts there.—[H.S.B.]

IRISH THEOSOPHIST for December. This number is of unusual interest, the special feature being extracts from the letters of William Q. Judge under the title "The World Knoweth Us Not". They seem like a continuation of the Letters That Have Helped Me, and we are grateful that the "Recipients", who have had the privilege of receiving such advice and assistance, are willing to let others share with them. Those who are continually clamoring for instruction in practical occultism will find a very valuable hint in the last paragraph, and all Theosophists would do well to consider deeply the wide charity which breathes through each extract. Jasper Niemand continues "The Letters to a Lodge", which deals this month with the neutrality of the T.S. in a forceful and clear-sighted manner, and with the same easy diction we have learned to expect from this pen. The "Mystic Night's Entertainment" contains much food for thought, and the Dublin Lodge is evidently not ceasing its activity. This magazine is so rapidly increasing in merit that members of the Society will soon find it indispensable.—[G.]

LUCIFER for December. "On the Watch Tower" accuses PATH of hero-worship of H.P.B. We can the more easily forgive the charge since the same article assures us of continued loyalty. Madame Jelihovsky's reminiscences of H.P.B. deepen in interest, while G. R. S. Mead's "The Web of Destiny" is concluded. It is up to Mr. Mead's best standard, which is saying much. In reference to our responsibilities for unwelcome thoughts the Easterns have a saying that, if we allow an evil thought to revolve in our minds three times, we partake of its nature. "Tennyson Viewed Theosophically" contains interesting suggestions on a topic which will bear considerable study and thought. So many of our great writers, particularly the poets, are full of Theosophic teaching, and it is well to find and call attention to this wherever possible. Of "The Heavenworld" so much has already been said that we can but add that this installment is quite in keeping with its predecessors. "Theosophy and Crime" is a thoughtful article on an important subject, but Mr. Basil Crump's reference to the decline of the American Indian in numbers is unfortunate, as they have been quite rapidly increasing for some years past. In "The Clash of Opinion" Lucifer publishes the views held by the different English Lodges and some individuals, upon the charges against the Vice-President. Would the founder of the Magazine have published these without comment?—[G.]

AMERICA.

ANNIE BESANT T.S., Fort Wayne, Ind., is said to have made every house in Indiana acquainted with the word "Theosophy".

SOMERVILLE T. S., Somerville, Mass, is vigorously keeping up the Sunday afternoon free lectures, greatly assisted by brethren from Boston.

ARYAN T. S. Sunday evening lectures in January were: Infidelity, Alex. Fullerton; Yugas and Chakras, Thos. E. Willson; True Asceticism, William Q. Judge; The Trinity in Man and Nature, Jos. H. Fussell.

A LARGE NUMBER of Branches of the American Section have united in presenting to the New York Headquarters a life-sized photograph of the General Secretary, neatly framed. Portraits of the other co-founders of the T.S. have long adorned the wall of the Headquarters Room, and the trio is now complete.

BROOKLYN T.S. lectures in January on Sunday evenings were: "In the Beginning", Miss K. Hillard; Paracelsus, L. W. Crippen; The Trinity in Man and Nature, Jos. H. Fussell; Character and Reincarnation, T. P. Hyatt.

YONKERS THEOSOPHICAL CENTER, Wiggins' Hall, 24 N. Broadway, Yonkers, N. Y., had Sunday evening lectures in January: 6th, The Sevenfold Man, Jos. H. Fussell; 13th, The Whole Duty of Man, H. T. Patterson; 20th, Faith, Knowledge, Opinion, Dr. E. B. Guild; 27th, Theosophic Light on Mundane Paths, J. H. Connelly.

"H. P. B." T. S. had Sunday evening lectures in January: The Attributes of the Soul, T. R. Prater; Theosophy as a Religion, Alex. Fullerton; Yugas and Chakras, T. E. Willson; Faith, Knowledge, Opinion, Dr. E. B. Guild. The Branch room is now open every Sunday afternoon for inquirers,—a promising step, and a conversazione is held on the first Saturday evening of each month.

THE ARYAN T. S. had a public entertainment by the Lotus Circle on the afternoon of December 30th. Besides vocal and instrumental music, a "Wisdom Play" was given by the children, ten characters being represented, and a special feature was a Rainbow Scene, seven very young children representing the different colors of the spectrum. There was a very full audience and no little appreciation.

THE GENERAL SECRETARY has issued a four-paged circular giving a suggested course of Theosophical reading, briefly indicating the nature of each book in it. Some other works are grouped under heads. The circular states the leading Theosophical depôts where books may be procured, and will be of value as showing beginners what to read and where to get it. The circular will be furnished upon payment of postage.

ON THE EVE of New Year's a "Watch Meeting" was held at the Aryaṇ Headquarters. After cordial social intercourse among those present, Mr. Judge read some selections from the Bhagavad-Gītā and The Voice of the Silence, made some practical remarks on the topic selected, and suggested a few moments of silence, during the passage of which the New Year was ushered in. It was a pleasant occasion and also profitable.

BLAVATSKY T. S., Washington, D. C., moved in December into its pleasant new quarters at 419 Tenth street, the hall being in an excellent location, well equipped, and capable of seating 160. The regular meetings are held on Thursday evening, and lectures have lately been given by Messrs. Lerch, Tregina, and Coffin on Sunday evenings, all well attended. The Branch has now about forty members and is exhibiting much activity.

LETTER RECORD OF 1894. In 1894 the General Secretary began to number the letters sent out from the office in regular routine. This shows that of such there were for the twelve months 2,692; but many hundreds more were sent uncopied, being replies upon questions of philosophical interest, and as the private correspondence carried on in other offices in the building ought to be counted, it is more than likely that the grand total would foot up to 5,000 for twelve months.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE AMERICAN SECTION T. S., having considered the invitations from Toronto, Minneapolis, and Boston to receive the April Convention, decided in favor of Boston by unanimous vote, considering that the opening of the new and noble Headquarters in Boston should be signalized by the meeting of the Convention there. The Boston brethren have made munificent profers of hospitality, and everything points to a large and successful gathering in April. All Branches and individual members will please take notice of the selection of place.

MRS. MERCIE M. THIRDS left Honolulu on December 8th, having completed her mission to the Hawaiian Islands. A large farewell meeting was held in the parlors of Mr. M. P. Robinson, and many of the most intelligent people of Honolulu assembled thereat. An orchestra was stationed at one corner of the lanai and a repast was served. As the visitors were leaving, the F.T.S. present gathered in the library and presented through Mr. Robinson to Mrs. Thirds a beautiful album of Island views and a cheque. Mrs. Thirds, after her long and valuable work in Honolulu, arrived in good health at San Francisco. Mrs. T. R. Foster, who has so generously aided Mrs. Thirds in this mission, has offered to pay the expense of translating our leaflets into the Hawaiian tongue.

BROOKLYN T.S. celebrated the first Monday of the New Year by a conversazione, which was largely attended. The musical entertainment was of a high order, and everybody voted the affair a great success. At the Lotus Circle, each Sunday, there is a lesson on one of the great religious teachers. Last Sunday the subject was Zoroaster, one of the younger members having been appointed the previous Sunday to tell a story to the children upon the subject for the day. The story of the sacred fire was very well told, not only holding the attention of the children, but bringing out the ideas of the young member as well. The Branch is devoting much attention to propaganda work, and a strong effort is being made to interest each member individually in some particular line of work. On New Year's Eve the Branch was presented with a beautiful photograph of Mr. Judge, which has the place of honor over the platform.

THE GENERAL SECRETARY went to Fort Wayne on the 6th of January and held private meetings with members, lecturing at Standard Hall on the 7th upon Comparisons between Theosophy and Modern Views of Life, the audience being about 350. On the 8th Mr. Judge went to Chicago and lectured on the 9th upon Spiritual Cultivation and True Asceticism to a full meeting at Headquarters. After holding other meetings and meeting members, besides lecturing at Englewood on Theosophy Generally Considered, he went on the 12th to Cincinnati for a short visit to Dr. Buck. The train was delayed by snow, but about thirty members had assembled and waited until Mr. Judge's arrival. On the 13th he lectured at the rooms on Theosophy and Theosophical Movements. On the evening of the 14th he met the members, and on the 15th lectured before the Branch on the subject of the evening, Personal, Individual, and Eternal. On the 17th Mr. Judge returned to New York.

COLUMBUS T.S. Lotus Circle on Friday evening, December 21st, 1894, gave a Christmas entertainment, which was in every way a success and reflected great credit on the young performers. It consisted of a play called "A Vision of Santa Claus", written by one of the Branch members. Ten of the little ladies and gentlemen represented the ten great nations of the earth, — India, Japan, China, Persia, Egypt, Turkey, Greece, Judea, Europe, and America, and passed in review before "Santa Claus", each one telling in a short speech the religion of the nation he represented. The play showed that India was the mother of all nations, that the same fundamental ideas underlie all religions, and that in America will be found the true Brotherhood of religions. The children were dressed in the exact costumes of the nations they represented, and carried banners suitably inscribed, forming a brilliant and striking tableau. At the close of the entertainment refreshments were served by the ladies of the Branch, and a delightful evening was spent.— (Communicated).

CLAUDE FALLS WRIGHT lectured in the Knights of Honor Hall, Dayton, O., on After-Death States on Tuesday, December 18th; on the 19th he delivered an address on Occultism in the Phillips House; on the 20th he lectured there again on Hypnotism; on the 21st he held a meeting of the Dayton Branch for reorganization. Saturday, the 22d, he left for Cincinnati. On the 23d he lectured in the Branch rooms on Theosophy and Occultism. December 27th he lectured there again on Concentration, and on Sunday he spoke on the Constitution of Man. January 3d he left for Kansas City, and on the 4th held a small meeting of members there. On the 5th he held a meeting in the Branch rooms, and on the 6th delivered a public lecture in the Medical Hall on Theology and Occultism. On the 11th he gave another public lecture on Hypnotism, and on Sunday, the 13th, he lectured on Esoteric Buddhism in the Medical Hall. On Monday, the 14th, he gave another public lecture on Is Man Immortal? On the 15th he held a private meeting for members; on the 16th and 17th two more closed meetings were held. Mr. Wright left on the 18th for Omaha.

BURCHAM HARDING'S lectures at Waterville, Me., brought together a considerable number of people who have taken up the study of the Letters and the Ocean. On December 21st he reached Bangor, lecturing in the Y.M.C.A. parlors on Reincarnation and What Happens after Death. The rooms were crowded to their fullest capacity. In the same parlors a meeting was held and two classes formed. The enthusiasm was so great that other classes will probably be required. Receptions and classes were held for several days, and the work well organized. Rockland was next visited. The lectures resulted in centers being formed, which will be cared for by Brother A. C. Mather, who for years was the sole representative of the T.S. in Maine. On January 4th the Industrial and Educational Union at Saco was addressed and a center formed. After a short visit to the Portland Branch Mr. Harding returned to Boston. The newspaper reports throughout Maine were very full. At Bangor the three daily papers each printed from one to two columns of each lecture. The formation of new centers in and around Boston is now being energetically worked. On January 18th a lecture on Reincarnation was given in the Y.M.C.A. hall at Brockton, Mass. The town of Peabody, adjoining Salem (the City of Witches), has signalized itself. The W.C.T.U. hall was engaged for lectures, but on the following day its use was withdrawn. The evangelistic superintendent considered Theosophy "not to be in keeping with their Christian principles". The Salem Gazette printed the correspondence in full, and in an editorial entitled "Religious Freedom" scored the W.C.T.U. heavily. New England seems deterred to utilize every force and turn it into the channel of propaganda work. Even if Kali Yuga brings storms and tempestuous skies, yet the force of the lightning flash, if directed, can be used to enlighten.

OBITUARY.—Miss Louise A. Off, a highly-valued member of the T.S. since 1886, long time Secretary of the Los Angeles Branch and subsequently editor of The New Californian, has departed from this incarnation. She was the pioneer of Theosophy in that part of California, and bore up under disappointment, discouragement, and failing health with persistent zeal and faith. Though the petty personal squabbles which so degrade the Theosophical ideal struggled her fine spirit, she struggled on, ever earnest and ever consecrated, a stimulus and a model to her environment. After years of work and of weakness from consumption she finally attained rest on Jan. 6th, and on the 7th her remains were cremated.

FOREIGN.

A LENDING LIBRARY of Theosophical literature has just been opened in Rome, Italy. It contains the principal books published by the T.S. in England and America, together with the monthly magazines and pamphlets, as well as those by the French, German, Spanish, Swedish, and Dutch Branches and Centers. The Library is at No. 74 Via Porta Pinciana, it is open every day except Sunday from 11 to 12. This is a new and striking illustration of the spread of Theosophy and the demand for its literature.

CLOSING OF H.P.B. PRESS. In January a telegram from Mrs. Besant and Mr. B. Keightley from India ordered that the Press be closed. This was at once done, and of course all the employees were discharged.

JAMES M. PRYSE, who went from the Aryan Press in New York, which he started with his brother John, to London where he organized the H.P.B. Press with an American outfit purchased in New York and on which Lucifer has been so beautifully printed, has passed from that station because of the closure of the plant. He may go to Dublin to help in similar work there, if started. But if there is no need for him at that spot, he may again add his talents and devotion to the staff of printers in New York.

BLAVATSKY LODGE passed some resolutions asking for Mr. Judge's resignation, and also for explanations and replies to newspaper attacks. There was a very strong protest made at the meeting. Mr. Burrows said that Theosophical principles were not to be applied to these matters! Mr. T. Green issued a circular at the door inviting those who did not agree with the action taken to unite in forming a new Lodge, ending by stating that he was sole author of the notice, presumably to prevent people from saying that Mr. Judge engineered it from the other coast of the Atlantic.

H. P. B. LODGE is a new Lodge formed in London at 62 Queen Ann street, in consequence of the foregoing. President, Dr. A. Keightley; Vice President, T. Green; Treasurer, Basil Crump; Secretary, H. T. Edge; Librarian, Miss Cuer. Some twenty persons signed for the Charter. It will meet on Mondays, weekly.

AUCKLAND, New Zealand, during the past month has shown signs of full vitality in the Cause. The following are the public meetings at which lectures were delivered or papers read: November 30, Mr. S. Stuart, a paper on Theosophy and Magic; December 7th, Mrs. Neill, a paper on Occultism and Magic; Sunday evening, December 9th, in the Choral Hall, Miss L. Edger, M. A., lectured upon Karma; December 14th, Mr. C. Ausell, a paper upon Spirit and Matter; December 21st, Mr. C. W. Sanders, a paper upon The Guru or Teacher; and on Sunday evening, December 23d, in the Choral Hall, Mr. S. Stuart lectured upon Evolution and Mind, which was followed by a keen discussion.

ENGLISH LETTER.

A new feature at Headquarters is the meeting which is now held every fortnight in the Library by Mrs. Cooper-Oakley for the convenience of members of the Blavatsky Lodge who are unable to attend its evening meetings. The numbers attending are good, and show signs of increasing.

There was also what may be called a "consultation meeting" in the Library last month, when the representatives of seven Lodges were present, as also Mr. Mead, to discuss the advisability of holding quarterly meetings for facilitating more active coöperation between metropolitan Lodges. The principal result of the meeting was the decision to call another for February, on the same lines. This all tends to promote a feeling of solidarity and oneness in the work.

Mr. Mead has been up north again since I last wrote, to Southport, Liverpool, and Manchester Lodges. Wherever he has been lately, the general impression is that the admirable and eloquent lecture on The Web of Destiny which he delivers at most of the Lodges and Centers is quite one of the best of the many good things he has given us lately.

I have now further details of Mr. Hargrove's good work in Dublin. He not only lectured at the rooms of the Dublin Lodge, but also before the Dublin Ethical and the Dublin Fabian Societies. The meetings at both the latter were full, and he succeeded in winning both earnest attention and approval, in the face of what promised to be, in one case, active opposition. Then he and the others attended a crowded meeting at the Contemporary Club one evening, when naturally the discussion drifted somehow into Theosophical channels, and was prolonged to a late, or rather, an early, hour. Mr. Hargrove has also lately visited the Clifton Lodge, and done good service to the Cause there also.

Mr. Sydney Coryn, one of our most popular lecturers, gave a free public lecture last month at the Bow Lodge on The Mahâtmas in Fiction—and in Fact. Needless to say, the subject chosen was with special reference to the late Westminster Gazette commotion; and I have good reason to believe that the writer of the articles was there in person, though he gave no sign and asked no questions.

Some of us are getting out an antidote to the Westminster Gazette pamphlet in the shape of a reprint of Mr. Judge's New York Sun "Reply", with a good deal of additional matter. Our pamphlet is divided into four parts, as follows: 1, Mr. Judge's Reply; 2, Correspondence; 3, Comments and Criticisms; 4, A Final Word. It will contain a reproduction of one of Mr. Judge's recent photographs, and is being very well gotten up, with a yellow cover.

ALICE CLEATHER.

ARYAN T.S. RESOLUTIONS.

On Tuesday evening, Jan. 15, 1895, a special meeting of the Aryan T.S. was held after the conclusion of the regular meeting, upon call by the Trustees. The President, Mr. William Q. Judge, being absent in Cincinnati, the Vice-President, Mr. Joseph H. Fussell, called the meeting to order and suggested that one of the Trustees, Mr. Alexander H. Spencer, take the chair.

The Chairman stated that since it had been ascertained that certain resolutions were passed at the Annual Convention of the Indian Section, held last month at Adyar, requesting the resignation of the Vice-President T.S. and demanding that the charges against him be reopened, it was deemed advisable by the Trustees of the Aryan Branch that official action be taken in the matter, and that owing to these aspersions upon the character of the Vice-President T.S., who is also the President of the Aryan Branch, it behooved the Branch to take proceedings.

Mr. E. A. Neresheimer offered the following resolutions, which had been previously signed by each one of the Trustees and submitted by them to the Branch as expressive of their convictions, and himself moved their adoption by the Branch:

"Whereas, in view of the request of some Branches and individuals in the European Section and elsewhere that William Q. Judge resign from the office of Vice-President of the T.S. and that the matter of the charges against him be reopened, it is

"Resolved, that this Branch requests William Q. Judge not to resign from the office of Vice-President of the T.S., it being imperative to the best interests of the Society that he shall remain in said office for the successful promulgation of Theosophy in America and generally.

"Resolved, that in the opinion of this Branch there is no necessity for the further investigation of the charges made against William Q. Judge.

"Resolved, that this Branch expresses its fullest confidence in William Q. Judge personally and as an official of the T.S., and also in his methods of work, and declares its determination to support him in his efforts therein."

After a thorough discussion the resolutions were unanimously carried and ordered to be spread upon the Minutes.

The following resolution was proffered by Mr. Joseph H. Fussell:

"Resolved, that the Trustees sign these relations on behalf of the Aryan Branch as having been unanimously passed by a called meeting of the Branch, notice of which was sent to every member; and that they be sent to all the Branches of the Theosophical Society."

Unanimously adopted.

Mr. F. L. Mathez offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, that the proceedings of this meeting be given to the general press, at the discretion of the Trustees."

Unanimously adopted.

The meeting then adjourned.

JOHN M. PRYSE, Clerk of Meeting.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT.

The General Secretary from Oct. 1st, 1894, to Jan. 1st, 1895, received from Branches and individuals the following gifts: to the General Fund $1100.29, to the Lectureship Fund $727.15.

On Jan. 1st, 1895, the Lectureship Fund contained $517.03. Very grateful appreciation is felt for these liberal offerings, especially in such stringent financial times.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE, General Secretary.

SUPPORT OF THE T.S.

During the past month I have received one new pledge, M. E. A., at 50 cents per month. I have also several promises that will mature later. Will all knowing themselves in arrears please write me, stating about when they hope to be able to resume?

G. E. H.

51 Huffman avenue, Dayton, O., Jan. 15, 1895.

Received, Jan. 16th, 1895, from George E. Harter $55.00 as his collections since remittance of Dec. 17th. 1894.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE, General Secretary.

And I shall send thee my counsel and my encouragement in letters of light.—Farewell Book.

IV.

IN a letter to Madame Jelihovsky:

“I have not written to you for a month, my well-beloved friend, and could you guess the cause of it? One beautiful Tuesday morning in April I got up as usual, and as usual sat down at my writing table to write to my Californian correspondents. Suddenly, hardly a second later, as it seemed to me, I realized that for some mysterious reason I was in my bed-room and lying on my bed; it being evening and not morning any more. Around me I saw some of our Theosophists and Doctors looking at me with the most puzzled faces, and Olcott and his sister Mrs. Mitchell—the best friend I have here, both of them pale, sour, wrinkled, as if they had just been boiled in a sauce-pan. ‘What’s the matter? What’s gone and happened?’, I asked them. Instead of answering, they heaped questions upon me: what was the matter with me? And how could I tell—nothing was the matter with me. I did not remember anything, but it certainly was strange that only the other moment it was Tuesday morning, and now they said it was Saturday evening; and as to me, these four days of unconsciousness seemed only the twinkling of an eye. There's a pretty pair of shoes! Just fancy, they all thought I was dead and were about to burn this dismantled temple of mine. But at this, Master telegraphed from Bombay to Olcott: 'Don't be afraid. She is not ill but resting. She has overworked herself. Her body wanted rest, but now she will be well.' Master was right. He knows everything, and in fact I was perfectly healthy. The only thing was I did not remember anything. I got up, stretched myself, sent them all out of the room, and sat down to write the same evening. But it is simply awful to think about the work that has accumulated. I could not give a thought to letters."

Then from India, describing her arrival:

"Olcott was exactly like Carnival Bauf Gras; Miss B. like a pole covered with convolvulus; W. like a bed of lilies and roses; and I myself probably like a huge balloon woven of flowers. I was ready either to laugh or to be angry. They placed us in a boat, and we were taken to the landing-stage amidst the sounds of music, where we ran up against a new solemnity: we were met by a band of local, half-naked dancing girls, who surrounded us chanting their mantra, and led us in state—all the time bombarding us with flowers—to a—maybe you think to a carriage? Not at all, to a white elephant! Good Lord, the effort it cost me to climb over the hands and backs of naked coolies to the top of this huge animal. It still puzzles me to know how I managed not to drop out of the 'howdah' where Olcott and I were put, especially when the elephant was rising to his feet. The others were placed in palanquins, and lo! to the accompaniment of acclamations, tamborines, horns, with all sorts of theatrical pomp, singing, and a general row, they carried us—humble slaves of God—to the house of the Ârya Somaj."

. In a letter to Madame Fadeef, dated November, 1879, H. P. B. writes:

"Would you like to get acquainted with the programme of my inevitable monthly work? If so, here you are: first to see to the accuracy of every article for the next number of the Theosophist; second, to see to the translation of from two to four articles in Sanskrit or the Indian vernaculars into English; thirdly, to personally write the leader and some other signed article; fourthly, to examine all the mystical articles to prevent Olcott and other co-workers from mixing things up and from over-salting these contributions; fifthly, to correct proofs, sometimes five times running; sixthly, to answer some three or four dozen letters addressed to the Corresponding Secretary of the Theosophical Society; seventhly, to thank people who send us books for our library from all points of the compass, and to acknowledge their receipt; eighthly, to answer a few dozen private letters; ninthly, to write two or three periodical articles for the American and Indian newspapers; tenthly, to be present at the initiation of the new members, to enter their names, and to give them their diplomas by the dozen and more; eleventh, to enter the new subscribers; twelfth, to skim through about forty magazines and newspapers; thirteenth, to receive visitors every evening—as many as the hall will hold—all kinds of Brahmans, Buddhists, Sikhs, Jains, Parsis, Mussulmans, and Europeans, who come for scientific purposes, and with whom I have to discuss philosophy and metaphysics up to eleven o'clock at night; fourteenth, and above all these I sometimes have additional work to do: for instance, to post six hundred and fifty invitation cards—one of which I send to you, as you are one of our members—for a great ceremony which is to be held to-morrow evening, the 29th of November, in honor of the fifth anniversary of the Society (1879), of the opening of our library and the publishing of our magazine the Theosophist. You can easily imagine the pleasure of getting oneself up 'regardless' in this heat; of hanging oneself over with every kind of medal, sign, and the ribbons of different Societies, and to smile at six hundred and fifty naked, half-naked, muslin-clad and evening-dressed Brother-Theosophists. Thank God I am going away at the beginning of December to Allahabad, with a deputation of Rao-Bahadurs, which means 'Great Warriors'. I am going there with a double object, first to see Swami Dayanand, second, to get acquainted with the wife of the Resident. I have promised the Sinnetts to spend some time with them. A prospect of calls, dinners, and balls in 'high life'. My hair stands on end at the very thought of it, but it must be done. I have warned Mrs. Sinnett that I, though not a Russian spy but an American citizen, will not listen to a single word of disrespect to Russia or to our Emperor. Just let them try, and how I will abuse their England! So let them be warned."

H. P. B.'s position as an exponent of true mysticism was recognized in India. Lord Lytton, the Governor General and the son of the author of Zanoni, said of her: "I know only of one author who can hold her own in mystical literature with my father. It is H. P. Blavatsky. She can well stand comparison with the author of Zanoni in her comprehension of abstract metaphysics." The remark was reported in the Indian newspapers, and H. P. B. wrote to her sister:

"And so now I have become the lion of the day. I am proclaimed to be a deep orientalist, a friend of science, a herald of truth which has been enslaved by centuries of prejudice. Read the newspaper cuttings which I send to you, and glory in your relation being glorified by the nations!"

In another letter:

"From Simla I wrote an article for the Novoe Vremya, 'The Truth about the Nephew of Nana Sahib'. I have gathered the most elaborate information about this scamp. Golos constantly prints letters written by this liar, as if to incite England to make war on Russia. And Novoe Vremya disdained to print my note. For what reason? Besides being true, it is written as a free contribution. One would think they might have believed in the good intention of a countrywoman of theirs, of a Russian who is at the very source of the information about this self-proclaimed and false ally of Russia—this Prince Ramchandra. His biography—perfectly false—has appeared in the June number of the Russian Herald, 1889. And his letters from Bagdad and Cabul, printed in Golos, amuse and needlessly irritate everyone here who knows the truth of the matter.' . . . Whilst in Simla Olcott and Sinnett, nearly dragging me by force, made me visit Sir A. Lyall, Chief-Secretary for Foreign Affairs; also dine with the Viceroy, and in fact go to all kinds of aristocratic gatherings; and everywhere I had to quarrel so much for Russia's sake that I got a sore throat and am sick of them all! And yet our papers wont print my articles!"

In spite of the lack of courtesy on the part of the Russian newspapers in regard to herself, H. P. B. always subscribed to many Russian magazines and papers, and having no time to read these during the day, she robbed herself of sleep during the short five or six hours of her nightly rest, in order to know what was going on in her own country. The arrival of one of these newspapers gave rise to the following psychometric experience in the autumn of 1880. Writing to Madame Fadeef, H.P.B. expressed her gratitude for a parcel of newspapers she had sent her:

“And what an interesting thing happened to me not long since. I received your bundle of Novoe Vremyas and went to bed a little after ten (you know I get up at five). Having taken up one of the newspapers, without choosing, just the nearest one, I stretched myself and went deep into thought about a certain Sanskrit book which I thought would help me to make good fun of Max Müller in my magazine. So you see it was by no means about you that I was thinking. And the newspaper lay all the time behind my head on the pillow, partly covering my forehead. When all of a sudden I felt myself transported into some strange and yet familiar house. The room I saw was new to me, but the table in the middle of it an old acquaintance. And there, sitting at the table, I saw you—you, my darling comrade, sitting smoking your cigarette and deeply thinking. The supper was laid on the table, but there was no one else in the room. Only it seemed to me that I caught a glimpse of Aunt going away through the door. Then you raised your hand and, taking a newspaper from the table, put it aside. I had just time to read its heading, Herald of Odessa, after which everything disappeared. To all seeming there was nothing strange in this occurrence, but here is something strange: I was perfectly sure that it was a number of the Novoe Vremya that I had taken up, and having noticed in my vision some slices of black bread beside you, I was suddenly seized with such a desire to taste some of it—even a wee crumb—that I felt its taste in my mouth. I thought to myself, What does it all mean? What can be the cause of such a fancy? And in order to get rid of a desire that could not be gratified, I unfolded the newspaper and began to read. When lo! it actually was the Herald of Odessa, and not at all the Novoe Vremya in my hands. And, moreover, crumbs of my longed-for rye-bread were sticking to it! And so these fragments on touching my forehead transmitted to my consciousness the whole scene as it probably happened at the precise moment of their sticking to the newspaper. In this case, crumbs of rye-bread have taken the place of a photographic apparatus. These dry pieces of bread gave me such intense delight, having transported me for a brief moment to you. I was quite filled with the atmosphere of home, and in my joy I licked up the biggest crumb, and as to the small ones—here they are, I have cut them out as they stuck to the paper and send them back to you. Let them return home with some of my own soul. This may be rather a silly proceeding, but perfectly sincere.”

TALKS ABOUT INDIAN BOOKS.

INTRODUCTORY.

WHEN to the sessions of sweet silent thought", as Shakespeare says, "I conjured up remembrance of things past"—as one feels in duty bound to do, on every recurrence of that no longer novel phenomenon, the ending of the year—I became aware, amongst other things, of a promise unfulfilled.

The making of the promise was after this wise. A few months back a party of visitors were gathered together in a room gaudily decorated with blue-green banners from Tibet, cherry-colored tapestries all dotted with little mirrors from the Punjab, and long strips of embroidery from Smyrna, in a dozen delicious shades. To give a flavor—a delightful flavor—of original sin to the whole gathering, and especially to the conversation and cigarettes, the hosts of the evening had considerably supplied two large placards, which hung up among the Tibetan flags and Turkish curtains. On one of these was written "Silence Room"; on the other, "Talking and smoking strictly forbidden".

Under these circumstances the gathering was bound to be a success. Three of the visitors were from the future home of the sixth race. And to one of these the promise above-mentioned, that cropped up apparition-like on New Year's eve, was made. We talked about many things; about a gruesome drum that lay there on the table, made from the skulls of a Tibetan pair that had loved not wisely but too well; about the Pauline epistles, and their translators into English, who have evidently followed not the Greek original but the Latin Vulgate; so that when Paul accuses Peter, in very plain Greek, of hypocrisy, the translators have altered the taunt into a mild one of dissembling.

Then we talked about the healthiness of cigarette-smoking, and the difficulty that one always has to find one's way through the enormous maze of Indian literature, and the lack of some kind of chart to the Vedic ocean, the clear waters of the Upanishads, the Epic torrents, and the sand-banks of the Purānas.

I suggested that, if one could get the perspective of two or three leading facts into one's mind, the fitting in of the details between them would not be a very hard matter, after all. The safest guide would be, perhaps, the old Indian tradition; even if it could not be proved exact, it is certainly venerable, and a great deal may be said in its favor from a great many points of view.

"Well", said my friend, "I have got an idea that destiny means you to write something of the sort for the PATH. I had better tell the Editor about it when I go back."

Once before, I was caught in the same way; this time by an Editor in India. We had been talking about Siberia and Turkestan and the Gobi Desert and the Pamirs, and I had suggested a theory of the advance of conquest in these lands. "Do you know", said the Editor, "I think you had better put that into a few articles, and send them to me when I go back to India." That was in 1891, and those articles are going on still. After that, it is impossible not to believe in Karma.

So I had learned to be cautious, and said to my friend that for that year—the year just ended—I was afraid such a set of talks about Indian books was impossible.

"Very well", said he; "I suppose, then, I may tell the Editor of the PATH that you will begin them with the New Year?"

Thereupon followed the promise which made itself so prominent in the sessions of sweet silent thought on New Year's Eve. A promise is a thing meant to be kept; and so this morning I begin to redeem it by an introductory Talk about Indian Books.

To begin with, one must try to get three landmarks into one's head; and, after this, the rest is not so difficult. The hither landmark is not hard to remember, the nearer boundary of Indian Books is—the present day; for Indian books, and some of them excellent in matter and in excellent Sanskrit, are being written still. Only a few days ago I read some charming Sanskrit verses written by a friend of mine, a Kshattriya; and yesterday part of a quite new commentary on one of Shankara's poems. So the hither landmark of Indian books is the present day.

The further landmark is not hard to remember either, especially for the future home of the sixth race. It is "the War"; the war, that is, between the children of Pandu and of Kuru, where Arjuna's heart failed him so, till Krishna overcame his hesitation and led him to "fight for fighting's sake". This War, and the Plain of Kurukshetra where the battle raged, have been so largely used as symbols and parables that they have begun to look rather mythological, like the storming of "the City of Man's Soul", or the "Delectable Mountains".

Yet, as far as we can possibly know, the War of the Pandus and Kurus was as strictly historical and as pregnant of social and political results as the Norman Conquest, or Cortez' Mexican Campaign; more historical, very likely, than the Indian Invasion of Alexander the Great, or the battles that brought destruction to the Hivite, the Hittite, and the blameless Perizzite.

Personally, I do not doubt that Krishna, Arjuna, and Dhritarashtra were as real and substantial as Washington, or Wellington, or Napoleon. And even the tale of Rama of the Axe is probably as authentic as another hatchet-story.

Thus the War, the Great War of the Mahābhārata, is our further landmark. For beyond this we can only vie in definiteness with the book of Genesis, and fix our landmark "In the beginning"; or, as Shakspeare says again, in a magnificent line, "In the dark backward and abysm of time".

Now, old Indian tradition is pretty clear about two things; and was clearer still until a hundred years ago, when the whole thing began to be tangled up in the interests of Archbishop Ussher's chronology.

And these two things are, the date of "the War", and its chronological position with regard to other things. The War, says Indian tradition, was fought out on the Kurukshetra plains just five thousand years ago; a date not hard to remember, and one, moreover, that the verification of certain doings among the stars, then observed and recorded, will probably demonstrate to be true.

Five thousand years ago, the "Great War"—our further landmark; one not hard to be kept in mind. And then, following Indian tradition again, we need only class the Indian books into those that date from "before the War" and those that came into being after the great fight.

All the Vedas, says Indian tradition, date from "before the War". That is the first great fact to get clearly into one's mind. How much before the War—how much older than five thousand years they are—is one of those things on which people like to speak with great caution, and, at the end of it all, to reserve their opinion.

At any rate, it was a good long time ago; how long, we may begin to feel when we come to see what an enormous cycle of literature the Vedas are. There are two or three other books that, Indian tradition suggests, must also date from "before the War". But of these, later.

One thing we must always remember. The Indian scribes had always a splendid sense of perfection, which outlived a dozen different changes of taste; they had also a splendid sense of modernity—they liked to brush away the antiquarian cobwebs from the books they copied, and bring them strictly up to date. Now, in many cases, books we have must have passed, and quite evidently have passed, through this perfecting and modernizing process; and one cannot be sure that they have not passed through it half a dozen times, under half a dozen different generations of perfecters and modernizers. So that the book, as we have it, bears about as much resemblance to its pristine form as many an eloquent paragraph to a code telegram on which it was based. Yet the paragraph is genuine very often, and so is the ancient kernel of the Indian book. But then comes the difficulty of dates. Are we to date the book according to its original kernel, or according to one or other of its later wrappings? This is a problem that will meet us in the case of two or three books outside the Vedas, which Indian tradition would like to place "before the War".

Sometimes these repeated perfectings and modernizings are betrayed by whimsical idiosyncracies in grammar; sometimes they are admitted by frank confession. An instance of both is a Life of Buddha that dates eighteen hundred, or perhaps two thousand, years ago. A little sentence at the end of it says: "This Life of Buddha, hard to get, was written out by Amritananda. Having searched for them everywhere, and not found them, four cantos have been made by me,—the fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth." Now this conscientious scribe, who was so anxious to have his Life of Buddha complete, did his work some sixty years ago, while the original poem is, as we have said, about two thousand years old. He was, indeed, very conscientious; for a correction in the manuscript shows that he originally meant to own up to three new cantos only, as the fourth was partly based on old material; yet conscience overtook him, and in the manuscript "three" is changed to "four". Perhaps a sense of certain metrical and grammatical peculiarities in his work, which would have been found out anyhow, had something to do with this frank confession.

Now frank confessions like this are pretty frequent in Indian books, but, unluckily, a great many of them were written in invisible ink, and the dates were left out. Hence chronological difficulties in no small number.

The mention of Buddha brings us to our third landmark—almost exactly half-way between the other two—about two thousand five hundred years ago. Of a great many Indian books we can say, with something like certainty, that the kernel and germ of them at least, bare of later perfectings and modernizings, is older than Buddha's birth. One of these books that must date somewhere between "the War" and Buddha, is the Great poem of the Mahābhārata, the history of the War itself.

It must date after the War which it describes, because it is unusual, except in books of prophecy, to describe events that have not yet taken place; and its germ must be older than Buddhism, for a reason simple enough, though not quite so simple.

Buddha has given us, in some of his sermons, a candid and photographic picture of the Brahmans in his day; and from these pictures we can see that the Brahmans had then pretty much the same influence and predominance they have now.

Now, in the poem of the Mahābhārata there are certain liberties, perhaps licenses, taken with Brahmanical privilege, which, even in the days of Buddha, would have been difficult, if not impossible; so that we must date the kernel of the Great Mahābhārata poem at a period a good while before the Brahminical domination of Buddha's days, and probably not long after the great War itself.

So there are the three landmarks: the present day; Buddha's mission, two milleniums and a half ago; and the War, five thousand years ago, Indian tradition says. Beyond that lie dim Vedic vistas, the dark backward and abysm of Time.

THE NEW DEPARTURE.

WITH the advent of the theosophical movement inaugurated by H. P. Blavatsky, an era of self-thought began. The Theosophical Society was intended to be free from any enforced belief in any opinion, creed, or dogma whatever; being based upon no other fundamental principle than the unity of the One from whom all life with its infinite variety of forms originates, and the resulting brotherhood of all human beings. Undoubtedly one of the causes which led to the rapid growth of that Society was that many people instinctively or intuitionally perceived the sublimity of that idea, even if they were not capable of grasping it intellectually at once. In fact, those who are able to conceive that a person may become interiorly illumined by the light of truth and be taught by wisdom itself, so that he may know the truth, not from mere hearsay or from the reading of books, or from information received, or from his own speculations and fancies, but from awakening himself to a higher state of self-consciousness, and living himself in that light; the number of persons who can conceive of that, seems to be still comparatively small.

Especially in England, the country ridden by orthodoxy, hypocrisy, and conventionalism; where everyone looks upon everybody with contempt unless he dresses like him, feeds like him, adopts the same manners and believes the same things as he; where everything is divided off into boxes and pigeon-holed; where nobody cares what you are, but everybody wants to know to what system, club, or church you belong; the meaning of the word self-thought, self-knowledge, or Theosophy seems to be generally misunderstood, and this misunderstanding is about to invade the ranks of the Theosophical Society, bringing with it a bagful of dogmas and doctrines, threatening the freedom of that Society and to turn it into a sect; perhaps a sect with more advanced views than those of the rest, but a sect after all, in which no one can attain freedom, but is bound to follow blindly the scent of a leader.

There is not a country in the world in which the book called "The Bible" is so much worshipped as in England, and perhaps nowhere is the meaning of its contents so much misunderstood; otherwise it would be known more generally that this freedom from dogmatism and the self-perception of truth taught by Theosophy form the sum and substance of the new "covenant" or the new dispensation. This is nowhere better explained than in Chapter VIII of the epistle of St. Paul to the Hebrews, where it is said: "I will put my laws into their mind and write them in their hearts, and I will be to them a God and they shall be to me a people. And they shall not teach every man his neighbor and every man his brother, saying Know the Lord; for all shall know me, from the least to the greatest. In that he saith, A new covenant, he hath made the first one old. Now that which decayeth and waxeth old is ready to vanish away."

It is not said that the new dispensation is to consist in that somebody with a new set of more plausible dogmas than the old ones is to come forward and to convert the people to a belief in them; but the new covenant consists in the self-recognition of that eternal light of divine wisdom which heretofore was known only theoretically from descriptions received through the prophets and sages. No amount of theories and opinions enables a person to see; they can only serve to aid him in overcoming the obstacles which prevent him from seeing, and perhaps to persuade him to open his eyes. The new covenant consists in growing into that freedom, where no sectarian or theological crutches are required; but where the light of divine wisdom itself can illumine the heart.

The fact that this new covenant does not consist in the establishment of a new creed is also shown by St. Paul in the same letter at its beginning: "Now of the things which we have spoken, this is the sum: We have such an high priest, who is set on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty in the heavens: a minister of the true tabernacle [the spiritual soul] which the Lord pitched and not man . . . For if he were on earth, he should not be a priest, seeing that there are priests that offer gifts according to the law."

Thus it is shown that it is not an earthly, mortal man who puts his laws directly into men's minds and writes them in their hearts; but it is the great luminous soul itself that sends its light into every mind and heart that is ready to receive it;—not theoretically, as was the old way and custom among the blind, by secondary information; but practically, according to the new departure by which everyone is asked to open his eyes and receive himself that light of which those who keep their eyes closed know only from hearsay. Who is he who is set on the right hand of the Majesty in the heavens? Surely not a man of this earth. The Occultist knows that the right hand of God means his power, become the right hand is the symbol for doing good, and the power of the divine man is divine love; while only that love is divine which is universal and identical with divine self-knowledge; for "love" in its true sense means the recognition of Self (Âtmâ) in another thing, while divine love recognizes itself in everything.

This divine love or self-knowledge is Theosophy, of which it is plainly said in the Bible (I Corinth., II, 7); "We speak wisdom among them that are perfect, yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world that come to nought; but we speak the wisdom of God [the inner man] in a mystery (theou sophian), which God ordained before the world (prò ton aionon) unto our glory", and it must therefore be plain to every rational mind that this Divine Wisdom cannot be explained and proved to those who have no comprehension for it, nor can the nature of Divine Love be demonstrated to those who keep their hearts closed against it by self-love, conceit, and mutual incriminations. Such persons, enveloped as they are in the veil of spiritual ignorance (Tamas), will not be able to understand the nature and purport of the new dispensation.

Those of the Theosophical Society, and out of it, who are still clamoring for a creed, needing, as a stick upon which to lean, the opinion of some leader believed to be a reliable authority, belong to the outer circle, to the pronaos of the temple. No matter how many pledges they have signed and how many ceremonies they have performed, they have not entered into the sanctuary into which none with his eyes shut is admitted. Praiseworthy as their object may be in studying the theories regarding immortal life, while they are not yet able to experience it practically they ought not to imagine that having become well versed in these theories they have attained self-knowledge, but know that a description of food does not appease hunger, while he who eats receives the benefit of it even without a description, so all the theories about the origin of man and his development into a divine being have only the object of inducing him to follow the true path, while only he who walks upon that path and practically develops into a divine being will obtain real self-knowledge and arrive at his destination.

To the inner circle will belong those who, not satisfied with mere theories nor with blindly following the sounding horn of a leader, succeed in opening their own spiritual eye and receive themselves the light which shines for leaders and for followers alike. Having awakened to the realization of the inner life of the soul, they are thereby initiated into that inner life and receive the new dispensation, which cannot be enforced upon them by any outward pledge, interpretation, or ceremony. All that the outward man (the personality) does out of his own perverted self-will and without the inner impulse from the divine man (Mahâtmâ) within, is worthless and foolish; even his pledges are the result of folly and selfishness, for he makes his promises for the purpose of obtaining a selfish end and pledges himself to do that which he has not the power to accomplish. But the spiritually awakened man, knowing his own Master and having become united with him, even for a moment, is during that moment filled with the understanding and the power of the Master, and what he does in such circumstances is not done by him personally, but through him by the Master, as a conscious but selfless instrument of the Master's will, and the proof that he has acted as an instrument for the Master can be found nowhere except by and within himself.

This is the doctrine that has been taught in the Vedas, the Bhagavad Gîtâ, and the Bible, by the ancient Rosicrucians and mystics of all ages. Theosophical students have often admitted its possibility, but comparatively few seem to believe that it can be practically carried out. This, then, is the new departure which we would propose for the Theosophical Society; that we should seek to outgrow the old dispensation and enter the new; that the question should not be whether we are loyal to Jones or to Smith, but whether we are loyal to immortal Truth; that we cease to dispute as to whether the description given of the light by Smith or the one given by Jones is correct, but ourselves tear away the veil of selfishness and ignorance which shuts us out from the perception of light. This is the new departure, that everyone should seek to know the Master within himself, and become himself that Master over the delusion of "self"; when he will be able to know the reflection of the image of the Master in others as well as himself. Not by mere science and clever speculation, nor by gush and sentimentalism, is true freedom attained. There is no other way to it except through the awakening to the knowledge of eternal truth.

TESTIMONY AS TO MAHATMAS.<sup>1</sup>

THE name Mahátmá in these articles is intended to embrace also Masters, Brothers of the Lodge, Initiates, and the like. The word testimony embraces all statements and proofs intended to bring out and constitute evidence of fact. All persons who have testimony on this subject are invited to send it to the PATH, where it will appear either in full or condensed. I should be informed in each case whether or not names may be used. If not to be used, an initial will precede the published statement.

W. Q. J.

14. Nâha, an American, says that several years prior to joining the T.S. he met and talked with one of the minor Adepts at work in America, and that since he became a member of the Society he has seen both the Master and H.P.B. in dreams, that he has conversed psychically with a Greek Adept, and that he personally knows an Adept of the White Brotherhood who resides in America, and has met him in his physical body and been constantly incited by him to work for the good of the Theosophical Society.

15. L.G., an American, says: "From my earliest childhood I have had with me, in my inner life, a Friend frequently with me in both pleasure and pain; who chided, encouraged, and aided me, and whose face grew so familiar that when one day shown a portrait of 'one of the Brothers of the Lodge' I instantly recognized it. I have often seen him since and had aid and instruction from him. I have also seen in the same way the Master whose picture I afterwards was shown. I wish I could inspire others with some conception of these Beings and of the devotion that is due them."

16. Ida M. Holbrook says: "Before joining the T.S. a Being appeared to me in my waking hours in broad daylight and gave me instruction and encouragement. There was with this Master another (not, however, in the physical) person, well known to all sincere and devoted F.T.S., whose name it is not necessary to mention and whose features then I did not know but have since identified. This Being I have identified with the Master, and he said he would come again when I needed him. Nothing can cause me to doubt the existence of those great souls we have called the Masters."

17. C.H.J., an American, says: "Some years ago, before I knew of Theosophy or the T.S. except by bare mention, I was in danger of being wrongly influenced by one who called himself a Theosophist. I then first saw and met psychically beings whom I called Brothers, of evident power and and great development. They taught me and explained certain things, warning me against this dangerous person. They outlined much of theosophical theory as given out by H.P.B. Since I became an F.T.S. I have identified one of those Beings with H.P.B.'s Master. I will add that knowledge of the existence of these Great Ones is for me clear and positive, my belief in the Masters is due to experience, and not to testimony from others or study from books."

EAST AND WEST.

THE contrast between East and West is much like that between a woman and a man,—not an antagonism but a complement. In the man we find the restless, pushing, aggressive, venturesome, hard-headed, practical, calculating, rationalistic, virile spirit; in the woman, the quiescent, retiring, peaceful, timid, sentimental, poetic, trustful, intuitive, feminine. These qualities are less the reverse of each other than the converse; not arrayed for mutual extermination but for mutual support. And as in any ideal household perfection comes through the conjunction of the strong traits in each mate with the weak ones in the other, so in the Theosophic household growth and progress come when to the vigor of the Occidental temper is united the spiritual insight of the Oriental.

Social philosophers have moralized long over the internal characteristics of the sexes, puzzling, sometimes worrying, themselves why the ordinary man is spiritually obtuse and the ordinary woman materially unpractical. They do not marvel at the male incapacity to nurse an infant, nor the female to ship before the mast: physiological limitations are patent enough. But when there is question as to why mental and moral distinctions are normally as marked, the perplexity begins. Yet it is abundantly obvious that the body is but the external manifestation of the soul, that the sex peculiarities are expressed in both; and equally obvious, one would say, that the duality which pervades Nature has its highest and most explicit exhibition in Man.

So with nations. As in families the male and the female display the universal duality and find true domesticity in combination; as in communities the antithetical energies seek appropriate spheres in unlike employments; so nations differentiate into those expressing the outward virility of action and those expressing the genius of contemplation and inner grace. And with nations, as with families and communities, the richest results are not from jealous contrasts or embittered antagonisms, but from a union in which the deficiencies of one are complemented by the exuberance of another.

What is true of commerce, factories, and agricultural products is true of mental and spiritual endowments. Every advanced people has something to contribute to the world's store of valuables, and the contribution must be of that which is its own special output. No nation can expect to evolve from itself all the minerals, crops, and craft-work which are required for complete national well-being, but wisely develops itself in those excellences which its local furnishings suggest, profitably exchanging the product for the differing products wherein other nations excel; and the reasonable dictate of allowing national genius full course and of both giving and receiving wealth through interchange of the best holds equally of ideas and aspirations. To expect national genius to be all-comprehensive, supplying the highest fruits of thought and devotion in all departments, is equivalent to expecting that one zone should produce the chestnut and the pine-apple, the arctic fur and the tropical cocoa-fibre; and to refuse exchange of mental treasures from pride or exclusiveness is as childish and suicidal as any scheme of "protection" in political economy.

Unguarded addiction to dominant traits produces one-sidedness and evil. A man without feminine check becomes rough, tyrannical, coarse; a woman without masculine tonic becomes weak, silly, dependent. A nation uninfluenced by foreign experiences cannot perceive its own deficiencies and naturally exaggerates its own specialty, becoming aggressive if of virile disposition, subservient if the reverse. Its literature and religion express the prevalent temper, dealing in bombast and wars when of the former type, with superstition and sentiment when of the latter. And so it is that deliberate isolation hypertrophies a national trait till it becomes diseased, and the only sure cure is infusion of imported thought. Dominatingness may be assuaged by spirituality, folly by practical wisdom.

These somewhat commonplace truths have wholesome bearing on that comparison between East and West which is so frequently asserted in Theosophical quarters, sometimes intelligently, sometimes otherwise. Speaking generally, one may say that the West displays the masculine type, the East the feminine. In our hemisphere the prominent quality is practical enterprise. The conquest of exterior nature, the betterment of material conditions, the utilization of all opportunities for business advance,—these are the aims which so brace energy and stimulate endeavor that success in them is the grand marvel of the age. The Western world seems like one great man, vigorous, herculean of strength, sure to bend all materials to his will. He has not always fine sense of right or much perception of supersensual things, but he certainly is open-eyed to practical affairs and keen to invent appliances. On the other hand, the Orient is sentimental, dreamy, averse from action, little given to leaving home, indifferent to material progress, eminently conservative, close in touch with truths in the unseen, more alive to the other world than to this, gladly subordinate, unready to combine against aggression, even willing for it if it guarantees protection. The type is not virile but feminine, and its intuitive sense of what is grander than force and finer than materialism brings Divinity into humanity.

This distinction exhibits itself in the contrasted tastes, habits, social organization, pursuits, ambitions, interests, books, art, and religion. Of course inherent constitution moulds every outward manifestation. More than anywhere else do we see in men and women the sex element in religion, rationalizing and independence and self-assertion characterizing the men, faith and compliance and submission to authority the women. A masculine race and a feminine race contrast in the same way, and therefore Western religion is a record of revolts, reforms, the application of reason to Theology, a defective sense of reality in the unseen; while Eastern religion changes little, is ever reverent to tradition, cares little for the canons of practicality, and profoundly feels the immanence of Deity.

And in races as in sexes, the exclusive development of one type results in disproportion and mischief. Our Western hemisphere has become so plunged in thought of physical interests that it has lost delicate sensitiveness to interests above matter, and even doubts if such exist. Materialism has atrophied its soul. The hemisphere of the East has become so immersed in thought of superphysical interests that it has lost perception of reasonable considerations and practical claims, stolidly bends before traditional myths, is superstitious and fanciful and trembling at change. Its beautiful insight into the world beyond matter and forms keeps it too indifferent to the conditions of actual life and to the methods those conditions exact.

Clear-sighted observers, viewing impartially these racial peculiarities and evils, have detected the true treatment for both and instinctively exclaim "Marry this woman to this man!" For nature and experience alike affirm that in the union of opposites there is health. Let the dreamy Oriental feel the touch of a virile energy, the sense-bound Occidental be warmed by a spiritual emotion long unsensed. In the free intercourse of affection and thought, lacking traits will receive their complement, old mistakes will be corrected by glad concession, partial truth find its missing half, depleted energies mutually refilled. As the association makes each conscious of the better endowments of the other, there will be eagerness to secure them, and so in generous partaking there will come more symmetry of character without a loss of distinctive trait. Mutual respect will heighten self-respect, and the fruit of such happy combination ripen rapidly in beauty and luxuriance.

In this cordial, generous appreciation of unlike gifts is the clue to inter-racial as to domestic perfection. Husband and wife do not expand in healthy character if unfavorably comparing each other's traits. Similarly the united East and West would never flourish if, instead of noting and valuing the excellences of each other, the one should be ever lamenting the sordid interests of her mate, and the mate be declaiming against the childish babble of her Sacred Books, the petty ceremonies and paltry observances which make life a tedious round of forms, none the better because baptized "religious". It is not by emphasizing faults that the faults become distasteful. Sordid interests and religious puerilities disappear only as they are dislodged by the worthier contents introduced voluntarily under the gentle pressure of example. And in such a marriage such would ensue.

A curious contrast may but solidify the union. In general, the world is at its oldest now, and therefore at its best. But the East was better in its youth, and the West is better in its age. No one looks to barbaric, or even to classic, times as the apex of Occidental civilization; no one to the modern Orient as the Golden Era of its religion. The best of the one is in the present, the best of the other in the past. Yet this is only another of those complementary distinctions which, rightly treated, conduce to peace.

He does a service to truth, to human welfare, to the loftiest spiritual interests of men, who helps to mate these opposite hemispheres of the earth into a loving and perpetual union. There is no force so potent as religion, none so priceless. Let it, with all its concomitant treasures of truth as to human origin, evolution, and destiny, suffuse the Western races, as it may if once again it pours from its ancient home in the Orient, and the great transforming energy will make for them a new era, wherein dwelleth righteousness. The teaching of long-gone sages and prophets and Theodidaktoi will sweep through the vacant souls of the twentieth century, and cause upturned eyes and hearts to transcend the glories of physics and of mind. Even these will be enhanced, for no longer only of the earth, earthy, they will shine brighter from their celestial contact. And for such blessings will there be no return? Surely it will come in a broadened sympathy with all truth, a deeper sense of the oneness of humanity, a keener appreciation of each advance in human condition, a larger knowledge of the earthly side of man's evolution, a better perception of the difference between the speculative and the real, a stronger impulse to energetic use of life, an abandonment of pride and selfishness and spiritual isolation and belittling forms. Mind and heart, strength and tenderness, energy and devotion, genius and religion, will then be united. And men, seeing the East and the West hand-in-hand indissolubly, will exclaim with satisfaction, "Those whom God hath joined together, let not man put asunder".

A MAHATMA'S MESSAGE TO SOME BRAHMANS.

A COPY of the letter hereunder printed was sent me in 1893 by the Brahman gentleman mentioned therein, whose full name is Binee Madhab Battacharya and who was at one time president of the Prayag T.S. at Allahabad. He sent it to me after the publication of my "Letter to the Brahmans" in order to try and show me that the T.S. was in fact a Buddhist propaganda. The original is in the possession of Mr. Sinnett, who informed me not long ago that he thought he had it among his papers but had no leisure to look for it. I print it now for reasons which will appear. It reads:

"Message which Mr. Sinnett is directed by one of the Brothers, writing through Madame B[lavatsky], to convey to the native members of the Prayag Branch of the Theosophical Society.

"The Brothers desire me to inform one and all of you natives that unless a man is prepared to become a thorough Theosophist, i.e. to do what D. Mavalankar did—give up entirely caste, his old superstitions, and show himself a true reformer (especially in the case of child-marriage), he will remain simply a member of the Society, with no hope whatever of ever hearing from us. The Society, acting in this directly in accord with our orders, forces no one to become a Theosophist of the Second Section. It is left with himself at his choice. It is useless for a member to argue 'I am one of a pure life, I am a teetotaller and an abstainer from meat and vice, all my aspirations are for good, etc.', and he at the same time building by his acts and deeds an impassible barrier on the road between himself and us. What have we, the disciples of the Arhats of Esoteric Buddhism and of Sang-gyas, to do with the Shasters and orthodox Brahmanism? There are 100 of thousands of Fakirs, Sannyasis, or Sadhus leading the most pure lives and yet being, as they are, on the path of error, never having had an opportunity to meet, see, or even hear of us. Their forefathers have driven the followers of the only true philosophy upon earth away from India, and now it is not for the latter to come to them, but for them to come to us, if they want us. Which of them is ready to become a Buddhist, a Nastika, as they call us? None. Those who have believed and followed us have had their reward. Mr. Sinnett and Hume are exceptions. Their beliefs are no barriers to us, for they have none. They may have bad influences around them, bad magnetic emanations, the result of drink, society, and promiscuous physical associations (resulting even from shaking hands with impure men), but all this is physical and material impediments which with a little effort we could counteract, and even clear away, without much detriment to ourselves. Not so with the magnetic and invisible results proceeding from erroneous and sincere beliefs. Faith in the gods or god and other superstition attracts millions of foreign influences, living entities and powerful Agents round them, with which we would have to use more than ordinary exercise of power to drive them away. We do not choose to do so. We do not find it either necessary or profitable to lose our time waging war on the unprogressed planetaries who delight in personating gods and sometimes well-known characters who have lived on earth. There are Dhyān Chohans and Chohans of darkness. Not what they term devils, but imperfect intelligences who have never been born on this or any other earth or sphere no more than the Dhyān Chohans have, and who will never belong to the 'Children of the Universe', the pure planetary intelligences who preside at every Manvantara, while the Dark Chohans preside at the Pralaya."

Now this is a genuine message from the Master, allowing, of course, for any minor errors in copying. Its philosophical and occult references are furthermore confirmed by the manuscript of part of the third volume of the Secret Doctrine, not yet printed. We know also that Master K.H. informed Mr. Sinnett and others that he was an esoteric Buddhist; H.P.B. declared herself a Buddhist; on my asking her in 1875 what could the Masters' belief be called she told me they might be designated "pre-Vedic Buddhists", but that no one would now admit there was any Buddhism before the Vedas, so I had best think of them as Esoteric Buddhists.

But I am informed that Mrs. Besant has several times privately stated that in her opinion the letter first above printed was a "forgery or humbug" gotten up by H.P.B. I know that Mr. Chakravarti has said the same thing, because he said it to me in New York. It is for Mrs. Besant to deny the correctness of my information as to what she said: she can affirm her belief in the genuineness of the letter. If she does so, we shall all be glad to know. If she merely denies that she ever impugned it, then it will be necessary for her to say affirmatively what is her belief, for silence will be assent to its genuineness. I affirm that it is from one of the Masters, and that, if it be shown to be a fraud, then all of H.P.B.'s claims of connection with and teaching from the Master must fall to the ground. It is now time that this important point be cleared up.

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE.

THE PERSECUTION OF WILLIAM Q. JUDGE.

THE OBJECT IN VIEW.

THE design from the beginning was to get me out of the way to the Presidency of the T.S. Mrs. Besant was to demand my resignation, after that Col. Olcott was to resign his office, then Mrs. Besant was to be nominated as President; Vice-Presidency probably to go to Bert. Keightley, though on that the outer proofs are not yet definite. In London last July Mrs. Besant said several times that the object of the proceeding was to prevent my succeeding to the Presidency. But here are a few samples from her letters:

Calcutta, Jan. 11, 1894. You must resign the outer headship (of E.S.T.) held jointly with myself, or the evidence which goes to prove the wrong done must be laid before a committee of T.S. . . . And you must resign the position of President-elect.

Delhi, Feb. 14, 1894. He [Chakravarti] endorsed the idea that I should take sole charge of the School. . . . Indeed, he told me last summer [about Aug., 1893.—J.] that it had to be so presently.

Agra, Feb. 8, 1894. As you know, I refused the offer to nominate me as President; since then I have been told [by whom?—J.] “not to oppose”, so I remain passive and wait.

— Feb. 14, 1894. That you had made an intellectual blunder, misled by a high example. [This means H.P.B.] . . . X. would not take the Presidency at any price. If I have to, pity me. [Italics are mine.—J.]

In July she told me the first day, as explaining the sentence above quoted about a “high example” and another, that I was “largely a victim”, that her theory was first, that H.P.B. had committed several frauds for good ends and made bogus messages; second, that I was misled by her example; and third, that H.P.B. had given me permission to do such acts. She then asked me to confess thus and that would clear up all. I peremptorily denied such a horrible lie, and warned her that everywhere I would resist such attack on H.P.B. These are facts, and the real issue is around H.P.B.

RESIGNATION ASKED.

Some European Lodges, and the Indian Section, have asked me to resign as Vice-President. I have refused and shall refuse. The attempt to force me by saying “all honorable men resign when attacked” is silly nonsense. No office in T.S. has any attraction for me, but I will not be forced. An “Anniversary Meeting” in India, with no power, and being, in fact, only an extra meeting of the Indian Section, passed resolutions asking my resignation. To that I replied that I do not recognize either the meeting or the resolutions. T.S. Anniversary Meetings are unknown to our Constitution.

WHY NO EXPLANATION YET.

By reading the Vice-President’s letter to the European General Secretary printed hereunder, members will see that I cannot make any explanation without copies of my letters and alleged memoranda. In addition, I find that some of the documents have up to this day been kept back from me, so that I have not seen them at all. It is quite true that Mrs. Besant gave me a copy of her proposed statement as prosecutor; but that contained only references and a few garbled extracts; and besides, it did not cover the items they have since added to the number.

W. Q. J.

LETTER TO EUROPEAN GENERAL SECRETARY.

144 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK, January 25, 1895.

General Secretary European Section T.S.

SIR AND BROTHER:—I have received some seven requests by resolution from Branches and Centers of your Section to the effect, (a) that I should resign the office of Vice-President of the T.S., (b) that I should answer charges published against me by a paper inimical to the T.S. or give reasons for not replying, (c) that I should offer myself for trial on said charges; and I have also read the full publications of these requests and other matter connected therewith in the Vadhan. I now beg to ask you to act as the proper official channel for this general reply to those requests, and to inform your Executive Committee also.

First. I am amazed at the undue, precipitate, and untheosophical haste displayed in the requests to me to reply to the public attack made on me before I could have time to do so or had refused, when the slightest reflection would show I could not possibly reply in such a hurry, and when a true brotherly feeling would seem to require that before making the demands, means should be taken to discover whether I had an intention to reply or explain. The Barcelona Lodge, however, asked you to inquire of me whether the charges made in said paper were true or not. Please let them know that I again say the charges are absolutely false.

Second. When the Judicial Committee met in July and when thereafter Mrs. Besant, as prosecutor, publicly assented, in apparent good faith, to a general resolution declaring the matter closed and dropped, she was then in possession of all the alleged evidence now in her possession. Inasmuch as her name and her opinions have been used in a part of the above-mentioned correspondence as some sort of proof of something, I draw your Lodges' attention to the fact that she had in her possession all said evidence at the time when she, as your public leader, publicly assented to two statements and a solemn resolution closing the matter passed at your Convention. It now appears that some Lodges desire to nullify and override that action; hence either (a) the resolution was not passed in good faith, or (b) it was procured through hoodwinking and deceiving the Convention. If you and those Lodges say that they did not have the said alleged evidence, and would not have passed the resolution had you possessed the said alleged evidence, then their present desire to avoid the resolution—for that is what the requests indicate—is due to a feeling that you were hoodwinked into passing it. This being so, I must refer you to Mrs. Besant, for I had no part whatever in proposing, forwarding, or passing the resolution.

Third. In reply to the request that I shall resign the office of Vice-President, please say that I am obliged to refuse the request. If it is proper I should now resign, it was just as much so in July when your leading prosecutors had all the alleged evidence in their possession. I regard resignation as evidence of guilt. If I resigned that office I could not be in any way tried on any charges, and very soon after a resignation the same persons might say I resigned to evade responsibility.

Fourth. I have replied to the public newspaper in the only way it deserves. I have still under consideration a full reply to the T.S. respecting the real charges, but I refuse to be hurried until the right time, for the cogent reasons given below. And as I have seen that new mistatements of fact and charges are being circulated against me by F.T.S. who are keeping up this disgraceful pursuit, I have additional reasons for waiting until all possible innuendos and distortions shall have come forth, even were I now fully prepared to reply.

I cannot make a proper reply to the charges until I have in my possession a copy of the documentary evidence which it was, or is, proposed to use in support of the charges. These documents consist of various letters of mine on which are memoranda not in my handwriting. Some of them are letters written over ten years ago. They have been deliberately kept away from me, although open enemies have been given and allowed to take complete copies and fac-similes. No fair person would ask that I should answer without them.

I arrived in London July 5th, 1894, and at once demanded, first, copies of letters, and second, an inspection of all the evidence. Mrs. Besant promised these, but did not perform. The Council met informally July 6, when I again demanded the evidence and received the same promise as before with the same failure to perform. July 7th the formal meeting of the Council took place. The same demand was again made with the same result. Each day until the second day before departure I made the request and met the same promise followed by failure to perform. The Judicial Committee met and I then made the same demand, and at the meeting Mrs. Besant and others said, "Oh, of course Mr. Judge should have copies of the proposed evidence". But the papers were neither copied nor shown me up to July 19th, almost a week after Convention, and when I was packing my trunk. All this time until the 19th Mrs. Besant had the papers. On the 19th I formally and peremptorily demanded them. She said she had given them to Col. Olcott, who said they had been just sent off to the mail to go to India; this I repeated to Mrs. Besant and said I would publish the fact to the public. She hastened to Col. Olcott, and he said he had made a mistake, as the papers were in his travelling case. He then, in Dr. Buck's presence, in a great hurry, as I sailed on the 21st, allowed me a hasty look at the papers on July 19th, I taking a copy of one or two short ones. But several being lengthy, and especially the one by which they hoped to destroy my general credibility, I could not copy them. Col. Olcott then promised to send copies; Mrs. Besant declared herself quit of the matter. Up to this date the promises made have not been fulfilled. I am without copies of the documents on which the charges are based.

Mrs. Besant, as prosecutor, never fulfilled her promise nor her duty. I then believed and still believe that they never intended to give me copies nor to permit inspection, but hoped to hurry me into a trial unprepared in every respect. These facts, with the fact that they allowed Mr. Old to copy everything, will throw some light on the matter and on the opinions of the parties. I shall certainly not reply until I have before me the documentary evidence or copies and know the precise offenses with which I am charged. This is common justice.

Fraternally,

WILLIAM Q. JUDGE, Vice-President T.S.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CHE-YEW-TSANG—ERNEST T. HARGROVE.

Having stated in a circular entitled A Forgotten Pledge that "my other name and further details" would be found in the February number of THE PATH, it may have appeared strange that no name was given as promised. The reason for this silence was that I had intended the article on "Our Overwhelming Virtues" to appear in the same number as the letter to "Julius", if the editor would allow it. The article was to have been signed Che-Yew-Tsang, with the name Ernest T. Hargrove in brackets beneath. If that arrangement had been carried out there would have been no need to give the latter name in the letter to which I refer. I wrote accordingly to the editor before the arrival here of the January issue. When this arrived I found in it "Our Overwhelming Virtues", but owing to great pressure of work I failed to catch the February issue in time to make the necessary alteration and arrange for the insertion of the name in the letter to "Julius". That is all.

CHE-YEW-TSANG,

(ERNEST T. HARGROVE.)

A PORTRAIT OF W. Q. J.

EDITOR PATH:—Will you please insert the following?

On December 11th the League of Theosophical Workers No. 1 in a circular letter informed the Branches of the American Section that hanging on the walls of the Headquarters Room were the pictures of Theosophists, big and little, but of W. Q. J. there was none, and suggested that if each of the one hundred and odd Branches of this Section would send ten cents to us, the sum raised would be sufficient for the purchase of a life-sized photo and frame. The majority of Branches had been heard from by December 31st, and as there was a gathering at Headquarters that night to sit the Old Year out, at which W. Q. J. was present, the opportunity was embraced of hanging up the picture.

The cost of the photo was $6.00, and $1.00 had been allowed for the frame, making $10.00 in all. Ten cents from each Branch would have just covered this sum. Instead of $1.00, however, the frame cost $8.00, making an expense of $14.00. So far seventy Branches have been heard from, but, strangely enough, although the statement was distinctly made that only ten cents per Branch was needed, most of the Branches which responded insisted on sending more, so that up to date $14.35 has been received, kind Karma evidently having anticipated our miscalculation on the cost of a first-class frame.

When the returns are all in, a silver plate will be incorporated into the frame with an inscription of presentation from the Branches.

THE SUPERINTENDENT.

New York, January 23, 1895.

THE LAST THREE YEARS OF THE LIFE OF MADAME BLAVATSKY.

To the Readers of the PATH:

Acting on the suggestion contained in the letter below, from the Countess Wachtmeister, I am at present actively engaged in collecting reminiscences, personal and otherwise, of H. P. B. during the last three years of her life; and should therefore be very much obliged to any persons, members of the Society or otherwise, who would help me in this, either by giving me short sketches of their own experiences with her, of interest to students and to the world at large, or by supplying details of her history during the eventful years 1888 to 1891.

Letters of hers will be most acceptable, either copies of them or the originals, the latter of which will be promptly returned.

My endeavor is to write a true and, so far as is possible, a complete history of these years; and I think I am right in calling upon my fellow-members, almost as a matter of their duty, to aid me.

CLAUDE FALLS WRIGHT,
144 Madison Avenue, New York City.

The following is a copy of the letter referred to:

"MY DEAR CLAUDE:—As my book, the Reminiscences of H. P. Blavatsky and the Secret Doctrine, has been read with such interest all over the world, it seems to me that it would be an admirable plan to follow it up by carrying on the threads from where I dropped them, through to the end of her life. You were one of her favorite pupils, and as you lived with us at Headquarters for three years and were with her at her last moments, it seems to me that you are fitted to carry on this labor of love to one whose memory is so dear to us all.

"It is of the utmost importance that as soon as possible all facts regarding her that can be gathered together should be printed for the benefit of the members of the Society and the world at large. I would suggest that all friends that you can get in touch with should be asked to contribute their anecdotes and their experiences with her. I do hope most earnestly and sincerely that you will take up this important work, for I know your heart will respond to the appeal.

Yours affectionately,
CONSTANCE WACHTMEISTER."

A STAMP COLLECTION FOR THE T.S.

VERY few persons other than collectors have any adequate idea of the immense profits realized from the sale of a good collection of stamps. Nevertheless it is a fact that money judiciously invested in stamps will usually double itself in one or two years. To cite a few examples: The Columbian $1.00 stamps were only issued two years ago, and yet cancelled and uncanceled specimens were sold in New York City in January of this year for $4.00 each. There are rare English stamps which now sell at $125.00 each, and so on. Nearly every family has a lot of letters twenty, thirty, or forty years old. These often have on them stamps of great value. Take the series of United States stamps issued in 1869, only twenty-six years ago. Their market-value rose as follows, for unused specimens:

	1873.	1889.	1895.		1873.	1889.	1895.
1-cent	$ .03	$ .10	$ .50	12-cent	$ .20	$ .50	$ 1.00
2-cent	.04	.10	.35	15-cent	.25	.75	2.50
3-cent	.05	.10	.15	24-cent	.40	2.00	10.00
6-cent	.10	.50	1.75	30-cent	.50	1.50	10.00
10-cent	.15	.40	1.50	90-cent	1.25	6.00	17.50

These values are still rising. The profits on the 90-cent stamp would be, in four years, 138 per cent.; twenty years, 666 per cent.; and after twenty-six years, 1944 per cent. To be sure, all stamps do not rise in the same proportion, but these are a fair example.

It is proposed to make a collection of postage and revenue stamps to be sold, after fifteen years, for the benefit of the American Section of the Theosophical Society. There is reason to believe that if the members of the T.S. all over the American Section take an interest in the plan and help it during the next fifteen years, such a collection will sell for from $50,000 to $75,000. At all events, if every member helps, the expense will be small, and the plan worth trying. In coöperation are the elements of success.

To this end all members are asked to send stamps of all kinds. Specific directions will be furnished those who desire it; but the following general rules may be observed.

GENERAL RULES.

1. All kinds of unused stamps from the lowest to the highest values, including stamped envelopes, paper wrappers, post-cards, return post-cards, letter-sheets, and postage-due stamps. It is well to procure sets of these when first issued, for the designs are often changed after having been in use but a short time. Also, during changes of administration, stamps marked "provisional", etc., etc.
2. Used or cancelled stamps, etc. The older these are, the more valuable they become. Care should be taken to keep them in perfect condition. Some old stamps are so rare that it is necessary to preserve them in situ upon the envelope used, to constitute a proof of genuineness. This should be done wherever possible.
3. Stamps of the Protected States of the British Empire in India are never used to pay postage to foreign countries, and hence are extremely difficult to get "cancelled". Members in India can address letters to themselves and post them, then after receiving them send the envelope with the cancelled stamp in situ.
4. Collections will comprise: (a) Unused Stamps, etc., etc.; (b) Used stamps, etc., etc.; (c) Used and Unused Revenue and Tax Stamps; (d) Registered Letter Labels of all countries, etc. The last are tiny slips of paper bearing the name of the office issuing, and a number. They are only used on registers to and from foreign countries.
5. Do not be afraid that what you send may be duplicated by some other member. The work will cost a little, and this will be met by a sale of duplicates of the commoner kinds. The proceeds of such sales will also be used to purchase very rare stamps which can be had in no other way, and thus make the collection as complete as possible.

The member in whose charge the collection will be is the undersigned, and he will do all of the work gratis. The collection will, if necessary, be insured against fire. It will be held as the property of the American Section, and is at all times to be at the disposition of the General Secretary and Executive Committee of the Section, but will be kept at the residence of the undersigned. The General Secretary has approved the plan.

Several members have already given their own private collections as a nucleus for this larger one. Let each one do something in this way, and great results will flow from individually small efforts.

Dr. T. P. HYATT,
147 Hancock street, Brooklyn, N.Y., U.S.A.

NOTE.—This plan has been laid before the President-Founder and the General Secretaries of the other Sections, and if they will agree to extend the plan and adopt it, it will be made to cover the Theosophical Society all over the world, and be sold for the benefit of the whole.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE VAHAN for January is entirely composed of letters concerning the present crisis in the T.S., barring of course the "Activities".—[G.]

A.B.C. OF THEOSOPHY has just been issued in Spanish by the publishers of Sophia. It is a well-printed pamphlet of sixteen pages.—[H.S.B.]

JOURNAL AND TEXT, the official organ of the Buddhist Text Society of India, contains the record of the proceedings of the second quarterly meeting of the Society, and a variety of notes and comments. There are also some pages of native script.—[G.]

LOTUSBLÜTHEN for January (German) begins the fourth volume of Dr. Hartmann's magazine. It contains "The Masters of Wisdom" by the Editor, "The Buddhist Religion in Japan" by Zitsuzen Ashitsu, and a continued article on "Elementaries" from communications of H.P.B.—[G.]

NEW ENGLAND NOTES is a 4-page monthly published by the New England Lecture Fund, 24 Mt. Vernon street, Boston. It is designed to make all Theosophists in New England better acquainted with each other and their methods of work. Subscription, 25 cents per year, single copies, 5 cents.—[B.H.]

SOPHIA for January and February contains: "The Tower of Babel of Modern Thought", by H.P.B.; Jasper Niemand's "Letters"; "The Meaning and Use of Pain", by A.B.; two other articles by H.P.B.; and an excellent article on Hindû chronology by Sr. M. Treviño y Villa. It is well edited and well printed.—[H.S.B.]

MERCURY, the children's Theosophical magazine published in San Francisco by W. J. Walters, seems well adapted to its purpose. The January number contains many little articles written down to a child's level, some notices of Lotus Circle exercises at Christmas time, and departments for questions and answers and for puzzles.—[G.]

THEOSOPHICAL SIFTINGS, Vol. VII, No. 14, contains a reprint of Dr. Anderson's able article on "The Reincarnating Ego" published originally in The New Californian, and "The Evolution of Man" by Fellow A. E. Clover, being a paper read before the Minneapolis Branch; it is largely made up of quotations from The Secret Doctrine.—[G.]

THE NORTHERN THEOSOPHIST for February. In the "Editor's Remarks" are some further very pertinent and sensible observations on the "Judge Case". Our bubble of self-conceit, self-deceit, and hypocrisy is neatly pricked in "The Golden Calf". The continued articles on "The Theosophic Basis of Christian Dogma" and on "Immortality" end the number.—[G.]

APPLICATION OF THE MOSAIC SYSTEM of Chronology in the Elucidation of Mysteries pertaining to the "Bible in Stone" known as the Great Pyramid of Egypt, by Edward B. Latch, is a pamphlet of thirty pages of diagrams and figures, and according to the preface is an interpretation of the Great Pyramid based upon the hidden meaning of the Bible as unveiled by the author.—[G.]

THE LAMP for January has several good things in it, principally the notes from Mr. Wright's lecture on "Occultism", the extracts and clippings are judiciously selected, and the theosophical interpretation of various parts of the Christian Bible, given under the headings "Scripture Class Notes" and "International Sunday-School Lessons", is an excellent idea and well worthy of imitation.—[G.]

THE ETERNAL PILGRIM AND THE VOICE DIVINE is a little book sent "to all on the Path in token of love". In a conversation between the weary Pilgrim and the Voice, we are taught many mysteries of life, and shown where to turn for comfort and salvation, as the Pilgrim discovers that the Voice which has relieved him of his burden comes "from the Holy of Holies of his own heart". A sweet spirit of devotion breathes through these pages.—[G.]
